Tschaikowsky's 5th symphony breathes a lofty, an elegiac melancholy. The opening measures in the noble chalumeau register of the clarinet—yesterday sympathetically played by Mr Grisez—possess a grave yet tender beauty. The development of the movement retains this mood.

The song for the horn in the third movement breathes rare repose and tranquillity. Yesterday its playing left something to be desired. The introduction of a waltz, to replace the scherzo, is not to be wholly admired.

The consummation comes with the triumph of the last movement. When played with authority, without mere complacency, it has strength, ruggedness of outline and a certain heroic grandeur. The performance of it yesterday was [illegible] It was unprecipitate. It was unorchestra and there con-

Newspaper Cutting Bureau in the World
NATIONAL MAGAZINE
From BOSTON MASS.
Address
Date DEC - 1910

Anton Witek, who succeeds Willy Hess this season as concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born at Saaz, Bohemia, January 7, 1872. He studied at Prague. In 1894 he was appointed concert-master of the Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin, which position he held until the present year. Mr. Witek has organized a trio in Boston. The 'cellist is Alwyn Schroeder, who, after an interim of seven years, resumes the first chair of the 'cellos in the Boston Symphony. The pianist is Kurt Fischer, who came this season to the faculty of the New England Conservatory, Boston, from the Royal Conservatory at Sonderhausen.

Mr. Witek made his first appearance as a soloist in this country at the fourth public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony, October 28 and 29. He played the Beethoven concerto. Mr. Philip Hale said: "Mr. Witek gave an uncommonly fine performance of Beethoven's concerto. He played with serene, not indifferent composure, with respect for Beethoven and the audience."

Francis Macmillen, the American violinist, played at the symphony concerts in Boston for the first time October 14 and 15. The other soloists to appear are as follows: singers, Mme. Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destinn, Mme. Jomelli, Mme. Kirby-Lunn; pianists, Josef Hofmann, Carlo Buonamici, Ferruccio Busoni; violinists, Mischa Elman and Sylvain Noack, and 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Warnke shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cellos in the orchestra. Mr. Noack is second concert-master.

The orchestra will make the usual five monthly tours to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and in January will give concerts in Pittsburg, Toledo, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Syracuse and Troy.

RECORD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1910

Mr. Fiedler at the ninth rehearsal and concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will repeat Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" which was heard here two weeks ago. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor No. 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7 in A major and the final number on the programme will be the "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner.

MELBA SINGS WITH SYMPHONY

Hundreds Unable to Get In at Eighth Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

Nellie Melba was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the eighth public rehearsal of the season. The audience, with the audience which greeted Miss Farrar a few weeks ago, made the two record gatherings of the season. This is not meant for a description of the crowd within the building, for Symphony Hall seats 2500 and no more. It applies to the number who were turned away without seats. Those who occupied the seats in the second balcony had begun to appear on the steps outside before 8 a. m., and a number more than equalling the capacity of that balcony were turned away.

Among the compositions toward which Mr. Fiedler seems to have a particular leaning is Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, which commenced the concert. The performance yesterday was if anything, and especially in the last movement, more remarkable than that which brought the conductor such acclaim last season. Tschaikowsky was always the man first, and the artist afterwards. The symphony is a pulsing human document. The composer did not linger over long in selecting the material for his musical structures. His interpolation of a world-weary waltz has always offended certain purists, and this movement is perhaps the least of the four. But Tschaikowsky never sat on a perch to set an example. He said: "This is what I have, what I am. It is yours if you want it."

Of course, there were many present yesterday with no knowledge of music as an art, but there was certainly no one who failed to understand the proclaiming brass and the thundering drums. Mr. Fiedler was in the right mood. He took the first part at a slightly slower pace, if memory serves, than he did last season, and thereby increased its significance. At the last he taxed the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost and achieved thrilling results. He was recalled with the greatest enthusiasm.

Mme. Melba appeared, singing in this city for the first time in three years. She has lost none of her matchless art in that time, and she seemed in excellent vocal condition yesterday, so that the tones were round and pure and golden as of yore, with only the most occasional suspicion of breathiness or of wear in the highest register. Certainly Mme. Melba has never sung the air from Hamlet here with more admirable mastery than she displayed yesterday afternoon. There were again the opportunites to revel in her perfect scales, the finish of her phrasing and her French diction, and there was also the surprising discovery of what a great artist could do with or make of Thomas' old-fashioned, artificial air.

This was, indeed, an inspiring lesson, and it was more remarkable than the singing of Mozart's adorable music, because there one was prepared for an exhibition of even purer art.

Yet how many treat this music without rubbing the dramatic fineness and the immortal beauty from it, and leaving a succession of harmless phrases? Great was Mme. Melba's triumph yesterday afternoon, and the pleasure to the hearer was enhanced by her quiet repose of manner and the unostentation of her attire. Needless to say, she was called back times without number.

Fritz Delius' "Brigg Fair, an English Rhapsody," was the novelty of this concert, and the second piece by that composer to be heard in this city. It may be said at once that it was far more readily assimilated than the nocturne, "Paris," heard last season. Delius has written as a poet in tender memory of other times. His text, printed in the score, is the folk song, "Brigg Fair," which speaks of the fair, the dancing on the green, the right girl, eternal affection, in the merry old times.

There are recurring passages which suggest that the composer wrote not only a free orchestral rhapsody, but with thought of each verse of the old song. The use of the tubular bells with the rest of the big modern orchestra lent additional suggestion and color to the climax which occurs a little before the poetic end. There were places which sounded doubtful, a little forced, a little sour, but the piece as a whole made a very favorable impression. Weber's "Freischutz" overture brought the concert to conclusion.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1910.

MELBA SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Yesterday's Symphony might almost be called an operatic concert, for the programme included an opera overture, the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," and two opera arias, recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and aria, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Ophelia's mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet," sung by Mme. Melba. The symphony of the afternoon was the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5. Delius' "Brigg Fair, an English Rhapsody" was placed between the two arias sung by Mme. Melba.

Melba Draws Big House.

A packed hall testified Mme. Melba's presence on the programme some moments before the concert opened, and at the closing of the mad scene she received a great ovation. Her singing of the recitative of the "Dove Sono" aria was not especially distinguished, being very dry and throaty in places and not carrying distinction of meaning and utterance; but in the aria itself she was far superior. This is the finest aria of "The Marriage of Figaro," but taken from its setting it has little that is remarkable, even in so skilful handling as Mme. Melba can give it. Her voice at times in this was of disappointing quality; but in the mad scene she sang with all her marvelous technique and vocalization.

Her mastery of her art here was indisputable at every point, and the tonal quality of her voice was full of florid, liquid beauties, and all her interpretation has broadened wonderfully. She has passed and surpassed the idea of aria singing of her earlier days in opera, and she gave to yesterday's arias a deeper, much more satisfying rendering than has characterized them in former times; they had substance as well as marvelous execution. Something of the wonder has gone out of her top notes, but the low register has grown in fullness and power of expression. She sang with delicate pathos the bits of the "flower song" that come in the score of this aria. One cannot help concurring with all the London critics that Hamlet's "To be or not to be" was not made to be said in French and much less sung in it; but the Ophelia songs suffer less from this extraordinary transit than do any other portions of the play, and the Thomas music here could not offend even the most loyal Shakesperean, for some of the original scene itself is sung.

The new number, the Delius "Briggs' Fair," is pretty illustrative and pictorial. The oboes and horns announce the different figures and the flutes ornament them with flowery tracery. The strings are seldom independent, catching most of their inspiration from the wood-winds; but they nevertheless carry to ultimate conclusion most of the airs introduced. But although of the pictorial nature, and a rhapsody, the work does not compare in effectiveness and coloring with a Debussy or a Strauss picture. It is painted in surface colors, a lack of foundation color and background takes away from the depth; one cannot pause and look into the picture and revel in the deeps and shades of it.

The Weber overture, which carries a bit of every aria in the opera "Der Freischutz" and is so full of airs that are almost household companions, made a pleasingly intimate close to the programme.

HUNTING CAMP ELECTS.

The annual election of officers of Leslie F. Hunting camp, United Spanish War Veterans, held last night at the City building, Central square, resulted as follows: George J. Costigan, commander; William J. Hagan, senior vice-commander; George W. Cole, junior vice-commander; Hugh McGuiness, officer of the day; C. J. Linehan, officer of the guard; G. W. Watson, chaplain; Dr. John O'Donoghue, surgeon; George W. Cole, trustee for three years; Jeremiah F. Downey, delegate to the department convention.

Swirl of Beauty.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony was a fitting opening to a programme of the character of yesterday's, for it has

RECORD, FRIDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1910

Symphony and Cecilia Produce Omar Khayyam

(From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser).

Last night an important wedding took place. The Boston Symphony orchestra married the Cecilia society. The union marks an epoch in Boston music, for great performances will probably result from the union. In spite of all its excellent work in the past, under well-equipped conductors, such as Mr. Lang and Mr. Goodrich, the Cecilia has been languishing in recent seasons. Its concerts had many empty seats even when most interesting works were given. Now all this will be changed. The orchestra needed a good chorus as an auxiliary, and the Cecilia required the prestige of the orchestra. Therefore we may regard this as a love-match and believe that the contracting parties will live happily ever after. The audience last night was of good augury, larger and more alert than has recently been the case with Cecilia concerts.

Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" received its first Boston performance at this concert. Music in England is advancing rapidly. Not so long ago Bridge, Mackenzie and the hard-boiled-egg brigade of contrapuntists led everything, and Sullivan and possibly Cowen were the only drops of dew in the British musical desert. When Elgar came he seemed so advanced, by comparison, that he was hailed as the greatest phenomenon that had appeared in England since Purcell. But Elgar is not quite fulfilling his promise, while rivals and superiors are springing up all over the field which was once so barren. Delius, Coleridge-Taylor, German and, above all, Bantock, have pushed English music far from the ruts in which it lay twenty-five years ago, and two of these have possibly passed even Sir Edward Elgar.

"Omar Khayyam," of which the first part only was given last night, is, in the first place an excellent poem for musical treatment. Our art lends itself well to such a gospel of epicureanism. But there is much more than epicureanism in "Omar Khayyam." There is a keen protest of the mind, that does not accept the creeds, against the meaningless character of life, its whence and whither.

The orchestral score is a large one. It calls for three flutes, a piccolo, three oboes, an English horn, three clarinettes, a bass clarinette, three bassoons, a contrabassoon, six horns, three trumpets, three trombones, a bass tuba, kettle-drums, bassdrum, side drum, cymbals, triangle, tambourine, gong, glockenspiel, harps and organ. There were last night 100 in the orchestra and 150 in the chorus. There were three soloists. Miss Margaret Keyes was the Beloved, Mr. Geo. Harris jr. the Poet, and Mr. Robert Maitland, the Philosopher.

Many special orchestral effects are given to the string orchestras, for there are two of these in the score. This unusual division makes it possible to give many antiphonal effects, to combine muted and unmuted strings, to lessen or strengthen the dynamic force very easily, and the remarkable string effects were among the striking points of the performance last night. Mr. Fiedler, our symphony director, is now director of the Cecilia, and his work last night was commendable in his new field.

All in all then last night was an epoch night in Boston's musical annals, for it inaugurated a practically new society which ought to have a great influence upon our future musical seasons, and it presented a work which, although unequal, is the most dramatic composition that has yet come from England.

POST, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1910

MELBA SINGS WITH SYMPHONY

Hundreds Unable to Get In at Eighth Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

Nellie Melba was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the eighth public rehearsal of the season. The audience, with the audience which greeted Miss Farrar a few weeks ago, made the two record gatherings of the season. This is not meant for a description of the crowd within the building, for Symphony Hall seats 2500 and no more. It applies to the number who were turned away without seats. Those who occupied the seats in the second balcony had begun to appear on the steps outside before 8 a. m., and a number more than equalling the capacity of that balcony were turned away.

Among the compositions toward which Mr. Fiedler seems to have a particular leaning is Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, which commenced the concert. The performance yesterday was if anything, and especially in the last movement, more remarkable than that which brought the conductor such acclaim last season. Tschaikowsky was always the man first, and the artist afterwards. The symphony is a pulsing human document. The composer did not linger over long in selecting the material for his musical structures. His interpolation of a world-weary waltz has always offended certain purists, and this movement is perhaps the least of the four. But Tschaikowsky never sat on a perch to set an example. He said: "This is what I have, what I am. It is yours if you want it."

Of course, there were many present yesterday with no knowledge of music as an art, but there was certainly no one who failed to understand the proclaiming brass and the thundering drums. Mr. Fiedler was in the right mood. He took the first part at a slightly slower pace, if memory serves, than he did last season, and thereby increased its significance. At the last he taxed the virtuosity of the orchestra to the utmost and achieved thrilling results. He was recalled with the greatest enthusiasm.

Mme. Melba appeared, singing in this city for the first time in three years. She has lost none of her matchless art in that time, and she seemed in excellent vocal condition yesterday, so that the tones were round and pure and golden as of yore, with only the most occasional suspicion of breathiness or of wear in the highest register. Certainly Mme. Melba has never sung the air from Hamlet here with more admirable mastery than she displayed yesterday afternoon. There were again the opportunites to revel in her perfect scales, the finish of her phrasing and her French diction, and there was also the surprising discovery of what a great artist could do with or make of Thomas' old-fashioned, artificial air.

This was, indeed, an inspiring lesson, and it was more remarkable than the singing of Mozart's adorable music, because there one was prepared for an exhibition of even purer art.

Yet how many treat this music without rubbing the dramatic fineness and the immortal beauty from it, and leaving a succession of harmless phrases? Great was Mme. Melba's triumph yesterday afternoon, and the pleasure to the hearer was enhanced by her quiet repose of manner and the unostentation of her attire. Needless to say, she was called back times without number.

Fritz Delius' "Brigg Fair, an English Rhapsody," was the novelty of this concert, and the second piece by that composer to be heard in this city. It may be said at once that it was far more readily assimilated than the nocturne, "Paris," heard last season. Delius has written as a poet in tender memory of other times. His text, printed in the score, is the folk song, "Brigg Fair," which speaks of the fair, the dancing on the green, the right girl, eternal affection, in the merry old times.

There are recurring passages which suggest that the composer wrote not only a free orchestral rhapsody, but with thought of each verse of the old song. The use of the tubular bells with the rest of the big modern orchestra lent additional suggestion and color to the climax which occurs a little before the poetic end. There were places which sounded doubtful, a little forced, a little sour, but the piece as a whole made a very favorable impression. Weber's "Freischutz" overture brought the concert to conclusion.

GLOBE—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1910.

MME MELBA AT THE SYMPHONY

Diva Wins Long Series of Recalls.

Heard in Aria From Mozart and in Ophelia's "Mad Scene."

"Brigg Fair" Performed Here First Time.

Mme Melba was the soloist at the eighth Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon. She sang a recitative and aria of the countess, from act 3, scene 8, of Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," and Ophelia's Mad Scene from Thomas' "Hamlet."

The orchestra played Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony (E minor), Delius' "Brigg Fair, an English Rhapsody," first time in Boston, and to close, the "Der Freischutz" overture.

There was an unusually large audience, doubtless due to the appearance of Mme Melba. Her aria from Mozart revealed the same virginal purity of tone and the same level lines of phrasing which have characterized her singing. It was the utterance of a voice beautiful by nature, preserved to marvelous freshness, but untroubled by any exacting plan of nuance.

In the Ophelia aria, however, her hearers were not disappointed.

Save for an inflection and a bit of color here and there, Mme Melba did not attempt to inspire pathos for the delirious speech of a whirling brain.

She sang the florid passages brilliantly, and this was enough to cause delight and a long series of recalls. Her treatment of staccato notes was peculiar, but there was a limpidity, a smoothness, a precision and ease of emission even with rapid passages, and withal an enforced tone, at times luscious in its beauty. Boston has not heard recently such a trill. Where is there one to stand beside her?

Those who expect to be reminded by the folk song, accompanying Delius' new piece, of the clumsy capers of rustic bumpkins in their clowning, their rude merrymaking, will face disappointment. There is no hesitancy in saying that "Brigg Fair" does not have the picturesque, bizarre effects, the unescapable tang of impressionism which were not to be evaded in his night piece, "Paris," heard here last year.

This man has spurned the usual and the routine. He has burrowed for his own idiom, and he speaks not as other men, but he knows his orchestra.

There is a plan in the varying pattern through which he has woven the old tune, the folk song. It does not bubble over or chortle with bucolic exuberance, but it breathes a plaint, as though in regret for the passing of the old county fair, the type known in Coventry since the Restoration and before.

Tschaikowsky's 5th symphony breathes a lofty, an elegiac melancholy. The opening measures in the noble chalumeau register of the clarinet—yesterday sympathetically played by Mr Grisez—possess a grave yet tender beauty. The development of the movement retains this mood.

The song for the horn in the third movement breathes rare repose and tranquillity. Yesterday its playing left something to be desired. The introduction of a waltz, to replace the scherzo, is not to be wholly admired.

The consummation comes with the triumph of the last movement. When read with authority, without mere compulsion, it has strength, ruggedness of outline and a certain heroic grandeur. The performance of it yesterday was ragged and precipitate. It was unworthy of the orchestra and these con-

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

NATIONAL MAGAZINE

om .....

dress .....

te ..... DEC - 1910

Anton Witek, who succeeds Willy Hess this season as concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was born at Saaz, Bohemia, January 7, 1872. He studied at Prague. In 1894 he was appointed concert-master of the Philharmonic orchestra of Berlin, which position he held until the present year. Mr. Witek has organized a trio in Boston. The 'cellist is Alwyn Schroeder, who, after an interim of seven years, resumes the first chair of the 'cellos in the Boston Symphony. The pianist is Kurt Fischer, who came this season to the faculty of the New England Conservatory, Boston, from the Royal Conservatory at Sonderhausen.

Mr. Witek made his first appearance as a soloist in this country at the fourth public rehearsal and concert of the Boston Symphony, October 28 and 29. He played the Beethoven concerto. Mr. Philip Hale said: "Mr. Witek gave an uncommonly fine performance of Beethoven's concerto. He played with serene, not indifferent composure, with respect for Beethoven and the audience."

Francis Macmillen, the American violinist, played at the symphony concerts in Boston for the first time October 14 and 15. The other soloists to appear are as follows: singers, Mme. Melba, Geraldine Farrar, Emmy Destinn, Mme. Jomelli, Mme. Kirby-Lunn; pianists, Josef Hofmann, Carlo Buonamici, Ferruccio Busoni; violinists, Mischa Elman and Sylvain Noack, and 'cellist, Heinrich Warnke. Mr. Warnke shares with Mr. Schroeder the first desk of the 'cellos in the orchestra. Mr. Noack is second concert-master.

The orchestra will make the usual five monthly tours to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and in January will give concerts in Pittsburg, Toledo, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Syracuse and Troy.

RECORD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1910

Mr. Fiedler at the ninth rehearsal and concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will repeat Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" which was heard here two weeks ago. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play the Rubinstein Concerto in D minor No. 4. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7 in A major and the final number on the programme will be the "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1910.

MELBA SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Yesterday's Symphony might almost be called an operatic concert, for the programme included an opera overture, the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz," and two opera arias, recitative, "E Susanna non vien?" and aria, "Dove Sono," from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and Ophelia's mad scene from Thomas' "Hamlet," sung by Mme. Melba. The symphony of the afternoon was the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 5. Delius' "Brigg Fair, an English Rhapsody" was placed between the two arias sung by Mme. Melba.

Melba Draws Big House.

A packed hall testified Mme. Melba's presence on the programme some moments before the concert opened, and at the closing of the mad scene she received a great ovation. Her singing of the recitative of the "Dove Sono" aria was not especially distinguished, being very dry and throaty in places and not carrying distinction of meaning and utterance; but in the aria itself she was far superior. This is the finest aria of "The Marriage of Figaro," but taken from its setting it has little that is remarkable, even in so skilful handling as Mme. Melba can give it. Her voice at times in this was of disappointing quality; but in the mad scene she sang with all her marvelous technique and vocalization.

Her mastery of her art here was indisputable at every point, and the tonal quality of her voice was full of florid, liquid beauties, and all her interpretation has broadened wonderfully. She has passed and surpassed the idea of aria singing of her earlier days in opera, and she gave to yesterday's arias a deeper, much more satisfying rendering than has characterized them in former times; they had substance as well as marvelous execution. Something of the wonder has gone out of her top notes, but the low register has grown in fullness and power of expression. She sang with delicate pathos the bits of the "flower song" that come in the score of this aria. One cannot help concurring with all the London critics that Hamlet's "To be or not to be" was not made to be said in French and much less sung in it; but the Ophelia songs suffer less from this extraordinary transit than do any other portions of the play, and the Thomas music here could not offend even the most loyal Shakesperean, for some of the original scene itself is sung.

many dramatic moments, and throughout, although made up of many airs, some of them Russian folk-songs, yet they are all so closely knit to each other than that they form a connected story, almost with a plot, it might be said. At least they are arranged in dramatic sequence. Despite the melancholy strain running through them, even in the waltz movement, they form a kind of daisy chain, one pretty flower after another strung on a silken cord. The final movement gathers up the entire chain in a swirl of beauty and tosses it in the air, and one sees a thing of many parts, but a perfect composite.

The new number, the Delius "Briggs' Fair," is pretty illustrative and pictorial. The oboes and horns announce the different figures and the flutes ornament them with flowery tracery. The strings are seldom independent, catching most of their inspiration from the wood-winds; but they nevertheless carry to ultimate conclusion most of the airs introduced. But although of the pictorial nature, and a rhapsody, the work does not compare in effectiveness and coloring with a Debussy or a Strauss picture. It is painted in surface colors, a lack of foundation color and background takes away from the depth; one cannot pause and look into the picture and revel in the deeps and shades of it.

The Weber overture, which carries a bit of every aria in the opera "Der Freischutz" and is so full of airs that are almost household companions, made a pleasingly intimate close to the programme.

HUNTING CAMP ELECTS.

The annual election of officers of Leslie F. Hunting camp, United Spanish War Veterans, held last night at the City building, Central square, resulted as follows: George J. Costigan, commander; William J. Hagan, senior vice-commander; George W. Cole, junior vice-commander; Hugh McGuiness, officer of the day; C. J. Linehan, officer of the guard; G. W. Watson, chaplain; Dr. John O'Donoghue, surgeon; George W. Cole, trustee for three years; Jeremiah F. Downey, delegate to the department convention.

Swirl of Beauty.

The Tschaikowsky Symphony was a fitting opening to a programme of the character of yesterday's, for it has [111]

MELBA SINGS PART OF MAD OPHELIA

Soloist at the Eighth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

AIR BY MOZART ALSO GIVEN

Delius's "Brigg Fair," an English Rhapsody, Is Played for the First Time.

By PHILIP HALE.

The eighth Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Melba was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, E minor....Tschaikowsky
Recitative and aria "Dove Sono" from "LeNozze di Figaro".....Mozart
"Brigg Fair: an English Rhapsody"..Delius
Ophelia's Mad Scene from "Hamlet"....Thomas
Overture to "Der Freischuetz".....Weber

"Brigg Fair," by Delius, was played for the first time in Boston. A folksong with the same title is printed on a flyleaf of the score. The song is "old and plain," and perhaps "the spinsters and the knitters in the sun" and the free maids did use to chant it. The chief theme of the rhapsody is probably the tune of the old song, though Delius does not state this, and I have been unable to find either the ballad or the tune in collections of English folksongs. The hero of the ballad is represented as repairing to Brigg Fair, there to meet his dear. He spied his own true love, took hold of her hand and swore to be true to her.

For it's meeting is a pleasure,
And parting is a grief,
But an unconstant lover
Is worse than a thief.

It is not easy to find in the music of Delius any determined program. There is free pastoral preluding; the chief theme is given at first to the oboe, a pastoral instrument. This tune is presented in many ways, and there are lesser motives. The prevailing mood is reflective or sombre. There is no downright jollity, as might be expected from the title. The chief theme, though it is announced in a sprightly tempo, has the tinge of sadness that characterizes so many folk-tunes even when the words are rollicking. Or did Delius, as Sibelius and certain other composers, invent his chief theme after the manner of a folksong?

The music of "Brigg Fair" as that of "Paris" by the same composer, which was played here last season, has little profile and little euphonic charm. The composer stands aloof. He has his own thoughts and his own manner of expression. They cannot justly be characterized as dry or dull. On the contrary, the hearer feels as though he should like to break through the composer's shell and become acquainted with him.

The composer makes no personal revelation. He does not scream his joy and sorrow; he is not frank; he is impersonal. He is apparently of no school. He writes as though Richard Strauss had never existed, as though there were no ultra-modern Frenchmen. He is said to be enthusiastic over Wagner; but there are few if any traces of Wagner's influence in this music. I suspect Delius of admiration for Brahms; but the Yorkshireman has not caught the secret of Brahms' architectural skill.

The instrumentation of Delius is peculiarly [illegible]wn. It has no immediately attractive qualities. It is not gorgeous, it is not cleverly discreet; it is not sensuous, nor is it massively sonorous. At times it seems as though the composer chose deliberately expression in dialect. It would be unfair to charge him with acidity, yet his thoughts and his language have little that is genial and kindly, almost nothing that can be called emotional. Delius writes as though he were a solitary, not necessarily inimical toward men and women, but willing to live apart from them, a philosophical analyst of dead sentiments.

When all this is said, the music provokes curiosity to know more about the man himself and his purposes and methods as an artist; for Delius is by no means a weakling, and he writes as though he could afford to wait for the avenger Time.

They say there is a secret history to Tschaikowsky's symphony in E minor; that the composer wrote the symphony when he was in a peculiar state of mind. We know from his diary and his letters that he was always in "a state of mind." Deeply depressed during the process of composition, he was sure of failure. After the work was completed he said that it was good. In his more important music he took the world into his confidence; he poured out his complaints, his longings, his despair to any man in the concert hall.

Such revelations are always interesting when there is no doubt of the sincerity. There is more drama in the fifth symphony than in three-fourths of the operas, and Mr. Fiedler gave a dramatic reading. The Finale had never been played here before with the appropriate wildness, and never before had this Finale seemed so elemental and impressive.

It was a great pleasure to hear Mme. Melba again. There is no voice like unto her voice with its peculiar quality of childlike freshness and simplicity, its incomparable, golden, haunting timbre. With what exquisite tonal quality and flawless art she sang the ballad in Ophelia's scene! How deft her delivery of the Countess's recitative! How pure was Mozart's melodic line! There were times when there were traces of a cold from which she was suffering, but these were few. She sang with the gracious dignity that has always characterized her in the presence of an audience, and the audience of yesterday was enthusiastic in recognition and appreciation.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of those of Dec. 16-17 will be as follows: Beethoven, symphony in A, major, No. 7; Rubinstein, concerto in D minor, No. 4, for piano (Josef Hofmann, pianist); Debussy, "Rondes de Printemps" (repeated by request); Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

MONITOR, BOSTON, DECEMBER 3, 1910.

A piece of orchestral music new to Boston was played at the Symphony rehearsal of Friday afternoon, the "Brigg Fair" rhapsody of Frederick Delius.

An aria was sung by Mme. Melba; in fact two arias were performed by the distinguished soprano, but only one was of much significanee, as interpretation went, and that was the scene in which Ambroise Thomas' Ophelia imitates, paraphrases, improves on—say it any way you like— the coloratura vagaries of "Lucia di Lammermoor."

There was a symphony rehearsed and in some parts noteworthily interpreted, the Tschaikowsky Fifth in E minor, an evident favorite of Mr. Fiedler.

If you were there, which did you like best, the rhapsody, the mad scene or the symphony? You may have found in the case of all three that remarkably good things and remarkably ineffective things were strangely combined. Great unevenness of inspiration in the music, you would say; and have you ever known the straightforward Max Fiedler to bother himself much trying to gloze over the defects of his composers?

The rhapsody was perhaps the best performed of anything on the program. New music is never slighted by Mr. Fiedler. An old repertory symphony must take the neglect when Cecilia concerts or other long engagements eat into practise time. There were happy strokes of tone coloring in the "Brigg Fair" picture where Mr. Delius combines bells with loud brass. Nobody but a skilful handler of tone and a fearless one could have written the crescendo passage in which the three tubes of low bell pitch sound from soft to loud at one side of the orchestra and the trumpets and allied brass sound simultaneously at the other, with the clang of both kinds of instruments in perfect blend.

None of us deny that we like soloists at Symphony concerts. What an affectation to say that we had rather have a Tschaikowsky symphony and a Delius tone poem without an air by Mme. Melba to vary things than with it! It frequently happens, though, if you will observe carefully, that those of us who like soloists the best and will go the farthest to hear them are the severest in judging them. The solo enthusiasts on Friday quickly sensed the lack of emotional warm and executive brilliancy in Mme. Melba's singing of the countess' aria from "Figaro." They will sometimes applaud undistinguished work, but they will not applaud when they are disappointed in their artist.

Melba's singing of the "Hamlet" aria was more praiseworthy by far. And let nobody say that an effect is easier to gain with this scene of the French composer than with that of the classic Mozart. If the effort was good, let it pass as good and do not qualify it. There was feeling in Mme. Melba's singing of the aria. There was the style of a great executant. There was emotional command in the closing strains which no audience, however difficult of conquest because of previous disappointment, could resist.

Program of the eighth Symphony concert: Tschaikowsky, symphony no. 5 in E minor; Mozart. "Dove Sono" from "Marriage of Figaro"; Delius, "Brigg Fair" rhapsody; Thomas, "A vos jeux," from "Hamlet"; Weber, overture to "Freischutz"; soloist, Mme. Melba.

Melba Scores Triumph at Symphony Concert

From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser.

The ancient Romans went wild over the Gaditanian singers; in the 16th century the youth, Di Lasso, was kidnapped on account of his voice; in Handel's time there were duels regarding the merits of the soprani Cuzzoni and Faustina; ladies used to faint with emotion when Farinelli sang; in all ages a great voice will outweigh a famous orchestra. Therefore we placidly accept the fact that on this occasion the tail wagged the dog, the vocal adjunct excited the public more than a great symphony and an extremely curious orchestral rhapsody; the singer it was that caused a line of expectant ticket-buyers a quarter of a mile long.

Nevertheless we will venture to speak first about the symphonic and orchestral works. The fifth symphony of Tschaikowsky has been too long overshadowed by the very popular sixth—the "Pathetic." It is as characteristic as any work in the modern symphonic repertoire. It is at times savagely Russian and nothing of this savagery is lost in the interpretation by Mr. Fiedler. Bassoons, trumpets and horns deserve especial mention for good work done yesterday afternoon in this symphony. The entire wood-wind has much growling to do "a la Russe" in its lower register, especially in the first movement. The finale was brilliant in the extreme.

We had a pungent taste of Delius last season when the orchestra gave a compound of Absinthe and dissonances entitled "Paris." Delius is not entirely British, for he had German parents. But he passed his boyhood in England and that was sufficient to tinge him with such subjects as the love-ballad about "Brigg Fair," and he has founded his work on an old English melody. He uses a large orchestra in his balladizing, even bells being used in the score, and very well used too. The old Folk-song on which "Brigg Fair" is built is Germanized about as much as Strauss Germanized the Neapolitan "Funicoli-Funicola" in his "Italy."

Although the work is for a very large orchestra it is not very aggressively modern, not nearly so much so as "Paris" with its fragments of bacchanalian revelry.

It has enough beautiful moments to cause it to be classed as an important work. It did not win a great success with the audience, but was rather coolly received; yet we think that it will hold its place in the repertoire of noteworthy modern English works.

Mme Melba fairly defies the tooth of time. Her voice is fully as good as it was ten or fifteen years ago. The contrasted recitative, "bel Canto," dramatic and expressive singing, which are combined in the Mozart scena, would test any artist and no singer can be absolutely equal in these diverse styles. We find Mme. Melba less potent in the dramatic and declamatory touches of the recitatives than in the smooth and tender legato effects of "Dove Sono." The sweet quality of Mme. Melba's voice is as much a delight as ever and one does not need to use any "ifs" or "buts" in chronicling her triumph of yesterday.

MME. MELBA,
Whose singing at the Symphony concert was a triumph.

The "Mad-scene" from "Hamlet" had also a beautiful display of "bel Canto" in its folk-song (a Swedish melody) which is imbedded in it, but it presented much more "coloratura" (which may be translated vocal fireworks) than the Mozart number. The public always rise to a response to evident vocal difficulties bravely overcome and there was reason for the final enthusiasm after this number. The rule regarding encores, however, was enforced.

In the "coloratura" of the "Hamlet" scene there was once or twice a sign of effort, but these were but spots on the sun, the general brilliancy of it all swept everything before it. Ophelia is but one of the many crazy heroines of opera. Linda di Chamounix, Dinorah, and Lucia, all go to prove that the madder operatic heroines get, the better they sing.

At the end of this mad-scene there was the most determined and ill-judged attempt at an encore that we have ever seen at the Symphony Concerts. The conductor stood waiting to begin the overture, the singer did not reappear after some half-dozen recalls, but some members of the ancient and honorable order of encore-fiends kept up their applause several minutes, to the annoyance of everybody.

Possibly there might have been danger in an encore. If the singer had responded with a ballad by Hatton, for example, it might have reopened all the head-gear war. Even as it was Mme. Melba taunted the hatless ones by wearing a top-piece of very large dimensions and no audacious usher dared to insist upon her taking it off.

The Symphony Orchestra is leaving town tomorrow night on its second Southern trip, giving the usual concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and visiting, on Monday night, Dec. 12, New Haven, where it will give a concert for the first time in six years. Josef Hofmann is to be the soloist at all these concerts as he is to be the soloist at the Symphony concerts in Boston on Dec. 16 and 17.

HOFMANN AS SOLOIST

Mr. Fiedler, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will repeat Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," which was heard at the Symphony concerts two weeks ago. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play the Rubinstein concerto in D Minor No. 4. Hofmann studied with Rubinstein. The symphony will be Beethoven's seventh, and the final number will be the "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner.

[112]

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Quarter Century of Kneisel Concerts.

Repertory for the Fifth Week of Boston Grand Opera.

Flonzaley Quartet—Kocian and Others in Recitals.

The 28th of this month will mark the close of the 25th year since the founding of the Kneisel quartet. There were musical and festive even s in this city and New York last yea at this time to celebrate this anniversary.

Now, at the completion of the 25 years, friends of Mr Kneisel and his associates have suggested that a banquet be tendered him to commemorate the organization of his quartet, and to pay a tribute to the service he has rendered the advancement of good music in this country.

Twenty-five years ago, on Monday evening, Dec 28, at the old Chickering hall on Tremont st, the Kneisel quartet gave its first concert.

Mr Kneisel's colleagues were Emanuel Fiedler, second violin, until this present season, a member of the Symphony orchestra; Louis Svecenski, viola, and Fritz Giese, 'cello.

The program upon that occasion included a Volkmann quartet, the canzonetta from a Mendelssohn quartet, the minuet from a Mozart quartet and the Beethoven C major quintet, Daniel Kuntz second viola.

While Mr Kneisel and Mr Svecenski have retained their membership uninterruptedly throughout the 25 years, there have been changes from time to time in the occupants of the other two chairs.

Otto Roth became the second violin in 1887, remaining until 1899. Karl Ondricek served until 1902, when J. Theodorowicz followed, until the present member, Julius Roentgen succeeded him in 1907.

In 1889 Anton Hekking became 'cellist. Alwin Schroeder played from 1891 until he moved to Frankfort to teach in the Hochschule there and was succeeded by Willen Willeke, one of the most admirable ensemble players upon this instrument.

Mr Kneisel has been rewarded for his labors as a pioneer in chamber music by the sure growth in public appreciation for it. He had to build his constituency, both here and in New York. In doing so he was catholic in his taste but uncompromising in his insistence upon works of musical value.

He was not without inducements which would have drawn him away into orchestral fields. In the spring of 1907 he received an offer from the Philadelphia orchestra to become its conductor as a salary of $12,000 for a season of 22 weeks, but he refused to be diverted from the cause of chamber music.

The second concert of the present season by the Kneisel quartet will occur next Tuesday evening. The program will include two novelties, the E-flat quartet by Max Reger and the D-minor (op. 7) quartet, by Tanieev, his third. It is dedicated to Mr Rachmaninoff. Cherubini's quartet in D minor will represent the classics.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1910

Delius and His Music

The Composer That Seeks Expression Yet Seems Often Expressionless

By an unfailing sign Delius has already attained note. To write of or to speak of him as "Mr." Delius would be as absurd as to do likewise of "Mr." Debussy or "Dr." Strauss or "Dr." Reger. None but English pedant-snobs, or here and there a German, with an overwhelming sense of academic obligation, "monsieurs" Debussy or "doctors" Reger and Strauss. To be called by a last name, "tout court," is one of the artist's rewards, whatever his chosen medium. By the same token, indeed, Delius, artistically, was born unique. Certainly he was not "Mr." Delius when Mr. Beecham was making his music known to London a few years ago. Perhaps he was not even "Herr" Delius in the earlier days wherein two or three devoted conductors in Germany would have their recalcitrant audiences discover and admire him. Here in America—or, rather, here in Boston, since hardly elsewhere in the United States is his music known—he has been Delius from the first. The bare name is beginning to sound familiar; yet the audiences at the Symphony Concerts have heard only two of his pieces—the Nocturne, "Paris," played a year ago last November, and the Rhapsody, "Brigg Fair," played last week. Last month Mr. Damrosch also hazarded "Brigg Fair" at one of his concerts in New York, and there as yet halts the record of performances of Delius's larger compositions in America. Our audiences ask for repetitions of novel, puzzling or admired pieces by Strauss and Debussy, by d'Indy and Rachmaninoff. They have not yet requested a repetition of "Paris" or of "Brigg Fair."

At least the conductors—much and often unjustly berated men!—have done Delius good service. But for them, from the nineties in Germany to this December of 1910, most of his music might be lying still in the portfolio in which he professes every willingness to keep it. He himself has not sat importunate upon conductors' doorsteps or despatched ingratiating emissaries to their studies. No publisher has made the performance of music by Delius a condition preliminary to the performance of the music of an established composer that was sure of favorable, or at least interested, reception. A German conductor almost lost his job because of his zeal to play pieces by Delius. In London, Mr. Beecham, in the opera house as well as in the concert-room, has been frankly propagandist for him; while Mr. Fiedler has adopted him in Boston. First came "Paris;" then "Brigg Fair," and next, at no interval of a year, will follow "Appalachia" and "In a Summer Garden." When Theodore Thomas was making Wagner's music-dramas known in America, he cared not whether his audiences applauded the chosen fragments. It was enough for him that they listened. We of the Symphony Concerts have listened to Delius; but it is doubtful whether even in the stupid seventies (as they now seem) the applause for an "excerpt" from Wagner was as scanty as that which answered both "Paris" and "Brigg Fair." If Mr. Fiedler has the faith in Delius that he professes, he ought to turn unsparing propagandist and make us, willy-nilly, hear both pieces again.

The conductor has the more reason to do so because the impression that the Nocturne and the Rhapsody both made upon the eagerest hearers was curiously obscure, confused, embarrassed. The matter and the manner of the music, its design and its detail, were equally hard to grasp. The listeners heard—and knew not what they heard. The reviewers, like Mr. Runciman, who foster Delius, even as do some of the conductors, gently intimate that he is hard to understand. To those that have heard "Paris" and "Brigg Fair," that have even read the scores and conned the apostolic articles, the intimation seems the pleasant humor of understatement. By title "Paris" was a "Night Piece;" by title it was also "The Song of a Great City." The imaginative hearer presumed tone-picturing and fancied that he caught suggestion of the mood of mystery that stirs when the beholder looks down from Montmartre at night upon the outstretched plain of Paris aglow with myriad lights and myriad secrets. Or he fancied that he felt the mood of restless excitement that the confused sounds of the city, revelling or tolling, rejoicing or sorrowing in the luminous darkness, stirred again in the beholder, as they floated inchoate upward to him. In Delius's music of them was the strange call, the mysterious power of Paris that once felt, few, when it comes anew, may resist. Or yet again, the listener fancied that in some of the wan and empty harmonies, he knew the mood that the sight of the still city, outspread and lifeless, provokes in the pale and disillusioning dawn. Yet it was quite as easy to believe that these were mere vagaries of the imagination trying to run head and head with the music or mere fungi that subsequent reflection had fastened and fostered upon it.

"Brigg Fair" the other day was as puzzling. No doubt the ballad that suggested the music has its place in English folklore, but even the most learned and diligent of "programmists" could not track it to its lair. Like the rest of us, he had to be content with the six stanzas that Delius reprints on an introductory page—simple, wistful verses beginning in gentle joy over lovers' meetings and ending in gentle pledging of lovers' faiths. The rhapsodist—since Delius calls the piece an "English Rhapsody"—proceeds presumably to rhapsodize, but it is hard to follow the course of his moods. They are changeful: now gay, now melancholy, as verse and music alike bid us infer; but again they are almost dirge-like, and yet again they swell solemnly. Behold how great—and inexplicable—a matter a little fire kindleth. So far as the emotional, delineative and suggestive intent of music goes, Strauss is explicit beside Delius; d'Indy is luminous; and Debussy vivid. Does Delius count obscurity a virtue? Does he presume upon a mental comprehension and an imaginative response in his hearers that his music does not yet awake? Or are we that hear and believe ourselves perplexed and gropers merely dull and unaccustomed? Some [illegible] were so with the music of Wagner; some of ourselves are so with the music of Debussy.

The music, as music, both in "Paris" and "Brigg Fair" leaves the hearer equally confused and embarrassed. For either piece Delius enlists a full orchestra, as it has now come to be, and he is specific over the number of the several choirs. Yet he is no such searcher into instrumental timbres as is Strauss, or even Debussy; no such experimenter with them; less capable than either of merely effective or highly imaginative strokes of color. His harmonic backgrounds, his progressions, his modulations are of himself and none other. He has not deduced them from Wagner; he cares little for the ways of Strauss; he might never have heard music by Debussy or d'Indy. The prophets of the whole-tone scale may not claim him; no more may the revellers in chromatics. Seemingly he has gone his own way as a man who would first devise and compass his own musical idiom for the ear of his own imagination and then make it do his expressive will. On this score, an analogy, if it be not pressed too far, may even hold between Moussorgski and Delius. The Russian was indeed comparatively unlearned in his art beside the more instructed Englishman; but each would write a music of his own uninfluenced by any other, in defiance, almost, of every other. They heard each his own voice and not the voices of the schools, the giants, or even of the fashions.

Seemingly Delius has meditated long upon his music, written it laboriously. The usual fruit of such a process is selection and rejection, and both are clear in "Paris" and in "Brigg Fair." Most music, even of the masters, has its transitional passages that are mere filling, its pauses for new breath, so to say, in formal commonplace. Delius takes no such cover; he will have none of the easily songful cantilena, of the obviously piquant rhythm. Every measure in these two pieces seems deliberately willed into its place in the score. More: each measure is as full of matter as the composer can pack it. To glance across and down a page of "Paris" is to wonder at the number of notes engraved there. To scrutinize them closely is to receive an impression a little akin to that of the underside of a closely woven carpet. To the sensitive ear the music of "Paris" sounded packed, tight, a little inarticulate. "With easy movement" Delius admonishes conductor and orchestra in "Brigg Fair" but the music, in spite of their presumable obedience, did not flow. Again it was tight.

As the word goes nowadays, Delius is almost a formalist. Multiplied polyphony for its own sake as a feat he eschews; he shuns no less the mere juxtaposition of loosely linked phrases. He chooses the freer forms—the tone-poem and the rhapsody in particular—but his music as music has unmistakable body and cohesion. Perhaps he may even be accomplishing the feat that Strauss achieves signally in "Don Juan" and in "Death and Transfiguration"—the inseparable linking of the musical development with the delineative and poetic intent. It is hard to say because it is hard to know with Delius just what that intent may be. Moreover, Delius's themes are as susceptible as Strauss's to the reproach that they have no vivid and individual existence in themselves; that they are mere bases for development and manipulation. The censorious might say that he worries the chief theme of "Brigg Fair" fragment by fragment; but five minutes after the rhapsody was done, who could recall it, worried or unworried, amiable bit of folk-song though it purported to be? Paris contained a wan and mysterious song for the oboe that returned often, now plaintive, now almost bleached as it were. And it died from recollection as soon as it died in the orchestra.

In sum, by every sign that the music of Delius gives, as we in Boston have heard it in "Paris" and in "Brigg Fair," it seeks expression and suggestion in the imperative fashion of the hour. It is not self-contained; it does not exist for its own sake. There is a programme behind, though the composer may not publish it. Delius's music would be music of image, of the moods of a creating imagination specifically kindled, of implication, of color. Yet so much of "Paris" seemed to ear, mind and fancy strangely expressionless. So much of it was even blank. Again, with "Brigg Fair," how bare and gaunt, how dry and arbitrary much of it sounded! In both the music plainly moved, yet dull and unwonted imaginations refused to run with it. In both was obviously an unusual scale of instrumental colors, a novel scheme of timbres thoughtfully adjusted, like the "values" in painting, into a kind of middle grayness. In both were the voice of emotion and the finger of delineation, yet neither response nor image rose spontaneously in answer. The mind and the imagination of the listener remained queerly inarticulate, and the listener would not be human who did not forthwith assume that the composer had been inarticulate too.

Taine's theory that a man's particular and puzzling work in the arts may often be explained by the life that he lives and the environment which he selects or which Fate selects for him is rather out of the fashion. Yet it has its applicability to Delius and his music. He has elected these many years a relatively solitary life. He has given himself to isolated meditations and isolated labors. He has held firmly to his resolution that no elements but those of his own imagining, of his own accomplishing, shall enter into his music. Little by little, by dint of endless reflection, exclusion and invention, he has evolved a musical idiom, a musical manner of his own and refined upon them. His music does sound like that of no other composer. None but his is so closely packed and yet so gaunt. None uses a similar scale of subdued instrumental color, is so tightly harmonized; has quite the same movement, as of a thick full stream. Delius has fashioned his own musical speech. To his ear, mind and fancy, long engrossed, it bears the thoughts, moods, images and suggestions with which he would charge it. [illegible] dreams [illegible] it. In the absorption of the process, in the solitude that has fostered it, in the realization of the end—for "Paris" and "Brigg Fair" are both finely assured—he has forgotten that the ears of his hearers, and the minds and the fancies that he must reach through them, are not as his own. He has assumed the prepared ear, intellect, imagination, and ours are unprepared. He has forgotten his audience (without which a composer labors half in vain) in his zeal for his particular and isolated ideal. If we that hear must be disciplined to Delius, we may fairly ask in return that he also discipline himself to us.

News of the Day

LITTLE by little, Mr. Fiedler is establishing a custom at the Symphony Concerts that by the time he leaves the orchestra may have become a precedent. Mr. Gericke liked an overture for almost every concert; and usually he set it at the beginning of his programme. Dr. Muck was less regular with overtures; but when he did play them, they usually began the concert. Now, Mr. Fiedler studies his audiences more closely than did either Dr. Muck or Mr. Gericke. He quickly noted their tendency, especially on Friday afternoons, to drift away before the final piece. He tried the experiment of warmly expressive and dramatically played overtures to hold them, and from the first it has succeeded. From week to week and year to year he has shaped his programmes accordingly; the "brilliant overture," or some kindred piece, to end the concert has become almost rule and custom; and the symphony seems to have lost, for good and all, what was once its appointed place. Thus, the eight concerts of the current year have ended with Schumann's overture to "Genoveva," Weber's to "Oberon," Sibelius's Finlandia," Strube's "Puck," Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," the polonaise in Tschaikowsky's third Suite, Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" and Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz."

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY
DECEMBER 8, 1910

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

CHORAL MUSIC AND ITS FUTURE AGAIN

The Aftermath of the First Concert of the Allied Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra—A Lesson or Two for the Concerts to Come—Miss Thompson's and Mr. Sokoloff's Interesting Recital—"Mefistofele" Again at the Opera House—The Director and the Claque—Novel Casts for Next Week—Mme. Lipkowska in Chicago—The Arriving Humperdinck and the Departing Hammerstein

IT is an open secret that the results of the first concert of the Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra in alliance were not satisfactory to those concerned. The listeners a week ago, if they knew Mr. Bantock's "Omar" by reading, performance elsewhere or divining imagination, quickly discovered that neither orchestra nor choir was doing justice to the music and the design behind, and that the allied forces were by no means as one. As the concert proceeded it was clear, on the one hand, that the chorus was none too well prepared with the difficult music; and on the other that whatever Mr. Fiedler's cooler purpose may have been, in the actual heat of the performance, his orchestra absorbed him. He did not keep the balance true between the human and the instrumental voices; he did not give the chorus the care that he gave the orchestra. He was much in earnest as he always is; he was over-energetic as he is prone to be; but he was also unused to his united forces and plainly unconscious of the precise and solicitous leading that choruses hereabouts expect. Inevitably in the week that has passed since the concert miscarried, gossip has been plentiful over it. As some say, the conductor was disappointed in the progress that the choir had made with the music, when it was his turn to set the finishing touches to the performance. As others have it, in his absorption with the orchestra, he would not, and did not, give the chorus half a chance.

Now the way to repair these errors of commission and omission, the way to bring the allied orchestra and choir to the place that they should have in the music of the city, is not to recriminate over them. Mr. Fiedler has under his hand an orchestra of virtuosi of long standing and exceptional capacity. From the days of Mr. Gericke to his own, conductor after conductor has worked his men hard. Mr. Fiedler is very busy, endlessly preoccupied with his work. Perhaps it had not occurred to him that the Cecilia is a body of independent amateurs unaccustomed to such labors and to such drill as are the routine of the professional and laborious orchestra. Perhaps he assumed too much of the Cecilia. Then has the concert surely taught him that if he would bring it to his standards of unceasing diligence and tireless ardor, he must himself, if he can find the time, undertake more of its training. Per contra, the Cecilia has to learn in its turn that the standards he and the new alliance rightly exact require harder labor on its part than, maybe, has been its custom. No less rightly, however, it can and should insist that the conductor so adjust his forces and so lead his choir that the results of this toil may tell in the actual concert. They did not a week ago. They should in "The Children's Crusade" and "The Passion Music" that are to come.

H. T. P.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY
DECEMBER 10, 1910

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Hofmann with the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Witek in Chamber Music—Mr. von Wahrlich for a New Singer—The Sonata Recitals—A New Song Cycle

NEXT week is the last, until Christmas is past, wherein the public is presumed to pay heed to concerts. The givers of them are busy accordingly and between next Monday and next Saturday those that are so disposed may hear Mr. Witek, the new concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, and his wife, an esteemed pianist in Berlin, in music for the violin and the pianoforte; Mr. and Mrs. Mannes, and Miss Fletcher and Mr. Platt in sonatas for the same instruments; Mr. von Wahrlich for a new "interpretative" singer of songs; and the Boston Singing Club in a concert of choral pieces, old and new, in the lighter forms. On Tuesday, the Symphony Orchestra returns from its monthly journey, and on Friday and Saturday will resume its concerts here with Mr. Hofmann, the pianist, assisting it.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

WHEN the Symphony Orchestra has been journeying for ten days from Boston to Washington and back again with plentiful stops along the way, the conductor usually makes a programme of familiar pieces (that require no arduous rehearsal) for the concerts here of the ensuing Friday afternoon and Saturday night. Being in such circumstance, Mr. Fiedler has done so for next week, and the purely orchestral part of his programme traverses Beethoven's seventh symphony, Wagner's overture to his opera, "The Flying Dutchman," and Debussy's new "Rondes de Printemps," which deserve to be heard so soon again, since they are curious and baffling and since they require more lightly running and spirited performance than the Symphony Orchestra has yet given them. At the concerts of next week, Mr. Hofmann will play with the orchestra here for the first time in years, in the present ripeness of his powers, and in a concerto—that in D minor—by his master, Rubinstein. It invites the pupil's best powers.

In Cambridge, at the third of the Symphony Concerts in Sanders Theatre, on Thursday evening, Mr. Hofmann will also assist the orchestra, playing this time, Liszt's concerto in E flat. The purely orchestral numbers are Debussy's "Rondes" and Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" again, and Brahms's symphony in F.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY,
DECEMBER 10, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the ninth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Mr. Fiedler is to repeat the Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," which was played two weeks ago. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, and he will be heard in the Rubenstein Concerto in D minor No. 4. His interpretation of this work will be most interesting, for he was a pupil of Rubenstein and, we are told, is in some ways a replica of his great master. Hofmann played with the orchestra on its southern tour. The Symphony of next week's concerts will be Beethoven, Symphony in A major No. 7, Op. 92. The Wagner overture to the "Flying Dutchman" is the closing number.

THE CAMBRIDGE CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

On next Thursday evening, Dec. 15, the third Cambridge concert of the Boston Symphony will be given in Sanders' Theatre. Josef Hofmann will be the soloist and he will be heard in Liszt's Concerto for pianoforte in E flat major No. 1. The feature of the concert will be the Debussy "Rondes de Printemps," which aroused so much enthusiasm when played at the Boston concert of the Symphony two weeks ago. The Symphony will be Brahms' No. 3 in F major, and the final number will be Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman."

SUNDAY GLOBE—
—DECEMBER 11, 1910.

Josef Hofman This Week's Symphony Soloist.

Mr Fiedler, at the ninth rehearsal and concert on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will repeat Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," which was heard here two weeks ago. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play the Rubinstein concerto in D minor, No. 4.

It will be interesting to hear him interpret this work, for Hofmann was Rubinstein's pupil, and his playing, we are told, very closely approximates that of his great master. Hofmann has been playing with the orchestra on its second southern trip at all the concerts.

The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7 in A major, and the final number on the program will be the "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner.

Symphony Concert in Cambridge.

The third symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theatre next Thursday evening. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play Liszt's concerto for piano in E-flat major, No. 1. The feature of the program will be Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," which aroused so much interest when it was played at a Boston symphony concert a fortnight ago.

Mr Fiedler will repeat this at this week's symphony concerts in Boston. The symphony will be Brahms' No. 3 in F-major and the final number will be Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

[113]

HERALD, BOSTON,
DECEMBER 11, 1910.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE.

The third Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre Thursday evening, Dec. 15. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play Liszt's concerto for pianoforte in E-flat major No. 1. The feature of the program will be Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps." The symphony will be Brahms's No. 3 in F-major and the final number will be Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture.

FRIDAY—Symphony Hall, 2:30 P. M. Public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor. Beethoven, Symphony No. 7; Rubinstein, piano concerto in D minor, No. 4; Debussy, Rondes de Printemps (repeated by request); Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Joseph Hofmann will be the pianist.

SATURDAY—Symphony Hall, 8 P. M. Ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor. Program as on Friday afternoon.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—
DECEMBER 11, 1910.

HOFMANN IS SOLOIST AT NEXT SYMPHONY

Pianist to Play Rubinstein's Concerto in D Minor No. 4—Debussy Tone Poem Again.

"Rondes de Printemps," by Debussy, will be repeated at the ninth Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler has placed this little tone poem upon the program for a second performance so soon after its premier because it excited much interest among lovers of modern music and because such works should be heard more than once to be wholly understood and appreciated.

But the soloist will be the most important feature of the program. He is Josef Hofmann, who was so successful in recital a few weeks ago. Hofmann some twenty years ago was world famous as an infant piano prodigy. Unlike many prodigies, he did not become commonplace upon maturity, but by hard study has made himself one of the great pianists of the period.

He will play the Rubenstein Concerto in D Minor, No. 4, and it is particularly interesting to hear him play this work, for he was Rubenstein's pupil, and his playing, it is said, is similar to that of the great composer in this concerto. Hofmann has been playing with the orchestra on its second Southern trip at all the concerts.

The concert will commence with the famous Beethoven Symphony in A major, always melodious and grateful to the ear. The Rubenstein concerto will follow, then the Debussey number, and the final offering will be the Wagner Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."

The Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will take place on Thursday evening, December 15. The program will resemble somewhat that of the Boston cercerts, for it will contain the Debussy "Rondes de Printemps" and the Wagner Overture to the "Flying Dutchman." Josef Hofmann will also be the soloist, but he will play the Liszt Concerto for pianoforte in B flat major, No. 1, and the orchestra will play the Brahm's Symphony in F major, No. 3, Op. 90.

The Southern tour of the orchestra has lasted two weeks and has been very successful. This is a bad season for concerts all over the country, but the Boston Symphony concerts have been largely attended.

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY
DECEMBER 13, 1910—

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS.

The Symphony orchestra returns to town this morning after its second Southern trip, having given the usual concerts in New York, Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, and last night having given a concert in New Haven, the first in six years. Josef Hofmann was the soloist on all the programmes. The astonishing business which marked the first trip was repeated and the orchestra is simply breaking all records of past business outside of Boston. Houses filled to their utmost capacity have been the rule and the enthusiasm has been high. On Friday and Saturday Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the Boston concerts playing Rubinstein's Concerto in D Minor. The Symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7. Hofmann will also be the soloist in Cambridge on Thursday evening where he will play the Liszt E Flat Concerto.

GLOBE—TUESDAY,
DECEMBER 13, 1910.

Friday and Saturday Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony concerts, playing Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7. Hofmann will also be the soloist in Cambridge Thursday evening, where he will play the Liszt E-flat concerto.

HERALD, TUESDAY EVE'G ADVERTISER, WEDNESDAY
DECEMBER 13, 1910. DECEMBER 14, 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS.

The Symphony orchestra returns to town this morning, after its second southern trip, having given the usual concerts in New York, Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, and last night having given a concert in New Haven, the first in six years. Josef Hofmann was the soloist at all the concerts. The astonishing business which marked the first trip was repeated. The orchestra is breaking all records of past business outside of Boston. Houses filled to their utmost capacity have been the rule and the enthusiasm has been high. On Friday and Saturday Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the Boston concerts and play Rubinstein's concerto in D-minor. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7. Mr. Hofmann will also be the soloist in Cambridge on Thursday evening, where he will play Liszt's E-flat concerto.

JOURNAL—TUESDAY,
DECEMBER 13, 1910.

Symphony Returns

The Symphony Orchestra returns to town today, after its second Southern trip, having given the usual concerts in New York, Baltimore, Washington, Philadelphia and Brooklyn, and last night having given a concert in New Haven, the first in six years. Josef Hofmann was the soloist on all the programs. The astonishing business which marked the first trip was repeated. The orchestra is simply breaking all records of past business outside of Boston. On Friday and Saturday Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the Boston concerts, playing Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor. The symphony will be Beethoven's Seventh. Hofmann will also be the soloist in Cambridge on Thursday evening, where he will play the Liszt E flat Concerto.

GLOBE—WEDNESDAY.
DECEMBER 14, 1910.

WITEK RECITAL.

Anton and Vita Witek Give Violin and Piano Recital to Large and Enthusiastic Audience.

Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston symphony orchestra, and Vita Witek, pianist, his wife, gave a recital at Chickering hall last night. A large audience was present and applauded at times with an enthusiasm uncommon at concerts here.

Mr Witek's reading of the Beethoven concerto at his debut here—and in America—with the Symphony orchestra Oct 28, revealed him an artist of the first rank, possessed of a thorough and brilliant technic, and the mentality and poetic insight of an intrepreter.

The concert last night afforded the first opportunity of hearing Mr Witek in the more intimate spaces of a hall excellently adapted for the performance of solo and chamber music.

His playing was distinguished by sincerity, finesse and broad musicianship. He does not strive to keep Beethoven perpetually on the mountain top, or in a chariot of fire, as a Grecian god, or, peradventure as a mighty prophet. While he played portions of the Kreutzer sonata as the written word of a man who knew nobility and loftiness of thought, and who cherished a love for grave and serious beauty, he did not forget the genial spirit, the tenderness of the lighter pages of human fancy.

Paganini's concerto in D is frankly a show piece, bristling, inlaid and shot through with appalling technical difficulties. They are such as the genius composer loved to toss off with the aplomb of an expert conjurer in a baffling feat.

It is enlivening to see a violinist's finger race fleetly after some agile scale. It is exhilarating to listen to unearthly and wrath-like purity of harmonics, even as it is to watch a trapeze performer in flight through the air.

Therefore the applause was rapturous, imperative and persistent to the extent of four recalls. When Mr Witek played a lovely adagio from a Hadyn concerto, how apt Antonio's words to the casket of gold: "So may the outward shows be least themselves."

Mme Witek played the sonata with sympthy, with admirable sense of proportion and with command of her instrument. She then essayed formidable music in the Bach chromatic fantasie and fugue and a tremendously exacting theme and variations from Charles Valentin Alkan, a neglected composer. Mme Witek was cordially received.

JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY,
DECEMBER 14, 1910.

Witeks Give Recital at Chickering Hall

Anton Witek, the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Witek, who is well known abroad as a pianist, gave a sort of introductory recital at Chickering Hall last night. It was a friendly gathering and the recital on the whole deserved to be taken in a friendly spirit. The most striking feature of the entertainment was the performance by Mr. and Mrs. Witek of Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata. This was played impressively with marked breadth of style and understanding.

Mr. Witek, accompanied by his wife, played the Paganini-Wilhelmj concerto in D, which is not especially suited to his pre-eminently elegant style. Mrs. Witek played the Bach "Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue," Alkan's "Le Festin d'Esope," Chopin's etude in C sharp minor and Liszt's "Campanella."

DECEMBER 14, 1910

THE WITEK RECITAL A GREAT SUCCESS

CONCERTMASTER HIGHLY EFFECTIVE IN PLAYING

Mme. Witek Also a Pianist of Technique and Intelligence—Kreutzer Sonata Played.

By Louis C. Elson.

In spite of the fact that recitals do not draw large audiences in Boston, and that another violin and piano recital of much merit was taking place at the same hour, in another part of the city, a large and very musical audience greeted Mr. and Mme. Witek on their first Boston appearance in concert, in Chickering Hall, last evening.

The occasion was well worth while. Mr. Witek, our new chief violinist ("concertmeister") of the Symphony Orchestra, made a strong impression when he recently appeared in Symphony Hall in Beethoven's Violin Concerto. At the time we thought his work too refined for Beethoven and the tone too light for Symphony Hall, but last night these points were all that could be desired. There was nobility of tone, surety of intonation, wonderful technique, intelligent phrasing, and in short everything that goes to make an effective violin recital.

Mme. Witek also proved herself a pianist of fine technique and of great intelligence. Hers was the perfection of chamber-concert playing. The ensemble in the Kreutzer Sonata was something to be highly commended. It must be borne in mind also that this sonata is not purely a violin sonata. The piano is co-partner in all of its glories. The work demands almost as great a pianist as a violinist. It is certainly a divided consulship.

In this case the two artists justly shared the honors. The two last movements were given with such perfect union of the parts that it became one of the most enjoyable interpretations of recent years. The Variations especially were elastic, brilliant, well-contrasted.

In the first movement Mme. Witek was sometimes a trifle too loud and spasmodic, but this fault disappeared in the Variations and Finale. Musically the "Kreutzer" was the glory of the concert.

After this Mme. Witek threw down the gauntlet as soloist in Bulow's arrangement of Bach's Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue, an excellent test of any pianist even if it does somewhat un-Bach the old composer. The power of the chromatic introduction, the clearness of the voices in the fugue, at once showed an artist of good school. Undoubtedly Mme. Witek is to take rank among the most important of our resident pianists.

Now followed a more purely violin work than the "Kreutzer,"—the Paganini Concerto in D. Here the artist revelled in technical display. The great difficulties were surmounted with seeming ease, and Mr. Witek at once established his rank as a great virtuoso, while the "Kreutzer" had proved him something more. Paganini's Concerto must be judged from the firework standpoint only. After the great "Kreutzer" sonata it seemed especially superficial as music, but it served its purpose excellently for showing off all the tricks of virtuosity. Double stopping, harmonies, natural, artificial, and even double, arco saltando, everything was there, and everything was executed in a manner little short of marvellous. The audience did not care whether it was great music or not,—it was great violin-playing, and a frenzy of applause followed its close, such a continued enthusiasm that the violinist was obliged to follow it with another selection—a Haydn Adagio, the pure style of which came like a benediction, although not exactly "after prayer."

The final numbers of Mme. Witek were chiefly technical also. We were glad to see her trying to make a propaganda for Alkan. Charles Henri Alkan, the Parisian composer, deserves to be better known in the American concert-room. His piano works are enormously difficult, but they are most characteristic and are original in their thoughts and execution. The "Festin d'Aesope" is a theme and variations of brilliant character. Mme. Witek played these with full mastery of their bristling technical thorns. It is only fair to say, however, that Alkan's difficulties are not put in his works merely as difficulties (as Paganini's are), but that they always seem to have a musical meaning. Mme. Witek's octave chord, and scale work, all call for praise in this: she gave the number with its true spirit and made it very interesting throughout. Its "bizarrerie" was remarkably attractive.

ess

BIG SALE FOR THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony concert in Woolsey hall on Monday night which began yesterday (Thursday) morning indicates that the audience which will be present to hear this great orchestra and Josef Hofmann will be as large as that which heard the orchestra six years ago when Paderewski was the soloist. The interest in the concert is very keen and the announcement of the method in which the "rush" seats will be sold, that is to say, only one seat being allotted to each purchaser, has caused a great deal of satisfaction. By this rule everybody will be served alike and there can be no partiality shown to anyone. The sale of these seats will open at the hall at 7 o'clock on the evening of the concert.

[114]

DECEMBER 14, 1910

CONCERT BY THE WITEKS.

Brilliant Performance by Symphony Orchestra Concert Master.

By PHILIP HALE.

Anton Witek, the concert master of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and Mrs. Vita Witek, his wife, pianist of the Berlin Philharmonic Trio, gave a concert last night in Chickering Hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Sonata, A major (Kreutzer), Mr. and Mrs. Witek; Bach-Buelow, Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue, Mrs. Witek; Paganini, Concerto in D, Mr. Witek; Alkan, "Le Festin d' Esope," op. 39; Chopin, Etude in C sharp minor, op. 25; Liszt a la Campanella, Mrs. Witek.

Mr. Witek gave an admirable exhibition of ensemble and virtuoso playing. It is given to few to excel in such works as the Kreutzer sonata, which was probably not played in memory of Tolstoi, and Paganini's concerto. Indeed, some may have wondered at Mr. Witek's choice of this concerto, but his fine taste and poetic reading freed the music from the reproach of being merely an applause-trap. It is the fashion to sneer at Paganini as a trickster, but those who heard him, and among them were envious violinists, were amazed and thrilled by his emotional manner of playing a melody. He was as great a master of cantilena as of pyrotechnical display.

Mr. Witek's tone was pure and warm. It would have been emotional through sheer tonal beauty, had not there been a controlling soul. In the sonata there was an abiding sense of proportion, a delicacy that did not fall into effeminacy, a strength that was manly, but not aggressive. There was also polished phrasing. Above all, intimacy was at once established between the violinist and the audience. The performance of the concerto was brilliant and at the same time eminently musical. There was no suggestion of the deliberate wonder-worker, the medicine-man with the violin.

The modesty and dignity of Mr. Witek on the stage add to the general effect of his performance. Enthusiastically applauded by an audience of good size, Mr. Witek played in a charming manner an adagio from a concerto by Haydn.

Mrs. Witek was at her best in the sonata. A note on the program gave the impression that the pianist thought the music of Alkan was not well known in this country. One of the Rakemann brothers played pieces by Alkan in New York as early as 1847. In Boston pieces by Alkan have been played by MacDowell, Bauer and Gang, not to mention others. The title of the piece heard here last night probably for the first time is a curious one, but Alkan gave singular titles to his compositions, as "Heraclitus et Democritus," "Odi Profanum Vulgus," "Pseudo-naivete." He was described in his old age—he died in 1888—as solitary, eccentric, misanthropic—but interesting. "Le Festin d'Esope," as it was played last night, sounded eccentric and misanthropic, but not at all interesting.

RECORD, WEDNESDAY,
DECEMBER 14, 1910

WITEK RECITAL A GREAT SUCCESS

From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser.

In spite of the fact that recitals do not draw large audiences in Boston, and that another violin and piano recital of much merit was taking place at the same hour, in another part of the city, a large and very musical audience greeted Mr. and Mme. Witek on their first Boston appearance in concert, in Chickering Hall, last evening.

The occasion was well worth while. Mr. Witek, our new chief violinist ("concertmeister") of the Symphony Orchestra, made a strong impression when he recently appeared in Symphony Hall in Beethoven's Violin Concerto. At the time we thought his work too refined for Beethoven and the tone too light for Symphony Hall, but last night these points were all that could be desired. There was nobility of tone, surety of intonation, wonderful technique, intelligent phrasing, and in short everything that goes to make an effective violin recital.

Mme. Witek also proved herself a pianist of fine technique and of great intelligence. Hers was the perfection of chamber-concert playing. The ensemble in the Kreutzer Sonata was something to be highly commended. It must be borne in mind also that this sonata is not purely a violin sonata. The piano is co-partner in all of its glories. The work demands almost as great a pianist as a violinist. It is certainly a divided consulship.

In this case the two artists justly shared the honors. The two last movements were given with such perfect union of the parts that it became one of the most enjoyable interpretations of recent years. The Variations especially were elastic, brilliant, well-contrasted.

From EVE. MAIL

Address New York City.

Date DEC 12 1910

The Boston Symphony orchestra played Saturday afternoon before another audience which filled Carnegie hall to its capacity. Josef Hofmann played the Liszt E flat concerto with dazzling brilliancy.

TRAVELLER. WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1910

WITEKS IN RECITAL CHARM THE AUDIENCE

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Last evening in Chickering Hall Anton Witek, concert master of the Symphony orchestra, and Vita Witek gave a recital in Chickering Hall, rendering the following programme:

Sonata, A major, Op. 47 (Kreutzer), Beethoven
Mr. and Mrs. Witek.
Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue.....Bach
Mrs. Witek.
Concerto in D, for violin.Paganini-Wilhelmj
Mr. Witek.
Le Festin O'Esope (theme and variations).....Alkan
Etude in C sharp minor, Op 25...Chopin
A La Campanella.....Liszt
Mrs. Witek.

The opening Kreutzer Sonata, with its Adagio, Andante and Finale, was a fitting vehicle for Mr. Witek's ultra-artistic style of playing; the Adagio flowed lightly from his bow in delicate lines of light, each phrase formed with utmost delicacy.

In the violin Concerto Mr. Witek was vastly larger in conception and execution than in the Sonata. Some of the exquisite phrasing and delicate tone coloring which we had from him in his one appearance with the Symphony as a soloist shone here and illuminated it throughout. Here the tendency to underplay was not so apparent, and here too he spoke with authority. His passage work, while not always brilliant, was still of the finest texture, carefully wrought in every detail, and was the work of the artists's brain and heart.

Mrs. Witek in the Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue, her first piano number, established herself as a pianist of high intelligence and authoritative expression. Hers is almost a master mind for a woman, and this masculinity of conception also marks her execution. She does not read into the music anything which the composer has not put there, and at times she fails to catch his intrinsic meaning: but she conceives everything in a large way and expresses it broadly.

It was a most interesting chamber concert, and was warmly appreciated by the audience. Mrs. Witek received a large bouquet of flowers.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS. DECEMBER 14, 1910.

WITEK RECITAL.

THERE were domestic symphonies before Richard Strauss began to compose them. There were pieces written in the symphonic form which under certain conditions of presentation could have an undeniable domestic character. Take, for example, the Opus 47 of Beethoven. Think of it in association with a concert hall, and it is the Kreutzer Sonata; but think of it in connection with a family which numbers among its members a violinist and a pianist, and it is the Symphonia Domestica in A major.

Such a view, at all events, could innocently be taken of the performance of the piece by Anton Witek and Mrs. Vita Witek, who appeared in Boston for the first time in recital at Chickering hall Tuesday evening. And if at a breakfast table discussion of the recital some one should take this view, there will be someone else, of course, to insist that the Witek reading of the music should be regarded in the light of its value as professional ensemble interpretation. And judicial utterance struggles to yoke together the adjective and noun that will phrase the conclusion of the whole subject. But the domestic side of the argument interrogates:

"Did you once feel during the playing of the sonata that you were listening to Anton Witek, the virtuoso, in any such way as you felt it farther on in the program when the Paganini concerto was under interpretation?"

The point is finally yielded that here was not the usual concert manner of doing things. It all had a distinctly household air. The Symphony concert master and his wife were at home playing to their friends and were not in the ordinary sense giving a recital. In concert proper some listeners might have entertained doubts as to the correctness of the violinist's intonation in the higher notes of his E string. This is perhaps explicable on the ground that the violinist became at times listener instead of player. He, like the audience, may have been chiefly concerned with how the pianist was making Beethoven sound.

Swiftness and legibility of phrasing, respect for the Beethoven spirit of allegro and andante as the old interpreters have recorded it, but a distinctly modern method of executing notes characterized Mrs. Witek's work. And what was true of Beethoven in the piano part of the Kreutzer Sonata was equally true of Bach in the solo piano number which followed, the chromatic fantasia and fugue.

Mr. Witek's talents found their best expression in the concerto of Paganini as adapted by Wilhelmj. And this was given in a true chamber music style. Virtuosity was in evidence at every point, just the right seriousness of consideration was given to Paganini's thought and the whole as a musical picture was in appropriately reduced recital dimensions.

The pieces in which Mr. and Mrs. Witek appeared together were the following: Sonata, A major, op. 47 (Kreutzer), Beethoven; concerto in D, for violin, Paganini-Wilhelmj. Mrs. Witek's piano solos were as follows: Chromatic fantasie and fugue, J. S. Bach; Le festin d'esope, op. Alkan; etude in C-sharp minor, op. 25, Chopin; A La Campanella, Liszt.

POST, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1910

RUBINSTEIN BY HOFMANN

Soloist at Symphony Exhibits Muscular Power

BY OLIN DOWNES

As soloist at the ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Josef Hofmann did terrible things to his instrument, and scored an overwhelming triumph. The concert commenced with the Beethoven Seventh Symphony. Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" was repeated by request. In Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture Mr. Fiedler employed eight, instead of four, horns, thus following the example set here by Dr. Muck. Mr. Hofmann's composition was the Rubinstein concerto in D minor.

Hofmann gave a performance of tremendous virtuosity and spirit. Some thought that they again heard the lion-pawed Rubinstein at the instrument, but the authenticity of that emotion may be questioned. Mr. Hofmann did indeed play stupendously, with superb mastery, and sledge-hammer velocity. He had the concerto in the palm of his hand. The piece was written by a virtuoso who would not have dreamed of acknowledging himself weaker than a full orchestra. Mr. Hofmann, too, was a second orchestra. But Rubinstein is sadly aging, or the virtuoso, with all his authority and elan, gave more of the letter than the creative spirit, because, when it was all done, and the piano had stopped resounding, and the hands no longer caracoled over the keyboard, one said: "Was it worth while?"

Well, it was worth while for the younger generation to hear the once standard concerto in its full glory. The music sounded as it was probably intended to sound. No one, for years, at least, will be likely to hear a performance to parallel the amazing feat of yesterday afternoon. We do not believe that many want to. The concerto is now known to the young. Heaven bless its bones, and grant that it be shelved for many years to come. At least, Mr. Hofmann will not dare to tax the patience of a Symphony audience with it, for he has played it twice in succession at these concerts—the last time, in 1901, when the performance, if memory serves, was far indeed from the torrential execution of yesterday afternoon. Needless to say, the soloist was applauded to the echo, and repeatedly recalled.

Mr. Fiedler read the symphony with the utmost enthusiasm, though the orchestral tone was not always of the purest, and Beethoven thought, and wrote, the most heavenly tones—not only in his introduction—well played yesterday, but throughout. Debussy's piece was given a far better showing than three weeks ago. Again it seemed an advance in logic and distinction of workmanship, but, alas, it also seemed made, the worked-out masterpiece of a master workman. And, after all, would this music have ever been written, had it not been for the forest music in "Siegfried"? The performance was very brilliant. Wagner's overture was stormy and exciting. At the concerts of next week Sylvain Noack, the second concertmeister of the orchestra, will play a concerto in F minor, unknown here, by Lalo, the Frenchman.

SUNDAY GLOBE—DECEMBER 18, 1910

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr Fiedler will present no problems in modern music on his Christmas program this week. He will start with the prelude to Humperdinck's charming musical play, "Haensel and Gretel," and the symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral number will be the "Academic Festival" overture by Brahms.

The soloist will be Mr Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra who made so favorable an impression a year ago, when he appeared as soloist at one of the symphony concerts.

He has chosen a work which will be new to the great majority of the patrons inasmuch as it has never been played at a symphony concert. This is a concerto in F minor for violin, opus 20, by the Frenchman, Edouard Lalo.

Chickering Hall: Mr. and Mrs. Witek's Recital

WANDERING troubadours of the violin avoid Beethoven's sonata in A major, the one nicknamed the "Kreutzer." Though dedicated to a virtuoso and bearing a subtitle "as if a concerto," it is the sort of virtuoso piece which searches out all the infirmities of the player and rewards him with few opportunities for display. Later in his programme, Mr. Anton Witek was to have, in Paganini's concerto in D, his opportunities; he could therefore submit to the ordeal by sonata.

Mr. Witek's playing is professional, it is pedagogic. We, his hearers, were positively a class. He had, at any moment, the manner of saying, "You will please note the phrasing of this," or "In the following passage you will observe the development of the second theme," or, in fine: "This is the way it ought to be done." For the first two pages of the opening movement this academic style seemed painfully cold. Where was enthusiasm for this noble work? Then attention was directed, as it should be, away from the player, to the playing and the thing played. You were asked to listen not to Anton and Vita Witek, but to Beethoven's sonata. The playing was what would be called "authoritative." There was no hesitation, no uncertainty, no inspiration of the moment. Every measure showed the patience of scholarship; the sonata had been studied and was being given with the clarity of thought and the precision of language of the university lecture or a judicial decision. If there was temperament here, it wore the academic gown; and was not at play, but put to work. Did such playing leave the hearer cold? It did and it did not. Emotionally, there was no fire to spread the palms to: intellectually, one began presently to glow. It was clear that the player did not consider this sonata a suitable occasion for the display of personal emotion. His appeal was to the intellect and those capable of following were invited to do so. At length, in the second variation of the Andante (the first in which the violin takes the solo part) the glow warmed to a lambent flame. The tone, not large, was yet singularly sweet and pure, like the voices of old people: the bowing caused the figure of the variation to play about the theme as their flames about a glowing ember, vague in brightness. The tiny voices which echoed in the slurs of tied notes were commanded with a cunning which is a secret of individual technique. Other violinists do such things, but not the same way, and generally, not so well.

Throughout went the grave, professorial manner—the "Listen, my children, and you shall hear," even to the elevation of eyebrow and rounded lips to quell some irrepressible applause during a piano interlude after bravura playing in Paganini's concerto. It was, again, the lecturer's preoccupation with his theme; the scholar exulting in the tests of his scholarship.

This account is offered not as a defence, not as a vindication, not as an eulogy of such a style as Mr. Witek's. It is an attempt to define and interpret. Scholarship in the concert room is not exactly what American audiences have been trained to expect or enjoy, though an obviously partisan audience in Chickering Hall last night signified intense pleasure. Others may play the great sonata with more individual fervor: Ysaye, for instance, like an Olympian Zeus; Kreisler like a bland Apollo; Elman, possibly, like a fiery Hector. Yet, those of us who, meanwhile, have heard Mr. Witek play it, may tell ourselves that we have been given to understand how it ought, all virtuoso decorations aside, to be played.

This ex-cathedra style was, to be sure, less happy in Paganini's concerto, avowedly a show piece. In this, while Mr. Witek's manner was not less magisterial and his bow and left-hand technique were coolly proficient, the music itself is just the sort which invites and gains by the rhapsodizing that a fiery youngster like Elman, or a rapt senior like Professor Hess gives to it. Mr. Witek was calmly infallible. His double notes were flawlessly intoned; only one harmonic of the impish crew squaked, and the flourishes of the cadenza were gallantly tossed off. We admired; we did nothing more.

It would be interesting to know what is Mr. Witek's notion of Paganini's concerto—whether as music or as a virtuoso piece. If as music, why not one of half a dozen showy concertos equally good, Wieniawski's or Vieuxtemps's, for example. If as a show piece what is the theory of a show piece: to say, "Ladies and gentlemen, you will watch me stand on my head in the saddle at full gallop," or "Ladies and gentlemen, you will note how absurdly easy it is to stand on one's head in the saddle at full gallop." Mr. Witek's appears to be the second theory.

Though the recital included four pieces for pianoforte Mrs. Witek's best playing is best suited to ensemble chamber music. Her share of the sonata was, naturally, in the same spirit as the violinist's, only not so much so. She was, if we may so say, the prize pupil—permitted to assist. The rest of us received instruction. Her solos, beside Bach's Chromatic Fantasie and Fugue, an étude of Chopin, and Liszt's Campanella, included "Le Festin d'Esope," a set of variations by the little-known Alkan. Its technical feats are prodigious. The variations, which are mostly short, compose a tolerably complete catalogue of every known keyboard figuration, neatly tied up in a parcel labelled "variation," with a number. Without asserting that the reminiscences are conscious or even not anachronistic, here are a few: in chromatics; with appogiaturas; an étude of Chopin; triplets for the right hand over a melody for the left, like Rubinstein's barcarolles; rushing octaves for both hands; heroics like Tausig's arrangement of Schubert's military march; a season of Tschaikowskified Sturm und Drang; runs for the right hand, transferring to the left; folksong; ecclesiastical measures, as for a church organ; a reiterated succession of four descending notes, such as Ravel uses to denote the atmosphere of a night in Spain; chopped rhythms, Schumannesque; and others.

L. P.

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1910

HERALD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1910.

JOSEF HOFMANN SOLOIST.

Plays Rubinstein's Concerto at Ninth Symphony Rehearsal.

By PHILIP HALE.

The ninth public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Josef Hofmann was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 7.....Beethoven
Concerto in D minor for the piano.....Rubinstein
Rondes de Printemps.....Debussy
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman".....Wagner

It was a little over a year ago that Isadora Duncan danced the "interpretation" of three movements of Beethoven's seventh symphony. At the time, and a year before in the same hall, there were some who scoffed at her pretension, and spoke with a fine show of indignation concerning the "desecration" of the symphony.

And yet, when yesterday the strangely solemn strains of the Allegretto were heard, the vision of Miss Duncan came into the mind and remained until the end of the Finale, with its Dionysiac joy. And there also came the thought of music composed by Eric Satie and orchestrated by Debussy, "Gymnopedies," performed here almost six years ago by the Orchestral Club. To this music, as to Beethoven's Allegretto, Grecian youth might well have danced with the gestures that have come down to us on frieze or vase.

The symphony was well chosen to commemorate Bethoven's birthday 140 years ago, for it ranks among his greatest works, and this is to say among the greatest of all musical compositions. The symphony is nearly 100 years old. Think how wildly applauded orchestral compositions that were new and surprising only 20 or even 10 years ago are now moribund or snugly entombed forever!

There is not a note of the symphony that not been long familiar to a modern audience. Even when conductors do their best, which is the worst, to give an unfamiliar, a personal reading, the music soars above them that would twist and shape it according to their own device.

In the performance yesterday the music was allowed to go its way, and was not too personally conducted. The Scherzo was finely played; the mysterious passages in the course of the first movement were more than ordinarily effective, and the orgy of joy at the end was not for once the frenzy of a red-capped, drunken mob.

Debussy's Rondes de Printemps" was repeated by request. In this request it is to be hoped that the conductor and the orchestra joined, for the first performance a few weeks ago gave little idea of the composer's design or the character of the music. The Rondo would bear more repetitions for the sake of a clear understanding and it is easy to imagine it read in a lighter, a more delicate and a more poetic spirit.

Mr. Hofmann played Rubinstein's concerto in D minor. He played here at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra nine years ago, and the concerto was that of yesterday. He played here at a concert given by Theodore Thomas with the Chicago orchestra, in March, 1898, and then his choice was this concerto. It is fair to presume that he favors it; perhaps because the composer was his teacher; perhaps because he believes it to be effective; possibly because he likes it as music.

Played by many, this concerto seems old-fashioned, with its plausible brilliance and its undisguised sentimentalism. Played by Rubinstein himself, it assumed gigantic proportions. No one that ever heard the composer when he was wholly in the vein, will ever forget the opening attack, the swift descent, of the lion's paw. By the beauty of his cantabile, Rubinstein turned the sentimentalism of the middle movement into emotional song.

It is a great but deserved compliment to Mr. Hofmann to say that there were times yesterday when he recalled vividly the performance by his master. There was the superb attack, the massive chord playing, the gorgeous procession of florid passages, the clear yet dazzling runs, the succession of shifting tonal graduations, the unerring sense of proportion, the general lucidity and strength of treatment, the supreme grasp of conception. And so the performance of the first and third movements was masterly.

It was in the second movement, the Romanza, that Mr. Hofmann fell far below his master in the singing of melodic phrases. The background was deftly prepared, there was atmosphere, there was romantic suggestion, but the song itself was too pronounced, too salient. The melody was italicized until at times it was metalic in emphasis and rigidity. Nor was the song always sustained. It lacked the tenderness, the exquisite liquidity that were found, strange to say, in inherently inexpressive passages of transition or conventional bravura. There is the paradox of the pianist, as of the comedian; and yesterday this was the paradox of Mr. Josef Hofmann.

These pieces will be played at the concerts next week: Humperdinck, Prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"; Dvorak, symphony "From the New World"; Lalo, concerto in F minor for the violin, op. 20 (Mr. Noack, violinist); Brahms, Academic Festival overture.

[115]

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

BEETHOVEN, RUBINSTEIN AND HOFMANN

For Once Even Wagner and Debussy Fall Into Secondary Place—The Conductors and the Classics—Mr. Fiedler's Willingness, at Last, to Let Beethoven Speak for Himself—Rubinstein and the Personal Equation—Mr. Hofmann's Masterful Performance That Recreated a Concerto That Has Long Been Only Half Itself

CONTRARY to precedent in the weeks of the return of the Symphony Orchestra from its monthly journeys, the concert yesterday afternoon, was unusually spirited and interesting throughout and in Mr. Hofmann's playing of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor signally impressive. The pressure of Christmas did not perceptibly diminish the numbers of the audience and they of the second balcony were as faithful to eminence and to curiosity, whether singer, pianist or violinist stir it, as they regularly are. The company was unusually applausive too. Evidently the house knew what to expect in Beethoven's seventh symphony, liked Mr. Fiedler's leading of it, clapped him warmly at the end of each movement and called him back to the stage, when the whole piece was done. It was warmer still toward Mr. Hofmann, whose maturity of understanding, imagination and accomplishment evidently surprised it, and for a gloved company of women, for the most part, it applauded him as largely and insistently as an exciting and masterful performance of the concerto deserved. Possibly there was a hint of duty in the response of many of the listeners to the repetition of Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps." It had reason to believe—or, thought it had—that it was learning to like music that it ought to appreciate, and womanfully it fulfilled its obligation. Though the concert was not short, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" held the house, and there the clapping audience was on firmer ground. Though Boston has an opera-house, it hears no more of Wagner on the stage—and indeed less—than it used to do. He remains in the concert-room; Mr. Fiedler does not play fragments of his music too often; and the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" actually sounded yesterday fresh and novel.

It would be easy to call Mr. Feidler's version of Beethoven's symphony conventional, much what was to be expected from a mature and practised conductor with an expert band before him. Yet it was precisely these qualities that commended the performance. The faith of conductors to the contrary notwithstanding, the classics can often speak for themselves. It was one of the glories of Mr. Gericke—and the years do not dim it—that he was willing to let his Haydn and Mozart, his Beethoven and Schubert run. Schumann indeed needs manipulation if the conductor is to set free the true voice of his music; but Mr. Feidler has often been prone to apply the process to Beethoven, where it is superfluous. Conductors are but human—and ambitious. The humblest reviewer of us all would like to say something new and striking when he must take his twentieth turn at a familiar piece. Perverse connoisseurs deliberately hear the classics in meticulous quest for some detail that shall prick their ears. So, plausibly enough, are the conductors with such music. They know its eloquence; but they would have their particular eloquence with it a little different a little "individual." Few wish them to be "reverent," which is the approved circumlocution for dryness and dulness, because the classics are not usually dry or dull; but it is wholesome discipline for them and for their hearers to let their classics speak with the composer's own voice. Then does the conductor descend from his stand with the comfortable consciousness of one who has sacrificed personal inclination to impersonal considerations, and then also does he receive the applause that is dear to him.

Mr. Fiedler has manipulated Beethoven often in the past and not always to the advantage of the music or the comfort of his hearers. Beethoven does not need an incessantly modulated pace; he certainly did not drag his songful passages as his imagination heard them and his pen set the notes on paper; his contrasts speak for themselves; his strength is not often a racing fury, and when it becomes so, it is unmistakable. The virtue of Mr. Fiedler's performance of the seventh symphony was that he was willing to forego his own individuality for Beethoven's. He would not have been the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra had he not taken the Scherzo at a racing pace in which scarcely another band could have kept clarity and rhythm, and sped the Finale through its whirl of exuberantly reiterated figures. Not once, however, did the conductor blur the profile of the music, smear its tonal colors, or cloud its voice. Grant that the seventh symphony is a symphony of the dance, but it is of the dance idealized and not of the dance as confused orgy. It is not even so wild as some of Wagner's terpsichorean rhetoric about it.

Mr. Fiedler held the music to its truer and clearer eloquence. He made it compact yet fluent of rhythm idealized. He did not over-emphasize the contrasts of the first Allegro; he indicated details, but he did not underscore them. The song of the slow movement waxed, but under it was the pliant yet insistent rhythmic beat that is the spell of the whole symphony. The pace of the Scherzo and the contrasting breadth of the Trio were unforced; the Finale had its riot—idealized. Everywhere details fell into their due place and almost everywhere they signalled once more the virtuosity of the orchestra, in the finesse of the strings in the slow movement, in the pervading quality of the wood winds, and in the flare of the brass toward the end of the symphony. Even when Mr. Fiedler made his little "effects" of his own, as he did in the sudden swelling of the orchestral voices before the end of the second movement, they

Not often, outside the Choral Symphony, has Mr. Fiedler's Beethoven been so satisfying. Later he could and did give his romantic energy of emphasis and contrast play in the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," but the sheer intellectual feat—for a German—that should give Debussy's music its lightness of motion, its flecks of suggestion, its evanescence and yet its beauty is not in him. Mr. Fiedler can paint frescoes, but not water-colors, in tones.

Rubinstein's music needs more than ever the re-creating hand. At bottom, he was more the performer than the composer, and when he wrote, and especially for the pianoforte, his imagination heard the music as though he were playing it. Debussy's music is a personal music, because it expresses—in these very "Rondes de Printemps" for example—a singular temperament disclosing its curious moods and visions by singular means. Rubinstein's music is a personal music in another way; he could not conceive it, seemingly, except as he, or one like him should perform it. There has been no such; and the music has gone out of the fashion less because of its inherent weakness of invention and of feeling, than because there has been no responsive personality to provide as Rubinstein himself did, the other and the better half of it. Mr. Hofmann did such service to the concerto in D minor yesterday, and it lived and thrilled again. The younger generation knows not how Rubinstein played the concerto; but it does know—and not to stimulating recollection—how many a pianist shakes about in it as in a shell that he cannot fill with sonorous and commanding sound. For a few years Mr. Hofmann was a pupil of the ageing Rubinstein and the years were the susceptible years of the pianist's youth. Mr. Hofmann has lived, besides, in the Russian world that counts the music of the pianoforte the most interesting of all music. There he must have heard much debate of the concerto in D minor and report of the fashion in which the composer played it. Yesterday however, it sufficed that his own performance of it, ripened these many years, was masterful in its own right. By it and through it, the concerto regained the sweep, the power, the splendor even that was more of Rubinstein the performer than of Rubinstein the composer.

Throughout the concerto, Mr. Hofmann made the music magnificently declamatory. For a time even the tonal splendor, the tonal eloquence, the sheer driving power of the performance overwhelmed very other impression. There was Mr. Fiedler leading his orchestra faithfully but not too adroitly as his way is with acompaniments; but there also was Mr. Hofmann and his pianoforte seeming to sweep the band before him, to carry it along with him, and now and then even to shepherd and persuade it. Then out of this pervading splendor and power emerged a tone that with all its brilliancy was rich, translucent, multi-colored, endless with gradations. The pace was thrilling, now with its amplitude of stride, now with its rapidity and elasticity of modulation. Yet the clarity was flawless, and the music seemed to be writing itself. The answers of pianoforte to the orchestra struck fire. Or it dominated the orchestral mass with the power and the passion of its accents. Or it flung itself in exuberance of imagination and vitality into ornament that Mr. Hofmann's command of tonal color made iridescent. The music seemed to lift itself to its climax and by its own inherent power. The power, the splendor, the sense of sweeping but ordered magnificence in it all made irresistible emotion. The pianist was recreating the music in his own image.

The slow movement demands another recreation. It must be lifted out of sentiment into large emotion. They say that Rubinstein so transformed it by the magnificence of his instrumental song. Mr. Hofmann, being of another time and another temperament, took another way. He heightened the music by an insistently fine and almost exquisite intensity. Rubinstein, again they say, made it large. Mr. Hofmann chose to make it poignant. He gave the more sentimental melody a poignancy of phrase that refined it into emotion. He clothed the more animated melody with the changeful lights of his tonal tints, with the dazzle of his ornament. The impression throughout was of delicately and endless blended light and shade, through which, now subdued, now intensified, went the songful voice of the music. Mr. Hofmann had made Rubinstein puissant; now he made him almost subtle.

The harmonies wave a background of rhapsodic fancy; against it phrase by phrase went the poignant intensity of the melody; the ornament was as the flicks of light upon it all. Large song it was not; exquisite song it was. The Finale, uprising from the shadowed close, renewed the declamatory splendor, the touch magnificence of the beginning. There were chords that were the power of sound; there were runs that were the sweep of it; the music bore itself long as in self-creating rhapsody that scattered ornament by the way. Rhetorical it was, but the rhetoric had become eloquence. The tonal color was kaleidoscopic, but each tint, each gradation of a tint fell as spontaneously as the sparkling glass into its place in the whole. In al lthe mingled pursuance and fineness of his playing, in al lhis splendor or poignancy of tone, in all his range of pace and modulation, Mr. Hofmann had not forgotten the doings and the climax of the whole. As he had conceived largely, so he ended largely, and long since he had taken the orchestra to himself—and to the recreated music.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A Symphony by Dvorak, Two Overtures and a Novel Concerto to Make the Programme at the Next Symphony Concerts—The Christmas Performances of "The Messiah"—Mr. Platt and Miss Fletcher's Final Recital

AS usual, the week that includes Christmas—or rather, this year, Christmas Eve—is almost barren of concerts, except those of the Symphony Orchestra, and the two performances of "The Messiah" by the Händel and Haydn Society, which are part and parcel of the time. The interloper is the final recital of sonatas for pianoforte and violin by Mr. Platt and Miss Fletcher. At the Symphony Concerts, moreover, familiar music will make most of the programme and the "soloist," Mr. Noack, the violinist, comes from the orchestra itself.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

DVORAK'S music is much out of the fashion nowadays, and not altogether deservedly. When it does appear on current programmes it is usually the "Husitzka," the "Carnival" or the "Nature" overtures, or else the symphony, "From the New World," that he wrote during his brief and rather unhappy stay in America. It is the symphony that Mr. Fiedler will revive at the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, and in it is romantic music that usually kindles the conductor's imagination. The programme, further, will begin with an operatic prelude, Humperdinck's to "Hänsel and Gretel," and end with the concert overture upon student songs that Brahms wrote in acknowledgment of the degree that made him a doctor of music. The solo piece is the unusual item in the list—the concerto for violin and orchestra that the French composer, Lalo, wrote for Sarasate in the seventies. Not long thereafter his "Spanish Symphony" for violin surpassed it alike with the virtuosi and the public, and in recent years the concerto has been seldom performed. Mr. Noack will play it, and in fineness and brightness of tone he is at least akin to the Sarasate for whom the music was written.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: The Messiah

THE two performances of "The Messiah" by the Händel and Haydn Society at Christmas time are institutional. Year after year they find a ready public among those who seek all the concerts of the society, knowing the virtues of its chorus and of Mr. Mollenhauer as a choral conductor; those to whom the hearing of Händel's oratorio is a part of the ritual of Christmas; and those who now and again would hear the music less from association than from liking, for its masculine breadth, sweep and power. Come whence it may this public has annually sufficed for two performances of "The Messiah" and this year they are appointed for next Sunday and next Monday evening, at 7.30, in Symphony Hall. The solo singers for the first performance are Mmes. Hinkle and Burns and Messrs. Duffey and Cairns; for the second Mmes. Hudson and Benedict and Messrs. Miller and Martin.

Richard Platt, the pianist, and Nina Fletcher, the violinist, will end their present scenes of concerts of sonatas for their instruments on Monday afternoon, at three, at the Hotel Somerset. Already their recitals have given intimate pleasure to their audiences and proved their advance in command of their talents and in interpretative understanding of their music.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

85 MUSICIANS IN BOSTON SYMPHONY

When the Boston Symphony orchestra was organized in the fall of 1881 with Georges Henschel as its conductor, it consisted only of sixty-five musicians drawn entirely from residents of Boston. This season, when it is in its thrtieth year, it has for the first tme on its roll one hundred musicians, which makes it by all odds the largest permanent orchestra in the world. For ordinary symponic needs eight-five men is sufficient, for on that number can be built a classical symphony orchestra on a basis of sixteen fist violins, fouteen seconds, ten violas, ten 'cellos and eight double basses. Moden music, however, demands so many extra instruments in the wind choirs and in the percussion department that it is necessary to increase the size of an orchestra materially. With all other orchestras in the world it is the policy to call in extra musicians when some special modern work of large dimensions is being given but with the Boston Symphony it is the rule to have all the men needed for any work under contract with the orchestra and thus have their exclusive services. In this way the orchestra is always sure of having musicians of highest quality whenever extra men are needed. It is a fact that there are men under thirty-five weeks contract with the orchestra who may play not more than fifteen or twenty times luring an entire season, yet they always report at every rehearsal and enjoy the same benefits in respect to the pension fund and other things that men do who play at every single

HOFMANN AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

HEARD IN RUBINSTEIN'S D MINOR CONCERTO

Debussy's "Spring" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony Other Features of the Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Beethoven—Symphony in A major.
Rubinstein—Concerto for Piano, in D minor.
Debussy—"Rondes de Printemps."
Wagner—"Flying Dutchman" overture.
Pianist, Josef Hofmann.

A programme which was intelligible from first to last, for even Debussy is more coherent than usual in his "Rondes de Printemps," even if his Spring breezes are sometimes a trifle raw. "Happy are those Nations which have no History." Happy also are those concerts which require no elucidation. There is nothing new to be said about Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, but there is just as much to enjoy in it as ever. What a fantasy of rhythms it is! What a simple slow movement it gives: a dactyl and a spondee in alternation most of the time. Yet it is more satisfying than Strauss's thunders or D'Indy's complexities. Only the prolongation of the Scherzo by mere repetitions seems to us a case of Homer nodding.

If only some of our present-day composers would make their symphonies as brief as this we would forgive their not having as many ideas to express as Beethoven had.

The performance did not seem to us as entirely effective as usual. There was some rigidity in the Allegretto and Dionysiac fury in the finale, which made the "Allegro con Brio" the most rapid "Prestissimo" imaginable. The demon of haste marred some of the music, although the great crescendo effects of the first movement were nobly done.

The remainder of the concert made ample amends, for there was excellent interpretation of the last three numbers of the programme.

Josef Hofmann has not grown up into the "second Mozart" that was expected of him 20 years ago, but he has become a most poetic and intelligent pianist. His surety is a delight and the auditor catches some of his confidence and enjoys the work, sparing the player's own enthusiasm. The D minor is the best of Rubinstein's concertos, but it takes a pianist with poetic and grandiose to carry out its thought. This it certainly had on this occasion. The two last movements are the best of the work. The slow movement reintroduces us to the lost art of Melody. The tenderness and delicacy of Hofmann's playing in this movement was ineffably beautiful and the contrast with the more powerful episode finely made. The Finale was full of bravura, and both in the rapid scale-work and in the fiery chord and octave passages Hofmann was a Rubinstein "redivivus." Nor must we forget to speak of the cadenza-playing of the first movement. It was altogether a noble performance of a noble work, and a great wave of enthusiasm followed its completion. Hofmann was recalled again and again, and it seemed as if the applause would never end. Rubinstein is a very unequal composer; when he is good he is very, very good, and when he is bad he is padded. Here he was heard at his best.

A second hearing of Debussy's views on Spring convinced us of the composer's originality. He has that personal note that is sometimes indicative of genius. But our views of Spring (even in Boston) are less bitter. If we thought only of tonics, of umbrellas, of the danger of laying aside one's flannels, of influenza, etc., we might agree with such a sharply biting tone-poem, but there are really some good points about the vernal season that a musician might chronicle or suggest. The orchestration has some strong points and the interest is sustained all through the composition. The work was worth the second hearing. Yet the most tangible point that we could get from it was that the orchestra sneezed thrice (a happy omen) which suggested cold in the head. There is much of novelty in the work, one of Debussy's best, but we must beware of mistaking novelty for greatness.

Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture ended the programme with something of fury, mitigated, however, by the final apotheosis of Senta and the sea-faring gentleman. Mr. Fiedler's reading of this was superb. Every point of grandeur was emphasized, every contrast strikingly made, and amid even the greatest power, nothing was unclear or muddy-toned.

Especial tribute must be given to the trombones and the kettle-drummer, and all the brasses were in wonderful form.

The work of the horns in the Rubinstein concerto also demands complimentary notice. Altogether then, the concert was one of the kind that the public could cordially appreciate, and the conservative musician also enjoy. The next programme bids fair to continue this pleasant state of things, with Lalo, Dvorak, Humperdinck and Brahms.

HOFMANN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The Symphony orchestra, with Joseph Hofmann as soloist, gave its ninth rehearsal of the season yesterday afternoon. The following programme was played:

Beethoven Symphony in A-major, No. 7, Op. 92.

Rubenstein Concerto, D-minor, No. 4, for pianoforte and orchestra.

Debussy. Dondes de Printemps: Images pour Orchestra, No. 3.

Wagner. Overture to the opera, "The Flying Dutchman."

The Beethoven Symphony is purely music for music's sake—harmony for harmony's sake. Thematically it is not very well endowed, and the theme of the first movement, or possibly themes, as some consider the second part of the movement has a new theme—is a long time resolving itself. Yesterday's programme stated that many commentators had read "ideas" into this Symphony, but it does not seem at all a thing of ideas, but of abstract, musical logic, without a single trace of so-called modernism. It is a striking contrast to the Debussy "Rondes de Printemps" played later. Theme development in music is very like plot development through scenes in dramatic writing, and as in the latter the closest cogency must be maintained, so it is in the former; but in the Beethoven seventh Symphony this development drags, as if the composer were so infatuated with his theme that he did not want to leave it; he is discursive, and makes many different approaches to its final resolution.

Is Rich in Theme.

The first movement is in this regard a trifle monotonous; but the second, or Allegretto, one opens with a richly sonorous theme, played by the violas, violoncellos and double basses. Most of the themes throughout the symphony are introduced by the flutes or wood-winds, but this is a striking exception and affords variety. The wood-winds develop the next theme, which is a march movement of much beau... The counterpart of this theme is carried by the violins, which were exceedingly weak yestedday—in fact, it was true of a good deal of the violin work throughout the symphony, in the work of ornamentation as well as in elaboration.

This Allegretto movement has most of the real, intrinsic beauty of the symphony, its themes are tuneful and gracefully handled; they are, however, like all the themes in the symphony, kept closely in hand—they never any of them sally forth into realms unknown or explore hidden paths or places. It is a work of much beauty, but strictest musical sobriety, no vagaries haunt its themes or phrases. The Scherzo movement was brilliant as played yesterday, the hymnal aria wending its way into the theme with a solemn, melodic grace. The finale was almost breathless in its tempo, but the strings found opportunity to do some brilliant work.

The appearance of Josef Hofmann as soloist in the Rubenstein Concerto was the occasion for much applause. Mr. Hofmann played as at his recital with remarkable brilliancy, and was as strongly assertive. He did, on the contrary, lay aside the sharp contrasts and explosives which marred the pleasure of his work on that day. He still plays chords at times as if he were hitting a golf ball, and putting it over a bunker at that, but throughout the last two movements of the Concerto his chord and arpeggio work was finely chiseled and crystalline, and his sostenuto work of the Moderato movement was full of prolonged, lingering beauty.

A Melodic Dialogue.

There is between the orchestra and the piano in this concerto a fine understanding of the possibilities of each, the orchestra completing harmony opened by the solo instrument, and the reverse also being true; instrument answers instrument in a kind of melodic dialogue which is very harmonious. The lack of sympathy which is sometimes felt in Mr. Hofmann's touch was covered by the orchestra, and only its remarkable brilliancy was felt.

Mr. Hofmann is a player of large effects, his tonal color is exceedingly brilliant at times, but often the colors move in such swift kaleidoscopic changes across the tone surface that the listener can scarcely catch and hold one of them before it flits away. Yesterday's audience was most enthusiastic over Mr. Hofmann's playing, recalling him many times.

The Debussy "Rondes de Printemps," which Mr. Fiedler repeated on yesterday's programme by request, was as much the thing of vague, shifting beauties as before—in fact, it is only after a second rendering that one can feel that one has extracted half of the joy and glory of spring from this color fantasy. It is pregnant with life—is even close to the fountain spring of life. The orchestra plays it with fine and delicate interpretation.

The closing overture to the "Flying Dutchman" was played in a finely spirited style. Its sharp contrasts, its mystery, the waves which sweep across it in blasts, the rythmic melody that slips in between these waves—bits of arias of the opera—were all brought out. In it all the natural and supernatural forces seem to be set free, to meet at the close and melt into sweetest harmony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, who, at his debut as soloist last year, was so favorably received, is to be the soloist at the Christmas concerts on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 23 and 24 respectively. He is to play a concerto in F minor, Opus 20, by Lalo, a new work for the Symphony concerts. The "Symphonic Espagnole" of Lalo is comparatively well known, but the concerto will be a novelty.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged a very tuneful programme for the Christmas concerts, the first number being the Prelude to Humperdick's charming musical play, "Hansel und Gretel." The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the final number will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

GLOBE—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Josef Hofmann Soloist in Rubinstein Concerto.

Debussy's "Roundelay of Spring" Is Repeated by Request.

The program at the ninth Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Beethoven's 7th symphony, Rubinstein's D minor concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, Josef Hofmann, soloist; Debussy's "Roundelay of Spring" (repeated by request) and the overture to Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman."

The 7th symphony of Beethoven contains some of the noblest music to be found in the symphonies.

The vivace in the exposition of the chief theme of the first movement bears a fitting name, for there is unfailing and undimmed vitality in every measure.

Here is evidence of the plan, the masterful logical sequence of Beethoven, which makes each measure the spontaneous outgrowth of what precedes.

Beside the melodic figures which have identity, there are also those in rhythm which form a part of the design, and there seemed to be no plausible warrant yesterday in eliminating the second and fifth eighth notes (six-eight time) of full voiced chords in the loud measures immediately preceding the entrance of the secondary theme, both in the exposition and again in the recapitulation.

The performance was marked by clarity and tonal beauty. The first pages of the second movement, with its melody in the grave-voiced violas, had admirable repose and tranquillity.

The scherzo, exquisite in fancy and well governed in form, although as free and spontaneous as the tracery of frost upon the window pane, was played with true delicacy and spontaneity.

Thus far the reading had given pleasure. The closing movement brought a spectacle not uncommon at these concerts—that of several dozen honest, hard-working fiddlers, doing their best to play cascades and whirlwinds of notes as though paced by the lightning, irrespective of the peace of the composer's soul.

Mr Hofmann was unduly aggressive in the first movement of the concerto. The tremendous rhythmical passages of embellishing chords against the orchestra were sonorous, but the lyrical portions suffered from an unsympathetic tone.

This was not apparent, however, in the lovely second movement, which was as an outpouring of emotional song. While he last movement is less consequential, it found Mr Hofmann's technic and intellectual grasp adequate.

The reading of the Debussy "Roundelay" was less poetic than at the first time.

The program next week is as follows: Humperdick's prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"; Dvorak's symphony in E minor, No. 5, "From tae New World"; Lalo's concerto for the violin, F minor, op 20, soloist, Sylvain Noack; and Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture.

SUNDAY POST, DECEMBER 18, 1910

CONCERTS

Mr. Fiedler will present no problems in modern music on his Christmas programme which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 23 and 24. He will start with the prelude to Humperdinck's charming musical play "Haensel and Gretel" and the symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," played by the orchestra with so much success in New York a week ago yesterday. The other orchestral piece will be the "Academic Festival" overture by Brahms.

The soloist will be Mr. Sylvain Noack, the second concert-master of the orchestra, who made so favorable an impression a year ago when he appeared as soloist at one of the Symphony concerts. He has chosen a work which will be new to the great majority of the patrons inasmuch as it has never been played at a Symphony concert. This is a concerto in F minor for violin, opus 20, by the Frenchman, Edward Lalo. Lalo is well known to the violin lovers here through his "Symphonic Espagnole" but this work [illegible]

SYMPHONY CONCERT

"My diary tells me that it was the mid-December concert four years ago," said the Sophomore.

"Did you keep a diary when you were in school?" asked the Conservative.

"Yes, weather, copper quotations and Symphony programs. My aunt will tell you what use I made of her rehearsal ticket that winter. The agreement was that I should write to her in Jamaica every Friday night and let her know how Dr. Muck conducted."

"Then you should remember something about his handling of this allegretto."

"I do; and the stately, not too slow, pace at which Dr. Muck played the opening melody impressed me as being just the right thing. I doubt whether I can ever consent to liking anything different."

The Conservative defended Mr. Fiedler for adopting a slow rate of speed in the second movement of the A major symphony on the ground of contrast. Beethoven's designation "allegretto" was of such elastic meaning that the conductor could choose any reasonable pace, slow or fast, that suited his fancy. Why not save the work as a whole from the reproach of too much lightness, and even of flippancy, by having one of its four divisions as serious as possible?

"Are you sure that the thing you really objected to," he questioned, "was not Mr. Fiedler's heavy violin tone rather than his slow pace? The string section of the orchestra has greater sonority today, you know, than it had four years ago; and unless you allow for this, music like that we are discussing sounds out of balance. A melody for violas, accompanied by 'cellos and double-basses, does not swing along so lightly when played by a Fiedler orchestra as when played by one such as Dr. Muck found in Boston when he first came here. Did not the beginning of the third movement compensate you for your disappointment in the second? Mr. Fiedler is the most honest of prospectors in the field of tone. If the metal he finds is lead, he calls it lead; but if it is gold, he lets you know what it is worth."

The Sophomore agreed that largeness of tone volume distinguished the new playing from the old, and he went so far as to say that any Beethoven score that is without heavy brass instrumentation to offset Mr. Fiedler's strings had better not be played at the Symphony concerts at all.

"It sounds antiquated, the best you can do with it," he explained. "I felt all the time that the orchestra was impatient to take hold of some modern work."

"Wait until after the holidays for that," said the Conservative. "Meanwhile, if the old-fashioned scoring must have a chance, let it be something with piano, like Rubinstein's Fourth concerto; and let Joseph Hofmann be the pianist. Mr. Hofmann can furnish the opposing color that is wanted and furnish it in such mass that our tone picture will be all in good balance."

The program of the ninth Symphony concert, which Mr. Fiedler rehearsed before the usual enthusiastic matinee audience, is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7, op. 92; Rubinstein, concerto, D minor, No. 4, for piano and orchestra, op. 70; Debussy, Rondes de Printemps; Images pour or-

Sylvain Noack, the second concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the Christmas symphony concerts Friday afternoon, Dec. 23, and Saturday evening, Dec. 24. He will play a new work, Lalo's concerto in F minor, op. 20. The other numbers of the program will be the prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel," Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," and the Brahms Academic overture.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

EVENING

ess

A Fine Concert

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, took place last night at the Lyric. A program of more than usual interest, with the addition of Joseph Hofmann as soloist, proved an attraction to many and drew forth a gathering of music-lovers that filled the auditorium.

The concert began with "The Roman Carnival" overture, by Berlioz. It was given a sparkling rendition by the orchestra. This overture is marked by the powerful individuality of the composer and his keen appreciation of tone color is shown in the brilliance of the scoring. Berlioz can truly be called the father of ultra-modern orchestration, as his passion for unprecedented orchestral combinations and gigantic mass-effects of tone practically revolutionized the art.

Many of his compositions are fantastic and seem almost grotesque in their ponderous display of pomp. However, this is not the case with "The Roman Carnival" overture. While the work is quite glaring and full of noisy outbursts, this exuberance is justifiable, for the overture really belongs in the realm of program music, depicting, as it does, gay carnival scenes.

The Fifth Symphony of Tchaikowski was the most important work of the evening. Mr. Fiedler gave it a big reading, characterized by many personal touches, some of which were perhaps too sentimental to add to the value of the work, while others increased its forcefulness. But under his baton the composition made its appeal as great music and its artistic significance and impressve tone moods were well delivered by the orchestra. The symphony is full of interest and contains many gorgeous effects of coloring. The themes are spontaneous, original and genuine, in turn expressing the dark somberness, melancholy and the warm-blooded and fiery impulsiveness of the Slavic temperament. The continued reoccurrence of certain thematic ideas combines the movements into a coherent and complete whole.

From the opening measures of the first movement, and throughout the andante, valse and finale the melodic beauty and variety of expression of the work gripped the emotions of the audience and there was a prolonged outburst of applause at the end. Mr. Fiedler gracefully shared honors with the gentlemen of the orchestra by having them rise and bow their acknowledgements.

An enthusiastic greeting was extended to Josef Hofmann, and the highest expectations of the audience were fully realized by his wonderful presentation of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto in G. Hofmann invested the performance of this concerto with lightness, elegance, breadth and dignity. The warmth and emotion of the interpretation lifted the work far above its usual interest for the hearer. Hofmann's remarkable facility of technic, his charming touch, his rare ability to graduate tone from sonorous fortissimo to feathery pianissimo, and last but not least, his masterful intellience, were all admirably set forth in his performance. The orchestral accompaniment was somewhat blurred in the lovely andante. It lacked in attack and precision. But the audience's appreciation of the soloist's playing was manifested by great applause and Hofmann was recalled again and again.

The program was fittingly closed with the beautiful Academic Festival overture of Brahms. F. C. B.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

ess

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT WOOLSEY HALL TONIGHT

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Josef Hofmann in Woolsey hall tonight will begin promptly at 8:15 and will last about an hour and 50 minutes. The program in full is as follows:

Weber—Overture—"Oberon."
Beethoven—Concerto for Piano in D minor.
Strauss—Tone poem, "Don Juan."
Sibelius—"Finlandia."
Soloist—Josef Hofmann.

Again it should be impressed upon the public that the "rush" seats will be sold at Woolsey hall at 7 o'clock tonight and the number admitted will be limited to the number of seats in the gallery. Moreover, but one seat will be sold to each purchaser.

[117]

SYMPHONY CONCERTS FOR CHRISTMASTIDE

Program Opens With Prelude to Humperdinck's Play, "Haensel and Gretel."

A program of light, graceful music has been arranged for the Christmas Symphony Concerts of December 23 and 24. The prelude to Humperdinck's charming musical play "Haensel and Gretel" will be the first number. This work abounds in German folk song and nursery rhymes of exquisite prettiness.

The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," which was played by the orchestra a week ago at one of the New York concerts with much success. Dvorak lived in the United States for some years and at one time intended to make this country his permanent home. His symphony is based upon negro melodies which he believed to be the proper folk songs of America. The other orchestral number will be "The Academic Festival" by Brahms.

The soloist will be Sylvian Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, who made so favorable impression a year ago when he appeared as soloist at one of the Symphony concerts. He has chosen a work which will be new to the great majority of patrons, as it has never been played at a Symphony concert. It is a concerto in F minor for violin, Opus 20, by the French composer Edouard Lalo. Lalo's "Symphonic Espagnole" has been admired here.

The Longy Club, composed of players of wind instruments in the Symphony Orchestra, will give its usual series of three concerts in Chickering Hall this Winter. This is the eleventh season and the members are the same with one exception as last year, the flutes being Messrs. A. Maquarre and A. Brooke; the oboes, Messrs. Longy and Lenom; the clarinets, Messrs. Grisez and Himart; the horns, Messrs. Hain and Lorbeer; the bassoons, Messrs. Sadony and Mosbach, with Mr. DeVoto as pianist. Mr. Mosbach is the new contra-bassoon of the Symphony Orchestra, and takes the place of Mr. Helleberg. The three concerts will be given on Monday evenings, December 26, February 13 and March 6.

The program for the first concert comprises a suite for flute, oboe, horn, 2 clarinets and 2 bassoons by Mouquet; a sonata for flute and piano by Woollett, played by Mr. Maquarre and Mr. DeVoto, and a serenade for 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 3 horns, 'cello and double bass by Dvorak. The assisting artists in this last number will be Messrs. Phair, horn; J. Keller, 'cello, and Huber, double bass.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From .....

Address .....

Date .....

BOSTON SYMPHONY HERE NEXT MONDAY

That nothing is left undone to get the finest results from the Boston Symphony orchestra is illustrated by an incident which happened a number of years ago. Mr. Gericke was then conductor of the orchestra and he got an idea that if the entire string choir had instruments of the same make, he would get a homogeniety of tone such as he had never been able to secure before. The suggestion had only to be made and Mr. Higginson ordered from a certain celebrated firm of violin makers in Vienna, 30 violins, 10 violas, 10 'cellos and eight double basses. The cost was enormous and Mr. Gericke's experiment was a complete failure. Many of these instruments are stored away in the loft of Symphony hall, Boston, covered with dust; some have been sold to other orchestras, but the money invested in them was practically irretrievably lost.

It is, however, experiments of this kind which have made the Boston Symphony what it is—the most expensive orchestra in the world. If there is a new instrument of popular make from which better results are expected, that instrument is bought immediately. The storeroom in Symphony hall is cluttered up with brass instruments and new-fangled wood-wind instruments and new-fangled tympani and the like which have been purchased and then on trial found wanting. No expense has ever been spared and it is felt that if one experiment out of a dozen is successful, the expense involved in the failures is more than justified.

And it is the same with men. A conductor of the orchestra may know of a certain particularly fine artist in Europe. He informs the management he wants him and more often than not the contract is made by cable. All this costs money but results justify it.

The first appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra in New Haven for six years will be in Woolsey hall, Monday eveing, December 12. Seats now on sale.

HOFMANN AMAZES BY GREAT POWER

Boy Prodigy Has Developed Into a Man of Remarkable Endurance.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Josef Hofmann was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concerts Friday afternoon and last night The boy prodigy has grown to be a strong iron-wristed man, able to play the terrible Rubinstein concerto in D minor.

To play the Rubinstein concerto two mighty arms and a sound constitution are necessary, as well as powers of endurance that would qualify one for a Marathon run.

This concerto was written to awaken appreciation and enthusiasm for the powers and technique of the performer, rather than to delight, please or entertain. It is the noisiest work ever composed for piano, although there is a passage of lovely song in the middle of it.

Hofmann thundered and banged and crashed upon the keyboard in a manner which caused the old-timers, who had heard Rubinstein himself perform this huge work, to nod their head approvingly and say:

"That is the way it should be played."

Hofmann was a pupil of Rubenstein and studied this work with the composer. There is no denying his amazing technique, and if he found it hard to play the cantabile movement with proper sympathy, one could make all allowances because of the incredible labors he had gone through.

The grand old Seventh Symphony of Beethoven was played with the joyousness and fire that characterizes Herr Fiedler and his orchestra. Isadore Duncan danced three movements of this symphony in Symphony Hall last season.

The Rondo de Printemps of Debussy was repeated from a recent concert, and after a second hearing one is compelled to admit that there is something Springlike about it, although it is hard to say what.

The "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner brought the concert to a flourishing finish.

From EVE. JOURNAL

Address New York City.

Date .....

Music

PERSPECTIVE is a remarkable thing, isn't it? Helpful—a solution of so many difficulties and so many perplexities.

Helpful, of course, because of its commentary of the inevitable in regard to realities.

The Japanese, as an instance, and as you well know, did without it and suffered in reality in consequence, in the graphic art.

In that art perspective is a matter of distance, but it may also be applied to music, when it becomes a matter of time-distance.

And it is most efficacious as a determiner of values.

There, for example, is Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World." It was played by the Boston Orchestra at the second of the latest pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall, on Saturday afternoon. The perspective of time-distance already stretches back over six years in regard to this work and it may not be too radical a thing to say that this determiner of values has begun an adjustment.

Dvorak, a Bohemian, of no great resilence in these United States, set out to show us, in this symphony, why and how there could be such a thing as American music. But it has solved nothing and as sheer music its power already seems faded.

No, it solved nothing, for the agitated question of American music is still with us and bears every indication of continuing to be with us for a considerable time to come. There are even a few people here and there in New York who are forward enough to be of the opinion that there can be no American music as such, until there is a conscious artistic America with an American individuality. But none or these few people are forward enough to prophesy when such things may be.

It is enough to hazard the guess that genuine American music will never be fashioned into any warp patterned after negro melodies, as in the case of Dvorak's symphony.

Dvorak's symphony, moreover, leaves the impression of sentimental optimism, and that alone would have defeated his purpose. If there is to be any real American music it must consider reality, just as German music and French music and Italian music at its best has done.

Nor does one mean realism by the use of the word reality.

Richard Strauss has achieved realism in sufficient quantity to make plain its limitations of matter and its obviousness of method and manner. The "Death and Transfiguration" tone poem, played with clarity and brilliance by the Boston Orchestra, proclaimed its emptiness by reason of the very clarity and brilliance.

The most grateful portion of the programme was the first piano concerto of Liszt, in which Josef Hofmann exhibited all his powers of tecnic and interpretation, and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. The Beethoven overture was a contrast of delight after Strauss and Dvorak for more reasons thon one.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

DEC 8

SECOND CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Berlioz Overture Excellently Presented Under Baton Of Max Fiedler.

JOSEF HOFMANN AS PIANIST OF EVENING

Superlative Artist Gave Beethoven's G-Major With Range Of Delicious Tone Color.

In assigning comparative rank to composers or to musical creations our judgments should be based upon the potency of three qualities in the men, or in the works, considered, viz.: Their fealty to the true nature of music as an emotional language, the clearness of their individuality as manifested in conception and manner, and the measure of adequate pertinency which they exhibit.

One should not attempt to make music express sentiments and philosopical theories, nor should it be debased into mimicry and the depiction of material conditions or events, for it is the language of the soul, and its source is far deeper than that from which reason and articulate speech receive their motive impulses. The emotional germs from which the erudite and inspired composer develops impartful moods are analagous to the sounds spontaneously induced by sensation.

Individuality is a more appropriate name for that which is commonly called originality, for a work may be new in every respect and at the same time be valueless, because it is the product of brain ingenuity and not the reflex of personal feeling. In order to depict the changing phases of mood incident to an extended composition with adequate pertinency a composer must have acquired such virtuosity in the technic of his art that its tenets never veil his fancy as he paints detail and arranges the perspective of his tonal picture.

This preamble was suggested by the somewhat prevalent, indiscriminate adoration of the old masters which seeks to exalt all of their creations up into a realm where criticism or even selection is almost sacreligious. Each of those immortals created some works which will continue to edify and enoble the human kind to the end of musical time, but each and all of them often wrote when inspiration was too weak to successfully withstand the insistence of routine. They endowed their best writings with characteristic individuality, which is in each case as recognizable as are the personal traits or features of our friends. Time is our final and inexorable judge of accomplishment, and it is gradually winnowing our heritage from the great past, and those who have the true interests of art at heart should not find fault with her edicts.

Persons who suspend judgment when Beethoven, Schubert, Mozart and Schumann are concerned would naturally be so incased in shells of conventionality as to shut out the appeals of Tschaikowski and the rest of the moderns. An erudite musician of this class recently said that Tschaikowski pleased the public, but that his vogue was bound to be ephemeral because of his demonstrative artificiality. This does not seem to be a fair judgment of the great Russian, for those who have heard enough of his product to be entitled to express an opinion must feel that he was true to his conceptions, stamped his strong individuality deeply into his music, and that he possessed astounding skill and versatility. Tschaikowski certainly created a new order of music. He was intense, whether expressing sorrow or joy—the former mood seeming to characterize a large proportion of his writings. Tschaikowski's two weaknesses were a tendency to become melodramatic and a kind of redundancy; but these flaws are only slightly regrettable, for they do not seriously mar his diction.

The Fifth symphony, which has been crowded out of publicity by the remarkable popularity of the Pathetic (No. 6), is a great work. From beginning to end it bears the Tschaikowski hall marks, never once suggestion an alien individuality. The first movement is composed of many episodes, which might have been better welded into unity than they were last evening. The second movement is the gem of the symphony, and it was beautifully played. Tschaikowski in this symphony furnishes each of the wood wind, rare opportunities to exhibit the special qualities of his instrument, and no one showed meager ability; they were, in fact, delightfully adequate. This work mirrors its composer's intensely emotional nature; its themes and their development are thoroughly individual, and its orchestral coloring is gorgeous, and still it is not likely to displace the "Pathetic" in public esteem.

Mr. Fiedler presented the following:

Berlioz—Overture, "The Roman Carnival," Op. 9
Tschaikowsky—Symphony No. 5, in E minor, Op. 64.
I. Andante; Allegro con anima.
II. Andante cantabile, con alcuna licenza
III. Valse; Allegro moderato.
IV. Finale: Andante maestoso; Allegro vivace.
Beethoven—Concerto in G major, No. 4, for Pianoforte, Op. 58.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Rondo: Vivace.
Brahms—Academic Festival Overture, Op. 80.

The Berlioz overture beautifully illustrates its composer's period-making ideas on the use of the orchestral instruments. This great Frenchman opened up a whole world of new colors in which his capable successors find unlimited resources. "The Roman Carnival" is festal, as its name implies, but it is light-footed joy which it expresses. This overture was better presented than its associate numbers on the evening's list.

One would have preferred hearing as superlative an artist as Josef Hofmann in something more pianistic, even if of less intrinsic musical value, than Beethoven's G major. He played this work with clear understanding and a wide range of delicious tone color, but in this day of aviation we like to hear one soar, if he be provided with the necessary paraphernalia. The Tschaikowski, Schumann, Liszt's E flat or Rubinstein's D minor would have better exhibited Hofmann's exceptional qualities as a pianist. The Brahms overture is a marvelous example of constructive skill. Moss-backed student songs are in it, spun and woven into a fascinating musical texture. That kind of an undertaking seems to have been uncommonly congenial to Brahms.

O. B. B.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From JOURNAL COURIER

Address .....

Date .....

Conductor Fiedler Makes Announcement for Monday's Concert—Hofmann to Play Rubenstein's Concerto in D Minor.

The most important event of the week will be the Boston Symphony concert in Woolsey hall on Monday evening at 8:15 o'clock. The six years that have passed since this famous orchestra last visited this city has seen it grow steadily in importance and favor. Artistically it has never had a rival in America since it was organized in 181 and now in point of patronage there is no orchestra that is even nearly a competitor to it. It is a conservative statement to make that the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the course of a season of seven months plays to twice as many auditors as any orchestra in this country. Its one hundred and seventeen concerts have an average of over 2,000 auditors and this is a record that would be hard to beat even in Europe for the same number of concerts.

The program which Max Fiedler, the conductor, offers for Monday evening is full of musical delights. It begins with Weber's "Oberon" overture in the opening of which are heard the wonderful fairy horns, which is one of the most remarkable musical effects in the entire literature of the orchestra. The overture itself is nearly one hundred years old and yt is as fresh, bright and colorful today as when it was written. It is a great tribute to the genius of Weber that his three great overtures are played practically every year by every orchstra in th world.

The symphony which follows will be that which is generally regarded as the greatest of Beethoven's—his Fifth in C-Minor. It is this symphony that opens with what the composer himself has called "Fate Knocking at the Door," the entire movement being played on four notes which serve as an introduction to the first movement. It had been Mr. Fiedler's intention to give one of the modern symphonies in New Haven, but so many requests came in for this great classic, that he decided to play this.

The other two orchestral numbers are Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan" and Sibelius's symphonic poem, "Finlandia." Mr. Fiedler has won great fame in America as an interpretor of Richard Strauss.

The soloist, Josef Hofmann, will play Rubinstein's Concerto in D-Minor. It it only fair to say that not since Paderewski first came to America, has any pianist received the glowing encomiums that have been bestowed upon this young Pole who suddenly has become one of the very greatest pianists in the world.

The program in order follows:

Weber—Overture, "Oberon."
Beethoven—Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.
Rubinstein—Concerto for piano in D Minor.
R. Strauss—Tone Poem, 'Don Juan."
Sibelius—"Finlandia."
Soloist—Josef Hofman.

Again it should be impresed upon the public that the "rush" seats will be sold at Woolsey hall at seven-thirty o'clock Monday evening and the number admitted will be limited to the number of seats in the gallery. Moreover, but one seat will be sold to each purchaser.

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN
DEC 11 1910

BIG SYMPHONY CONCERT HERE MONDAY NIGHT

Tomorrow brings the eagerly expected Boston Symphony concert in Woolsey hall with Joseph Hofmann as soloist. New Haven has taken it hardly that this great orchestra which up to a few years ago was a constant visitor here has let five years pass without a single concert. It is to be hoped that from now on it will appear at least once each season for a musical city like New Haven cannot well afford to let the greatest orchestra in the world pass it by, especially when the orchestra hails from so near a city as Boston.

The orchestra brings with it its entire personnel of 100 musicians, its famous conductor, Max Fiedler, who will be heard here for the first time, and likewise comes Josef Hofmann, who has been making such a tremendous sensation in musical circles this year with his extraordinary piano playing.

Mr. Fiedler has chosen a program which speaks well for the catholicity of his taste. It contains five numbers, one of which is the Rubinstein Concerto in D-Minor which Mr. Hofmann will play. Of the other four numbers two are the greatest representatives of the classical school and two of the most interesting representatives of the ultra modern school of composition. The concert opens with the ever-welcome "Oberon" overture of Weber, which will enable New Haven to hear at best advantage the famous horns of the orchestra. It is only fair to say that for a number of years the horns of the Boston Symphony hardly compared with the rest of the orchestra, but in the last three years they have been strengthened so that the orchestra today possesses two quarters of horns which can not be equalled by those of any orchestra in the world. The "Oberon" overture is one of the very masterpieces of its form and probably has more performances throughout the world in the course of a year than any other.

The Beethoven Symphony in C-Minor No. 5 follows the overture. This work is an imperishable legacy of the great master. It is one of those works which although over 100 years old, seems never to show age. Moreover, it is illustrative of the mind of the composer for which it is quite possible that if he had come 20 or 30 years later he might have given it a more elaborate orchestral dress, the fact remains that every effort that has been made to do so by his successors has failed utterly. In other words, the work is a perfect entity as it stands.

Richard Strauss, whose "Don Juan" will be played, is by all odds the most interesting figure in modern music. It is too soon to venture a guess how great he is or how important have been his contributions to the literature of music, but if he does not himself mark a new age in composition, it is certain that he is the beginning of one. His tone poems from the very beginning and his operas have excited as much bitter controversy as the works of Richard Wagner did when they were young, and today, while the acceptance of Strauss as a genius is much more general than it ever has been in the past, he still has bitter enemies. His "Don Juan" is one of his early ventures into the field of what he has called "tone poems." It is based on Lenau's poem of the gallant rake and by many is considered intrinsically a greater work than such huge things as the "Zarathustra" and the "Symphonia Domestica." It is exceedingly brilliant, demands a large orchestra and taxes the virtuosity of an orchestra to the utmost.

Sibelius, a man now in his forties, is a Finn and is easily one of the great composers of our day. He is more conservative than Strauss, clinging more closely to the classical form. An ardent patriot, his "Finlandia" which will be played as the final number on the program, is his outcry against the oppression of his native country by Russia.

As Hofmann was for many years the pupil of Rubinstein and by all odds the greatest pupil, there is no one better suited to play the greatest of Rubinstein's concertos. It will be one of his first performances of this work in America this year and it is one of the greatest things he does. The program in full is as follows:

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Symphony in C-Minor No. 5..... Beethoven
Concerto for Piano in D-Minor.... Rubinstein
Tone poem, "Don Juan"..... Strauss
"Finlandia" ..... Sibelius
Soloist—Josef Hofmann.

Again it should be impressed upon the public that the "rush" seats will be sold at Woolsey hall at 7 o'clock Monday evening and the number admitted will be limited to the number of seats in the gallery. Moreover, but one seat will be sold to each purchaser.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 14 1910

Sunday Orchestral Concerts.

The committee supporting the New York Philharmonic Orchestra met a real want when it fixed upon Sunday afternoons as the time for its Brooklyn concerts. The increase in attendance at the first concert this year over the largest evening audience drawn by Mr. Mahler and his superb orchestra last winter proved that there is a public in Brooklyn for the best orchestral music on Sunday afternoons.

But although that audience was a great gain upon those drawn during the Philharmonic's first season here, there is room for a still larger attendance. If Mahler and the great Philharmonic Orchestra are to become a regular feature in Brooklyn, adding greatly to the richness and variety of our life, the Academy should be crowded for these concerts, as it has come to be, after years of effort, for those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme of next Sunday is one well calculated to draw an outpouring of music lovers of all schools. The programme is entirely made up from the work of Tschaikowsky, including his Second Symphony, much less familiar here than the composer's fifth and sixth; his Suite No. 1 and his Violin Concerto in D Minor, to be played by Edward Dethier, whose work has made a strong impression during the past two seasons. It is not, however, a question of one concert or one programme, but of making the Philharmonic under Mahler a fixture in Brooklyn. That is a result valuable enough to justify the enthusiastic support of all music lovers.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

Rachmaninoff's magnificent symphony in E minor No. 2 is the principal feature of the second Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Musical Philadelphia is not unfamiliar with the work, for its first performance in America took place in this city a year ago and was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is many years since any new orchestral work of large dimensions has found such immediate favor with the public. The popularity of Elgar's symphony was largely the result of artificial stimulation. Rachmaninoff's symphony, however, has taken hold of the public much in the same manner as that of its great predecessor, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." Rachmaninoff frankly confesses that Tschaikowsky has established the ideal toward which he strives and traces of the influence of the great Russian can easily be found in this work.

Mr. Fiedler placed this on his second Boston program this Fall and so decided was its success that he repeated it in Boston three weeks later. On the last Southern trip he played it in Baltimore and New York and, curiously enough, wherever it has been played the applause given to it has overshadowed the applause given to the soloists on the same program.

One of the most interesting features of the present season is the manner in which Josef Hofmann has finally come into his own and has been admitted by the connoisseurs of America into that very small company of really great pianists of our age. His development along the lines of profundity and poignancy of emotion has been most remarkable. He has lost none of his mastery of the technique of his instrument, he has still his cunning in his mixture of pianistic colors and to these he has added a new emotional quality which has placed him quite in a class by himself. Here he will play Beethoven's C Major Concerto No. 4, a work which has been somewhat neglected by pianists in recent years. The other number on the program will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

The order of the program is as follows:—

Rachmaninoff....Symphony in E minor. No. 2
Beethoven..Concerto for piano in G major, No. 4.
Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonora," No. 3
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

From TOWN TOPICS
Address New York City
Date DEC 22 1910

The Pied Piper.

Concert phenomena of recent days included the Flonzaley Quartet's polished and delightful performances in the best chamber-music; Madam Sembrich's recital of folk-songs selected injudiciously but sung with real and rare art; the Boston Symphony seances, this time in familiar music played in a fashion none the less marvelous simply because we have grown accustomed [illegible] the Hub's phenomenal orchestra; Josef Hofmann's "reading" of the Beethoven G major concerto and his "rendering" of the one in E flat by Liszt, the former lucidly traditional, the latter brilliantly glittering, but lacking in the temperamental propulsion which the work arouses in Moriz Rosenthal for instance; and lastly, Mahler's Beethoven program, with Xaver Scharwenka giving a musicianly and rather subdued version of the "Emperor" piano concerto, and the conductor proclaiming some unaccustomed tempi and accentuations in the "Pastorale" symphony, that greatly over-rated work of the well-known Ludwig whom the inexorable laws of logic deny the creation of any real masterpiece if the dictum of the Beethoven fanatics be true that everything he ever wrote is a masterpiece.

STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
DEC 24 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at the Academy of Music Jan. 13.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 24 1910

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 13. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who will be heard here then for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with much interest. Young Elman has never spent tiresome hours in the study of scales and exercises—he just played, and played what he wanted to, and that only when he wanted to. From the beginning he has never allowed the violin to master him—he has been the master. He loves to make the violin do weird things for him by the hour. Yet he does not always feel like playing. There are many times when he prefers a game of chess or a day's sport in the country. A peculiar thing about the boy's playing is that he has never followed set rules. The first thing he played he picked out himself at the age of 4 on his father's violin. After that he played whatever he could and chose to. He never plays a composition the same way twice; every time he plays it he has a new point of view.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 24 1910

The third Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 13. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here then for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Conductor Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own, and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with much interest.

Mischa Elman early revealed himself as a master of his instrument, and a musician of large artistic stature. His success was instantaneous. Although he is only 19 years of age, and on the concert platform looks several years younger, Elman is entitled to the treatment accorded not to the prodigy but to the mature artist. He is a player of extraordinary accomplishments. His technique is sure and apparently equal to all possible demands, and he performs the most difficult feats with apparent ease. His tone is large, of silvery penetrating sweetness in runs and arpeggios, and rich and warm in cantabile. His intonation is true, even in the most complicated passages.

His playing is at once energetic and graceful, his phrasing finished and musicianly, and his style elevated and refined. Furthermore, a strong musical temperament is revealed in his playing, while his bowing is free, elastic and vigorous. Mischa Elma posseses complete confidence and repose, his first bow to the audience, before he begins, suggests his consciousness of past triumphs and expectation of others to come.

EVE. MAIL
New York City.
DEC 24 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third pair of Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14. At both concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year.

SUN
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2:30 o'clock. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year. There will of course be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

PRESS
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, at 8.15 and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2.30 o'clock. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance in New York this year. There will, of course, be two distinct programmes, Elman playing a different concerto at each concert.

AMERICAN
New York City.
DEC 25

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and on Saturday afternoon, January 14. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year.

There will, of course, be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

TIMES
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14, at 2:30 o'clock. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year. There will, of course, be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

WORLD
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

poem "Mazeppa."

Boston Symphony.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year. There will be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12 at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2:30 o'clock. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance in New York this year. There will, of course, be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

From EVE. JOURNAL
Address New York City.
Date DEC 27 1910

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14. At both concerts the solist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year. There will, of course, be a different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

[1197]

REGISTER
NEW HAVEN, CONN
DEC 11 1910

BIG SYMPHONY CONCERT HERE MONDAY NIGHT

Tomorrow brings the eagerly expected Boston Symphony concert in Woolsey hall with Joseph Hofmann as soloist. New Haven has taken it hardly that this great orchestra which up to a few years ago was a constant visitor here has let five years pass without a single concert. It is to be hoped that from now on it will appear at least once each season for a musical city like New Haven cannot well afford to let the greatest orchestra in the world pass it by, especially when the orchestra hails from so near a city as Boston.

The orchestra brings with it is entire personnel of 100 musicians, its famous conductor, Max Fiedler, who will be heard here for the first time, and likewise comes Josef Hofmann, who has been making such a tremendous sensation in musical circles this year with his extraordinary piano playing.

Mr. Fiedler has chosen a program which speaks well for the catholicity of his taste. It contains five numbers, one of which is the Rubinstein Concerto in D-Minor which Mr. Hofmann will play. Of the other four numbers two are the greatest representatives of the classical school and two of the most interesting representatives of the ultra modern school of composition. The concert opens with the ever-welcome "Oberon" overture of Weber, which will enable New Haven to hear at best advantage the famous horns of the orchestra. It is only fair to say that for a number of years the horns of the Boston Symphony hardly compared with the rest of the orchestra, but in the last three years they have been strengthened so that the orchestra today possesses two quarters of horns which can not be equalled by those of any orchestra in the world. The "Oberon" overture is one of the very masterpieces of its form and probably has more performances throughout the world in the course of a year than any other.

The Beethoven Symphony in C-Minor No. 5 follows the overture. This work is an imperishable legacy of the great master. It is one of those works which although over 100 years old, seems never to show age. Moreover, it is illustrative of the mind of the composer for which it is quite possible that if he had come 20 or 30 years later he might have given it a more elaborate orchestral dress, the fact remains that every effort that has been made to do so by his successors has failed utterly. In other words, the work is a perfect entity as it stands.

Richard Strauss, whose "Don Juan" will be played, is by all odds the most interesting figure in modern music. It is too soon to venture a guess how great he is or how important have been his contributions to the literature of music, but if he does not himself mark a new age in composition, it is certain that he is the beginning of one. His tone poems from the very beginning and his operas have excited as much bitter controversy as the works of Richard Wagner did when they were young, and today, while the acceptance of Strauss as a genius is much more general than it ever has been in the past, he still has bitter enemies. His "Don Juan" is one of his early ventures into the field of what he has called "tone poems." It is based on Lenau's poem of the gallant rake and by many is considered intrinsically a greater work than such huge things as the "Zarathustra" and the "Symphonia Domestica." It is exceedingly brilliant, demands a large orchestra and taxes the virtuosity of an orchestra to the utmost.

Sibelius, a man now in his forties, is a Finn and is easily one of the great composers of our day. He is more conservative than Strauss, clinging more closely to the classical form. An ardent patriot, his "Finlandia" which will be played as the final number on the program, is his outcry against the oppression of his native country by Russia.

As Hofmann was for many years the pupil of Rubinstein and by all odds the greatest pupil, there is no one better fitted to play the greatest of Rubinstein's concertos. It will be one of his first performances of this work in America this year and it is one of the greatest things he does. The program in full is as follows:

Overture, "Oberon" ..... Weber
Symphony in C-Minor No. 5..... Beethoven
Concerto for Piano in D-Minor.... Rubinstein
Tone poem, "Don Juan"..... Strauss
"Finlandia" ..... Sibelius
Soloist—Josef Hofmann.

Again it should be impressed upon the public that the "rush" seats will be sold at Woolsey hall at 7 o'clock Monday evening and the number admitted will be limited to the number of seats in the gallery. Moreover, but one seat will be sold to each purchaser.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 14 1910

Sunday Orchestral Concerts.

The committee supporting the New York Philharmonic Orchestra met a real want when it fixed upon Sunday afternoons as the time for its Brooklyn concerts. The increase in attendance at the first concert this year over the largest evening audience drawn by Mr. Mahler and his superb orchestra last winter proved that there is a public in Brooklyn for the best orchestral music on Sunday afternoons.

But although that audience was a great gain upon those drawn during the Philharmonic's first season here, there is room for a still larger attendance. If Mahler and the great Philharmonic Orchestra are to become a regular feature in Brooklyn, adding greatly to the richness and variety of our life, the Academy should be crowded for these concerts, as it has come to be, after years of effort, for those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme of next Sunday is one well calculated to draw an outpouring of music lovers of all schools. The programme is entirely made up from the work of Tschaikowsky, including his Second Symphony, much less familiar here than the composer's fifth and sixth; his Suite No. 1 and his Violin Concerto in D Minor, to be played by Edward Dethier, whose work has made a strong impression during the past two seasons. It is not, however, a question of one concert or one programme, but of making the Philharmonic under Mahler a fixture in Brooklyn. That is a result valuable enough to justify the enthusiastic support of all music lovers.

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

Rachmaninoff's magnificent symphony in E minor No. 2 is the principal feature of the second Boston Symphony concerts which will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening. Musical Philadelphia is not unfamiliar with the work, for its first performance in America took place in this city a year ago and was given by the Philadelphia Orchestra. It is many years since any new orchestral work of large dimensions has found such immediate favor with the public. The popularity of Elgar's symphony was largely the result of artificial stimulation. Rachmaninoff's symphony, however, has taken hold of the public much in the same manner as that of its great predecessor, Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic." Rachmaninoff frankly confesses that Tschaikowsky has established the ideal toward which he strives and traces of the influence of the great Russian can easily be found in this work.

Mr. Fiedler placed this on his second Boston program this Fall and so decided was its success that he repeated it in Boston three weeks later. On the last Southern trip he played it in Baltimore and New York and, curiously enough, wherever it has been played the applause given to it has overshadowed the applause given to the soloists on the same program.

One of the most interesting features of the present season is the manner in which Josef Hofmann has finally come into his own and has been admitted by the connoisseurs of America into that very small company of really great pianists of our age. His development along the lines of profundity and poignancy of emotion has been most remarkable. He has lost none of his mastery of the technique of his instrument, he has still his cunning in his mixture of pianistic colors and to these he has added a new emotional quality which has placed him quite in a class by himself. Here he will play Beethoven's C Major Concerto No. 4, a work which has been somewhat neglected by pianists in recent years. The other number on the program will be Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

The order of the program is as follows:—

Rachmaninoff....Symphony in E minor, No. 2
Beethoven..Concerto for piano in G major, No. 4.
Beethoven.....Overture, "Leonora," No. 3
Soloist, Josef Hofmann.

* * *

From TOWN TOPICS
Address
Date

The Pied Piper.

Concert phenomena of recent days included the Flonzaley Quartet's polished and delightful performances in the best chamber-music; Madam Sembrich's recital of folk-songs selected injudiciously but sung with real and rare art; the Boston Symphony seances, this time in familiar music played in a fashion none the less marvelous simply because we have grown accustomed to it from the Hub's phenomenal orchestra; Josef Hofmann's "reading" of the Beethoven G major concerto and his "rendering" of the one in E flat by Liszt, the former lucidly traditional, the latter brilliantly glittering, but lacking in the temperamental propulsion which the work arouses in Moriz Rosenthal for instance; and lastly, Mahler's Beethoven program, with Xaver Scharwenka giving a musicianly and rather subdued version of the "Emperor" piano concerto, and the conductor proclaiming some unaccustomed tempi and accentuations in the "Pastorale" symphony, that greatly over-rated work of the well-known Ludwig whom the inexorable laws of logic deny the creation of any real masterpiece if the dictum of the Beethoven fanatics be true that everything he ever wrote is a masterpiece.

STANDARD UNION,
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
DEC 24 1910

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at the Academy of Music Jan. 13.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 24 1910

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 13. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, who will be heard here then for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with much interest. Young Elman has never spent tiresome hours in the study of scales and exercises—he just played, and played what he wanted to, and that only when he wanted to. From the beginning he has never allowed the violin to master him—he has been the master. He loves to make the violin do weird things for him by the hour. Yet he does not always feel like playing. There are many times when he prefers a game of chess or a day's sport in the country. A peculiar thing about the boy's playing is that he has never followed set rules. The first thing he played he picked out himself at the age of 4 on his father's violin. After that he played whatever he could and chose to. He never plays a composition the same way twice; every time he plays it he has a new point of view.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEC 24 1910

The third Brooklyn concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 13. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here then for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Conductor Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own, and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with much interest.

Mischa Elman early revealed himself as a master of his instrument, and a musician of large artistic stature. His success was instantaneous. Although he is only 19 years of age, and on the concert platform looks several years younger, Elman is entitled to the treatment accorded not to the prodigy but to the mature artist. He is a player of extraordinary accomplishments. His technique is sure and apparently equal to all possible demands, and he performs the most difficult feats with apparent ease. His tone is large, of silvery penetrating sweetness in runs and arpeggios, and rich and warm in cantabile. His intonation is true, even in the most complicated passages.

His playing is at once energetic and graceful, his phrasing finished and musicianly, and his style elevated and refined. Furthermore, a strong musical temperament is revealed in his playing, while his bowing is free, elastic and vigorous. Mischa Elma posseses complete confidence and repose, his first bow to the audience, before he begins, suggests his consciousness of past triumphs and expectation of others to come.

EVE. MAIL
New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third pair of Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14. At both concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year.

SUN
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2:30 o'clock. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year. There will of course be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

PRESS
New York City.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, at 8.15 and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2.30 o'clock. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance in New York this year. There will, of course, be two distinct programmes, Elman playing a different concerto at each concert.

AMERICAN
New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and on Saturday afternoon, January 14. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year.

There will, of course, be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

TIMES
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14, at 2:30 o'clock. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year. There will, of course, be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

WORLD
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

poem "Mazeppa.

Boston Symphony.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year. There will be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
DEC 25 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12 at 8:15 and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2:30 o'clock. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will make his first appearance in New York this year. There will, of course, be an entirely different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

From EVE. JOURNAL
Address New York City.
Date 27

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14. At both concerts the solist will be Mischa Elman, who will then make his first appearance in New York this year. There will, of course, be a different programme for each concert, Mr. Elman playing different concertos.

rk, 18

[119]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From ____

Address ____

Date New York City DEC 9 '10

From the Hub

THE audiences of the Boston Symphony Concerts are unquestionably the largest and most discriminating of this city. And their size and their appreciation are as creditable to ourselves as to the musicians. These lovers of the best music are, we think, somewhat grateful to Mr. Fiedler when he introduces in his programmes Beethoven and the other real giants of the past to counteract the sensationalism of the modern composers as typified by Richard Strauss. The Lenore overture, for instance, came recently like a strong health-giving breath of air after the heated over-perfumed atmosphere of a close room.

However, it is not for us dwellers in the outer darkness to criticise either Mr. Fiedler or his band of artists, but to enjoy.

The métier of the critic is, after all, the expression of the ideas of one man, more or less governed by his special temperament. His verdict neither makes nor mars composition or composer, except in the case of those timid persons who dare not think for themselves. Perhaps the musical critic, more than any other, is the victim of prejudice. We were informed the other day by a—presumably youthful—critic in one of our leading weeklies that persons who do not agree with him in his love for Debussy, and others of that school, are "dull, ignorant and narrow."

This, if true, is mortifying news for the many professionals and amateurs who have so far failed to agree with him.

n EVE. POST.

ress New York City.

Mischa Elman will be the soloist at the next two Carnegie Hall concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on January 13 and 14.

m STANDARD UNION,

ress BROOKLYN, N. Y. DEC 31 1910

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at the Academy of Music Friday evening, Jan. 13. Mischa Etman will be the soloist.

iblished: London, 1881; New York,

m Daily Times

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

e DEC 31 1910

Mischa Elman is announced to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole at his appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn on January 13.

m Daily Citizen,

ress Brooklyn, N. Y

e DEC 31 1910

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 13, has elected to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole." It will be the first time that he has played this work in Brooklyn and the performance will be awaited with much interest. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer. It is exceedingly melodious, is full of atmosphere and is a work most grateful to the instrument.

m Daily Eagle,

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEC 31 1910

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Syymphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 13, is to play Lalo's Symphony Espagnole for the first time in Brooklyn. It is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer, is exceedingly melodious, full of atmosphere and is most grateful for the instrument.

m EVE. MAIL

ress New York City.

te DEC 31 1910

Mischa Elman will give only one recital in New York during the coming month, but he will appear twice in Carnegie hall and once in Brooklyn with the Boston Symphony orchestra in different concertos. Thursday evening, January 12, at the first concert of the Boston orchestra, he will play Lalo's Spanish symphony and in the afternoon he will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

ess ____

SCORES OF STOLEN OPERAS RETURNED

Young Man Who Had Them Is Held by the Police.

The prize opera scores which were stolen last Saturday from one of the Adams Express Company's wagons, standing in front of a cigar factory at 320 East 63d street, have been recovered. They were taken to the East 104th street police station early yesterday morning by a man who said that the thieves had turned them over to him for safe keeping. Walter Damrosch, the musical director, was delighted when the police told him over the telephone that they had found the scores. He said he would go around to the police station later in the day and identify them.

The box in which these scores were packed was one of two that Damrosch shipped last Saturday to George W. Chadwick, head of the Boston Conservatory of Music. Both Damrosch and Chadwick were judges in the contest for the $10,000 prize offered by the Metropolitan Opera Company, "to encourage American composers." Damrosch had already inspected six of the manuscripts and was forwarding them to Chadwick. The other judges were Alfred Hertz and Charles Loeffler. The latter is head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The express driver picked up the boxes at Damrosch's house, 140 East 61st street. He stopped in front of the cigar factory in East 63d street and left the wagon in the street to go inside and get some more packages. When he came out one of the boxes containing the operatic scores was gone.

Says Man Gave Them to Him.

The man who returned the stolen scores said he was Dennis Higgins, twenty-four years old, a driver, of 228 East 64th street. He told the police that last Saturday he met two men on East 63d street, who thrust a bundle into his hands and asked him to hold it.

Higgins was taken down to Police Headquarters and from there to the Yorkville Police Court, where James McComber, an agent of the Adams Express Company, made a complaint of larceny against him. George Engels, Damrosch's secretary, was also present in court.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

JAN 1 - 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14, respectively, has elected to play at the evening concert Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. On Saturday evening Mr. Fiedler has selected Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the principal number, and for Saturday afternoon the Second Symphony of Sibelius, in D major, will be the principal work.

AMERICAN

New York City.

JAN 1 - 1911

Boston Symphony.

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14, respectively, has elected to play at the evening concert Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," which he has never played here. On Saturday afternoon he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. For Thursday evening Mr. Fiedler has selected Beethoven's Seventh Symphony as the principal number, and for Saturday afternoon the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major will be the chief work performed.

n PRESS

ress New York City.

e ____

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14, respectively, has decided to play at the evening concert Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." On Saturday afternoon he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. For Thursday evening Fiedler has selected Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the principal number, and for Saturday afternoon the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major.

n ____

ess ____

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Jan. 13, has elected to play Lalo's symphony, "Espagnole." It will be the first time that he has played this work in Brooklyn, and the performance will be awaited with much interest. Lalo's symphony, "Espagnole," is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer. It is exceedingly melodious, is full of atmosphere and is a work most grateful to the instrnment.

From MORN. TELEGRAPH

Address New York City.

Date ____

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14, respectively, has elected to play at the evening concert Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," which he has never played here. Saturday afternoon he will play the Mendelssohn "Concerto." Thursday evening Mr. Fiedler has selected Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" for the principal number and for Saturday afternoon the "Second Symphony" of Sibelius in D Major will be the principal work.

n SUN

ress New York City.

JAN 1 - 1911

e ____

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, January 12, and Saturday afternoon, January 14, respectively, has elected to play at the evening concert Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, which he has never played here. On Saturday evening Mr. Fiedler has selected Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the principal number, and for Saturday afternoon the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major will be the principal work.

TIMES

s New York City.

JAN 1 1911

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 12, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14, respectively, has elected to play at the evening concert Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, which he has never played here. On Saturday evening Mr. Fiedler has selected Beethoven's seventh symphony for the principal number and for Saturday afternoon the second symphony of Sibelius in D major will be the principal work.

n WORLD

ress New York City

e ____

Boston Symphony.

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Jan. 12 and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14 respectively, has elected to play at the evening concert Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole which he has never played here. On Saturday afternoon he will play the Mendelssohn Concerto. On Thursday evening Mr. Fiedler has selected Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the principal number and for Saturday afternoon the Second Symphony of Sibelius in D major will be the principal work.

STANDARD UNION,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

ss ____

JAN 7 1911

In the Music Hall of the Academy next Friday evening, Howard Brockway will give the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[120]

rom STAATS ZEITUNG

ddress New York City.

ate ____

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Der Spielst der kommenden Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester-Konzerte, welche am Abend des 12. resp. am Abend des 14. Januars in Carnegie Hall stattfinden, ist Herr Mischa Elman, welcher Lalo's „Spanische Symphonie" resp. das Mendelsohn'sche Violinkonzert vortragen wird. Herr Fiedler wird am Donnerstag die Beethoven'sche Siebente und am Samstag die Zweite Symphonie von Sibelius dirigiren.

Das New Yorker Symphonie-Orchester unter Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch spielt im kommenden Konzert am Nachmittag des 6. Januar die Brahms'sche Vierte Symphonie und Johann Strauß' Walzer „Seid umschlungen, Millionen". Die Solistin Frl. Yolanda Merö wird das Liszt'sche A-Dur-Konzert mit Orchesterbegleitung spielen, welches Stück sie auch im Konzert am kommenden Sonntag Nachmittag im New Theatre zum Vortrag bringen wird. In dem letzterwähnten Konzert dirigirt Herr Damrosch Mendelsohn's „Italienische Symphonie" und das Liszt'sche Tonpoem „Mazeppa".

Im nächsten Konzert der Russischen Symphonie-Gesellschaft in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 19. Januar wird die Einleitung und der Hochzeitszug aus Rimsky Korsakoff's Oper „The Golden Cockrel" zum ersten Mal aufgeführt werden.

Das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester veranstaltet am 13. Januar unter den Auspizien des Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences ein Konzert in der Brooklyner Academy of Music.

n EVE. POST.

ress New York City.

JAN 1 1911

Humperdinckiana.

The Boston Symphony Ochestra will play "Tangier—In a Moorish Café" from Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" at its Carnegie Hall concert on Thursday evening next week, and at the Saturday afternoon concert it will play the Prelude to the same composer's "Hänsel and Gretel."

To Mr. Gatti-Casazza Professor Humperdinck has sent the following letter:

Before leaving New York I feel compelled to thank you most cordially, dear director, for the sympathy and energy which you devoted to the preparation of my "Koenigskinder." It was your earnest coöperation which assured the warm and splendid reception which the New York public gave to my work. I beg you also to thank all the gentlemen on the board of directors of the Metropolitan Opera Company, as well as the most admirable artists to whom so much of the success of my opera is due. With every expression of admiration and friendship, I remain yours faithfully,

ENGELBERT HUMPERDINCK.

Daily Times,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 7 1911

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the distinguished Russian violinist, who makes his reappearance in Brooklyn on this occasion. It is an interesting fact that this is the third consecutive season in which this remarkable artist has appeared with the Boston Symphony as soloist, and this in itself is a most unusual tribute not only to his art, but to the affection in which he is held by the musical public. The engagement of a soloist with the Boston Orchestra for three consecutive years is quite unprecedented, usually an artist does not appear more than once in two or three seasons, but Elman is such a favorite and Mr. Fiedler has such high regard for his artistry, that this third engagement was made last year immediately after his series of performances with the orchestra. Mr. Fiedler brings nothing new or startling for this concert. In fact, the first part of his programme will be very classical, beginning, as it does, with Handel's Overture in D major No. 1, and ending with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The overture by Handel has not been played by the orchestra in several years, and in fact, it has almost disappeared from the modern repertory. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is the one characterized by Wagner as "the apotheosis of the dance." The last number, the "In a Moorish Cafe" movement from Humperdinck's "A Moorish Rhapsody," has been chosen purely as a tribute to the distinguished composer, whose new opera was so lately performed for the first time at the Metropolitan Opera House. Mr. Elman will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony, an important work which has not been much used by violinists of late.

rom EVE. POST.

ddress New York City.

ate JAN 7 1911

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, January 12, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2:30, bring Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. This is the third consecutive year in which Elman has appeared here as the soloist with the Boston Symphony. Both programmes contain a tribute to Humperdinck, who has been so much in the public eye of late, for his name appears on each of them. Thursday's includes: Handel, Overture in D major No. 1; Beethoven, Symphony in A major No. 7; Lalo, Symphonie Espagnole; Humperdinck, "Tangier—In a Moorish Café." Saturday's programme comprises: Humperdinck, Prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel"; Sibelius, Symphony in D major No. 2; Mendelssohn, Concerto for Violin; Wagner, Overture, "Tannhäuser."

rom Daily Citizen,

ddress N. Y.

ate JAN 7 1911

Howard Brockway is to give the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening. The lecture recital will be in music hall of Academy of Music, on Thursday, at 4 p. m.

Daily Citizen,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 7 1911

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, Jan. 3, at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who makes his reappearance in Brooklyn on this occasion. It is an interesting fact that this is the third consecutive season in which this remarkable artist has appeared with the Boston Symphony as soloist, and this in itself is a most unusual tribute not only to the perfection of his art, but to the affection in which he is held by the musical public. The engagement of a soloist with the Boston Orchestra for three consecutive years is quite unprecedented, usually an artist does not appear more than once in two or three seasons, but Elman is such a favorite and Mr. Fiedler has such high regard for his artistry, that this third engagement was made last year immediately after his series of performances with the orchestra.

Here he will play Lalo's "Spanish" symphony, a work which is not very often heard nowadays, for violinists, like most other mortals, are bound to follow fashion and move in a more or less narrow circle in respect to the works they play, and Lalo's Spanish symphony for the last five or six years has been rather outside of that circle. Nonetheless, it is one of the finest works of its kind, for it is not only grateful to the instrument, but contains very high musical merit.

Mr. Fiedler brings nothing new or startling. In fact, the first part of his programme will be very classical, beginning as it does with Handel's overture in D major No. 1, and ending with Beethoven's seventh symphony. The overture by Handel has not been played by the orchestra in several years, and, in fact, it has almost disappeared from the modern repertory. It emphasizes the fact that in the middle of the eighteenth century an overture did not necessarily mean what it does to-day, for it is merely a part of a suite in two movements.

Beethoven's seventh symphony is the one characterized by Richard Wagner as "the apotheosis of the dance."

The last number has been chosen purely as a tribute to the distinguished composer whose new opera was so lately performed for the first time in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. It is the second movement of Humperdinck's suite entitled "A Moorish Rhapsody" and the name of the movement is "Tangier—A Moorish Cafe." This was first played in America a number of years ago by Mr. Gericke, and it is one of peculiarities of programme-making that it does not often appear in symphony concerts.

EVE. MAIL

ss New York City.

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given Thursday night and Saturday afternoon. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will play the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole on Thursday evening and the Mendelssohn concerto Saturday afternoon. On Thursday evening Max Fiedler will include Handel's Overture in D major, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony and an excerpt from Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody." On Saturday afternoin the orchestral numbers will be Humperdinck's prelude to "Haensel und Gretel," the symphony in D major by Sibelius and the Tannhauser overture. Mischa Elman will also be the soloist in the Brooklyn concert Friday night.

Daily Eagle,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

JAN 7 1911

The third Boston Symphony concert is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, January 13, at 8:15 o'clock, with Mischa Elman, the distinguished Russian violinist, who makes his reappearance here as the solo artist. This is the thirdconsecutive season in which he has appeared with this Symphony society as soloist, and in itself it is a most unusual tribute not only to the perfection of his art, but to the affection in which he is held by the musical public. The engagement of a soloist with the Boston Orchestra for three consecutive years is quite unprecedented, usually an artist does not appear more than once in two or three seasons but Elman is a favorite. He is to play Lalo's Spanish Symphony, a work not often heard nowadays, for violinists, like most other mortals are bound to follow fashion and move in a more or less narrow circle in their selections. Lalo's Spanish Symphony for five or six years has been rather outside of that circle. Nonetheless, it is not only grateful to the instruments but it has also very high musical merit. Mr. Fiedler brings nothing new or startling. The first part of his programme will be emphatically classical, beginning with Handel's Overture in D Major No. 1 and ending with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The Handel Overture has not been played by the orchestra in several years; it has almost disappeared from the modern repertory. It emphasizes the fact that in the middle of the eighteenth century an overture did not necessarily mean what it does to-day, for it is merely a part of a suite in two movements. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony was characterised by Richard Wagner as "the apotheosis of the dance" and the one on which more or less unwelcome notoriety has been placed in recent years by the effort of a dancer to interpret it with her feet. Mr. Fiedler is especially happy in his interpretation of this work and wins much applause with his performances of it. The last number has been chosen purely as a tribute to the distinguished composer whose new opera was recently produced for the first time in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. It is the second movement of Humperdinck's suite entitled "A Moorish Rhapsody" and the name of the movement is "Tangier—A Moorish Cafe." This was first played in America years ago by Mr. Gericke and it is one of peculiarities of programme-making that it does not often appear in symphony concerts. The programme in order of playing is as follows:

Handel—Overture in D major, No. 1.

Beethoven—Symphony in A major, No. 7.

Lalo—Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra.

Humperdinck "In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody."

Soloist—Mischa Elman.

From EVENING SUN,

Address New York City.

Date

Mischa Elman opens his third American tour with a round of visits as the star of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With that virtuoso band, he plays Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Mendelssohn's violin concerto on Saturday afternoon.

Jan Sibelius's Second symphony is the magnum opus of the matinée. Both programmes have a timely piece by Humperdinck, one his "Tangier" and the other his prelude to "Hansel and Gretel."

EVE. GLOBE

s New York City.

JAN 7 1911

are on the programme.

Mischa Elman, violinist, will be the soloist at both concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall next week, playing Thursday evening, Jan. 12, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14, the Mendelssohn concerto. The orchestral numbers Thursday night will be Handel's D major overture, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and "Tangier—In a Moorish Café" from Humperdinck's "A Moorish Rhapsody." Saturday afternoon the orchestra will be heard in the prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel," Sibelius's second symphony in D major, and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture.

HERALD

ess New York City.

Mr. Mischa Elman will make his reappearance next Thursday evening in Carnegie Hall, when he will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra, with the Boston Orchestra. At the Saturday afternoon concert of the same organization the young Russian violinist will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

m MORN. TELEGRAPH

ress New York City.

e JAN 8 1911

On Monday evening at the Academy of Music the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give their third Philadelphia concert with Mischa Elman as soloist.

STANDARD UNION,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 8 1911

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, Jan. 13. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the distinguished Russian violinist, who makes his reappearance in Brooklyn on this occasion. It is an interesting fact that this is the third consecutive season in which this remarkable artist has appeared with the Boston Symphony as soloist, and this in itself is a most unusual tribute, not only to the perfection of his art, but to the affection in which he is held by the musical public. The engagement of a soloist with the Boston Orchestra for three consecutive years is quite unprecedented; usually an artist does not appear more than once in two or three seasons, but Elman is such a favorite, and Mr. Fiedler has such high regard for his artistry, that this third engagement was made last year immediately after his series of performances with the orchestra. Here he will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony, a work which is not very often heard nowadays, for violinists, like most other mortals, are bound to follow fashion, and move in a more or less narrow circle in respect to the works they play, and Lalo's Spanish Symphony, for the last five or six years, has been rather outside of that circle. Nonetheless, it is one of the finest works of its kind, for it is not only grateful to the instrument, but contains very high musical merit. Mr. Fiedler brings nothing new or startling. In fact, the first part of his programme will be very classical, beginning as it does with Handel's verture in D major No. 1, and ending with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The overture by Handel has not been played by the orchestra in several years and, in fact, it has almost disappeared from the modern repertory. It emphasizes the fact that in the middle of the eighteenth century an overture did not necessarily mean what it does to-day, for it is merely a part of a suite in two movements. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is the one characterized by Richard Wagner as "the apotheosis of the dance," and the one on which more or less unwelcome notoriety has been placed in recent years by the effort of a dancer to interpret it with her feet. Mr. Fiedler is especially happy in his interpretation of this work and wins much applause with his performances of it. The last number has been chosen purely as a tribute to the distinguished composer whose new opera was so lately performed for the first time in the Metropolitan Opera House, in Manhattan. It is the second movement of Humperdinck's suite, entitled "A Moorish Rhapsody," and the name of the movement is "Tangier: A Moorish Cafe." This was first played in America a number of years ago by Mr. Gericke, and it is one of the peculiarities of programme making, that it does not often appear in symphony concerts.

n TIMES

ess New York City.

JAN 8 1911

e

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Jan. 12, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14, at 2:30, brings Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. This is the third consecutive year in which Elman has appeared here as soloist with the Boston Symphony. On neither programme is there anything startling or unusual, but both programmes contain a tribute to Humperdinck, who has been so much in the public eye of late.

The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture in D major, No. 1.....Handel
Symphony in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven
Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra.....Lalo
"Tangier—In a Moorish Cafe".....Humperdinck
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel."..... Humperdinck
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Sibelius
Concerto for violin in E minor....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Tannhauser".....Wagner
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

From STANDARD UNION,

Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date JAN 8 1911

Howard Brockway is to give the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Friday evening next. The lecture recital will be in Music Hall, Academy of Music, on Thursday next at 4 P. M.

Arthur Foote;

HERALD

ess New York City.

MISCHA ELMAN, a Russian violinist, will be the soloist for the third Boston Symphony concert, to be given next Friday evening in the Academy of Music. It is an interesting fact that this is the third consecutive season in which this artist has appeared with the Boston Symphony as soloist. This is a most unusual tribute to the perfection of his art. The engagement of a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three consecutive years is quite unprecedented, but Mr. Elman is such a favorite and Mr. Fiedler has such high regard for his artistry that this third engagement was made last year immediately after his series of performances with the orchestra. Here he will play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," a work which is not very often heard nowadays, for violinists, like most other mortals, are bound to follow fashion and move in a more or less narrow circle in respect to the works they play.

Mr. Fiedler brings nothing new or startling. In fact, the first part of his programme will be very classical, beginning with Handel's Overture in D major No. 1 and ending with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony is the one characterized by Richard Wagner as "the apotheosis of the dance."

The last number has been chosen purely as a tribute to the distinguished composer, whose new opera was so lately performed for the first time in the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. It is the second movement of Humperdinck's suite entitled "A Moorish Rhapsody," and the name of the movement is "Tangier: In a Moorish Café." This was first played in America a number of years ago by Mr. Gericke, and it is one of the peculiarities of programme making that it does not often appear in symphony concerts.

WORLD

ess New York City.

e JAN 3 1911

Boston Symphony.

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, Jan. 12, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 14, at 2.30, brings Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. This is the third consecutive year in which Elman has appeared here as soloist with the Boston Symphony, which in itself is a rather remarkable tribute to his standing in art, for there is no precedent of such an engagement. On neither programme is there anything startling or unusual, but both programmes contain a tribute to Humperdinck, who has been so much in the public eye of late, for his name appears on each of them.

The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture in D Major, No. 1.....Handel
Symphony in A Major, No. 7.....Beethoven
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra.....Lalo
"Tangier—In a Moorish Cafe".....Humperdinck
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel"...Humperdinck
Symphony in D Major, No. 2.....Sibelius
Concerto for violin in E Minor.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

n SUN

ress New York City.

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, January 12, at 8:15, and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2:30, brings Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. This is the third consecutive year in which Elman has appeared here as soloist with the Boston Symphony, which in itself is a rather remarkable tribute to his standing in art, for there is no precedent of such an engagement. On neither programme is there anything startling or unusual, but both programmes contain a tribute to Humperdinck, who has been so much in the public eye of late, for his name appears on each of them. The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Handel.....Overture in D major, No. 1
Beethoven.....Symphony in A major, No. 7
Lalo.....Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra.
Humperdinck....."Tangier—In a Moorish Café"
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Humperdinck....Prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel"
Sibelius.....Symphony in D major, No. 2
Mendelssohn.....Concerto for Violin in E minor
Wagner.....Overture, "Tannhäuser"
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

Lilla Ormond's song recital will take place at Mendelssohn Hall on Wednesday at 3 P. M. ess PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JAN 3 - 19

The third concert of the Boston Symphony course will be given this evening at 8:15 o'clock in Infantry Hall, with Mischa Elman, violinist, as soloist.

[121]

MORN. TELEGRAPH

New York City

JAN 8 1911

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening, January 12, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, January 14, at 2.30, brings Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. This is the third consecutive year in which Elman has appeared here as soloist with the Boston Symphony, which in itself is a rather remarkable tribute to his standing in art, for there is no precedent of such an engagement. On neither programme is there anything startling or unusual, but both programmes contain a tribute to Humperdinck, who has been so much in the public eye of late, for his name appears on each of them.

The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture in D-Major, No. 1.....Handel
Symphony in A-Major, No. 7.....Beethoven
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra..Lalo
"Tanagier—In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody".....Humperdinck

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel".....Humperdinck
Symphony in D-Major, No. 2.....Sibelius
Concerto for violin in E-Minor.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

Humperdick's "A Moorish Rhapsody" was played here in 1899 in its entirety by Mr. Gericke.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

JAN 8 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, brings Mischa Elman as soloist on both occasions. This is the third consecutive year in which Elman has appeared here as soloist with the Boston Symphony. On neither programme is there anything startling or unusual, but both programmes contain a tribute to Mr. Humperdinck, who has been so much in the public eye of late.

The programme for Thursday evening is as follows:

Overture in D major, No. 1.....Handel
Symphony in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven
Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra.....Lalo
"Tangier—In a Moorish Café".....Humperdinck
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

The programme for Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel"..Humperdinck
Symphony in D major No. 2.....Sibelius
Concerto for violin in E minor.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Tannhäuser".....Wagner
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

New York City

PRESS

JAN 8 1911

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening at 8.15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon at 2.30, will bring forward Mischa Elman as soloist. This marks the third consecutive year the young Russian violinist has appeared here with the Boston orchestra, which in itself is a rather remarkable tribute to his reputation, as there is no precedent to such an engagement. There is nothing startling or unusual on this week's programmes, but both contain a tribute to Humperdinck, who has been so much in the public eye of late. Here they are: Thursday—Handel, overture, in D major No. 1; Beethoven, symphony in A major No. 7; Ialo, Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra; Humperdinck, "Tangier—In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody." Saturday—Humperdinck, prelude to "Haensel und Gretel"; Sibelius, symphony in D major No. 2; Mendelssohn, concerto for violin; Wagner, overture, "Tannhauser."

Humperdinck's "A Moorish Rhapsody" was performed in 1899 in its entirety by Gericke.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

NEWS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, in Providence, will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 3. This will mark the first appearance in America this year of the distinguished Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. Elman has just arrived in this country. He has been playing with enormous success this fall in London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna, and from all accounts his art is even more remarkable than it was a year ago, when he appeared here with the orchestra.

It is probable that he will play Bruch's "Concerto" in G-minor, No. 1, one of the most grateful works in the literature of the violin. The full program of the concert will be announced in a few days.

STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

DEC 25 1910

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das dritte Paar der diesjährigen Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 12., resp. Nachmittag des 14. Januar mit Herrn Mischa Elman als Solisten statt. Die Programme werden später bekannt gegeben werden.

Die Solisten der Konzerte der New Yorker Symphonie-Gesellschaft unter Leitung von Herrn Walter Damrosch am 6. und 8. Januar im New Theatre ist Frl. Yolanda Mero, welche Liszt's A Dur-Konzert mit Orchesterbegleitung spielen wird. Das Programm umfaßt am Freitag Brahms' Vierte Symphonie und Kompositionen von Dvorak und Johann Strauß und am Sonntag Mendelssohn's Italienische Symphonie und Liszt's Tonpoem „Mazeppa".

Das Programm der unter Gustav Mahler's Leitung am 3. und 6. Januar in Carnegie-Hall stattfindenden Philharmonischen Konzerte wird nur aus französischen Werken bestehen, unter denen sich Novitäten von Debussy und Chabrier befinden werden. In beiden Konzerten wirkt der MacDowell gemischte Chor unter Leitung von Herrn Kurt Schindler mit. Solist: Herr Edmond Clement.

Das Konzert der Philharmoniker am 27. Dezember Abends, resp. 30. Dezember Nachmittags bringt ein Tschaikowsky-Programm, und zwar die zweite Symphonie, die Suite No. 1 und das Violin-Konzert, gespielt von Herrn Edouard Dethier.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

NEWS

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be given in Infantry hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 3d. The soloist will be, Mischa Elman the distinguished Russian violinist, whose first appearance in America this season it will be.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JAN 3 1911

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 3. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the distinguished Russian violinist, whose first appearance in America this season it will be.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third Boston Symphony concert in Providence will be given in Infantry Hall on Tuesday evening, Jan. 3. This will mark the first appearance in America this year of the distinguished Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. Elman has just arrived in this country. He has been playing with enormous success this fall in London, Berlin, Paris and Vienna, and from all accounts his art is even more remarkable than it was a year ago when he appeared here with the orchestra.

It is probable that he will play Bruch's "Concerto" in G-minor, No. 1, one of the most grateful works in the literature of the violin. The full programme of the concert will be announced in a few days.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

From

Address

Date

DEC 25

The third Boston Symphony concert on Tuesday evening, Jan. 3, will mark the first appearance in America this year of the Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, who has just arrived in this country. It is probable that he will play Bruch's Concerto in G-minor No. 1.

Established Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

NEWS

DEC 9

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, at its concert here on next Tuesday evening, has notified Mr. Fiedler that he has changed his mind about the concerto he will play here. It has been originally planned for him to play the Bruch Concerto in G-Minor No. 1 but now he has elected to play the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole. This is even a more brilliant and effective work than the Bruch and decidedly less hackneyed.

[122]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

TRIBUNE

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Fiedler has announced the programme of the third Boston Symphony concert which is to be given in Infantry Hall one week from to-night, Jan. 3. Tickets are to be on sale at Steinert's Saturday morning. The first number will be the exquisite prelude to Humperdinck's fairy opera "Haensel and Gretel." Then will come the so-called "American" Symphony of Dvorak, "From the New World," which has not been heard here in ten years having been played here on the 14th of November, 1900. The other orchestral numbers will be the charming Valse triste of Sibelius and the stirring "Finlandia" of the same composer.

The soloist, Mischa Elman, will play Bruch's Concerto in G Minor No. 1, which is one of the most graceful works for the violin in musical literature. The coming of Elman to Providence again is awaited with much interest by the numerous lovers of the violin in this city.

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

DEC 3

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, who will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert here next Tuesday evening, has notified Mr. Fiedler that he has changed his mind about the concerto he will play here. It had been originally planned for him to play the Bruch Concerto in G-Minor No. 1, but now he has elected to play the Lalo Symphonie Espagnole. This is even a more brilliant and effective work than the Bruch and decidedly less hackneyed.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

DEC 31 1910

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TUESDAY

The third visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, comes on next Tuesday evening, Jan. 3, when with Mischa Elman as soloist, it gives its concert in Infantry Hall. The mere fact that Elman is to play is sufficient to crowd the hall to its utmost capacity, but in addition to his presence Mr. Fiedler has arranged another one of his characteristically effective programs. It will be Elman's first appearance in America this year. He landed in New York week before last, and begins his season here in Providence, and plays a number of times with the Boston Symphony in Boston, and in the large cities of its regular Southern trip. Here he has elected to play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," a work which is one of the best in the literature of the violin, and has the added merit of not being hackneyed.

It is called a symphony, but it is only one in name, for it takes the form of a concerto, with more movements than the classic three, but none the less, it is a concerto.

The orchestral numbers will be the Prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel," Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," and two pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, a "Valse Triste" and "Finlandia." Humperdinck's fairy opera, "Haensel and Gretel," is one of the jewels of operatic literature. The good old fairy story of "Babes in the Woods" has been made into an opera, and Humperdinck has written for it some of the most exquisitely lovely music that we have. Whenever it is given in New York at the Metropolitan, the house is crowded to its utmost capacity, and a very large part of the audience is children. Humperdinck himself has been in this country for the last few weeks, superintending the rehearsals, and first performance anywhere of his new fairy opera, "Die Koenigskinder," or "The King's Children," which had its first performance on any stage at the Metropolitan, in New York, on last Wednesday evening.

Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony was the principal work of the Bohemian master while he was sojourning in America in the early '90s. It caused a vast amount of discussion at the time as to whether it was based on American melodies, and although it is fairly well known now that it is almost purely Bohemian, none the less, the beauty of its melody, the spirit which pervades it and the charm of its composition has made it one of the most popular symphonies we have.

Sibelius' name is not unknown to Providence, as Mr. Fiedler has played some works of his here in the past. The "Valse Triste" is almost a salon piece, very exquisite and dainty, and the "Finlandia" the outcry of a great patriot, tremendously stirring and appealing.

The program in order is as follows:

Humperdinck—Prelude to the opera "Hansel and Gretel."

Dvorak—Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."

Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra.

Sibelius—(a) Valse Triste.
(b) "Finlandia."

Soloist—Micha Elman.

TRIBUNE

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

JAN 1 - 1911

Mischa Elman's First American Appearance Here This Week.

The third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra comes on next Tuesday evening January 3rd, when with Mischa Elman as soloist it gives its concert in Infantry Hall. The mere fact that Elman is to play is sufficient to crowd the hall to its utmost capacity, but in addition to his presence Mr. Fiedler has arranged another one of his characteristically effective programmes. It will be Elman's first appearance in America this year. He landed in New York week before last and begins his season here in Providence and plays a number of times with the Boston Symphony in Boston and on the large cities of its regular southern trip. Here he has elected to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, a work which is one of the best in the literature of the violin and has the added merit of not being hackneyed.

It is called a symphony but it is only one in name for it takes the form of a concerto, with more movements than the classic three, but none the less, it is a concerto.

The orchestral numbers will be the Prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel", Dvorak's Symphony "From the New World" and two pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, a "Valse Triste" and "Finlandia." Humperdinck's fairy opera "Haensel and Gretel" is one of the jewels of operatic literature. The good old fairy story of "Babes in the Woods" has been made into an opera and Humperdinck has written for it some of the most exquisitely lovely music that we have. Whenever it is given in New York at the Metropolitan, the house is crowded to its utmost capacity and a very large part of the audience is children.

Humperdinck, himself, has been in this country for the last few weeks superintending the rehearsals and first performance anywhere of his new fairy opera, "Die Koenigskinder," or "The King's Children" which had its first performance on any stage at the Metropolitan in New York last Wednesday evening.

Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony was the principal work of the Bohemian master while he was sojourning in America in the early '90's. It caused a vast amount of discussion at the time as to whether it was based on American melodies and although it is fairly well known now that it its almost purely Bohemian, none the less, the beauty of its melody, the spirit which pervades it and the charm of its composition has made it one of the most popular symphonies we have.

Sibelius' name is not unknown to Providence as Mr. Fiedler has played some works of his here in the past. The "Valse Triste" is almost a salon piece, very exquisite and dainty, and the "Finlandia" the outcry of a great patriot, tremendously stirring and appealing.

The programme in order is as follows:

Prelude to the opera, "Hansel and Gretel".....Humperdinck
Symphony No. 5, "From the New World".....Dvorak
Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra.....
(a) Valse Triste.....Lalo
(b) "Finlandia".....Sibelius
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

Two numbers on the programme of the third Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening are expected to be of especial interest just now. One is the prelude to Humperdinck's fairy opera, "Hansel und Gretel," one of the jewels of recent operatic music. The same composer's latest opera, "Konigskinder," whose production last week is described in this column, has naturally renewed interest in his former work. The other number will be Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony. The discussion which raged when this was first presented some years ago as to whether it was properly classed as an "American" symphony has been revived this season by its rendition in Boston. It was questioned whether the composer had really based his work on any melodies which could be classed as distinctively American, the general verdict among musical critics having come to be that it is more Bohemian than American. A similar discussion over Puccini's new opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," has been referred to in this column. The last two orchestral numbers will be by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, his "Valse Triste" and "Finlandia."

The soloist is to be Mischa Elman, perhaps the most popular violinist now before the public of this country. This will be his second appearance here with the orchestra. He will play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole, a work which, though less familiar than many other concertos, is nevertheless of much interest.

NEW YORK

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

1911

Symphony Orchestra To-night.

To-night brings to Infantry Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its third concert. Mischa Elsman, the great Russian violinist, will be the soloist. The programme is as follows.

Humperdinck: prelude to the opera, "Ransel und Gretel:" Dvorak: symphony No. 5, "From the New World;" Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra; Sibelius: (a) Valse triste (b) "Finlandia."

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 3 - 1911

The third concert of the Boston Symphony course will be held this evening in Infantry hall with Mischa Elman, violinist.

HARTFORD, CONN.
JAN 3 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, to be given at the Parsons Theater Monday evening, January 16, will afford the public the first opportunity to hear Anton Witek, the new concert-meister of the orchestra, who will perform the Mendelssohn violin concerto at the coming concert.

Mr. Witek made his Boston debut some weeks ago, playing the Beethoven concerto, a performance which aroused great enthusiasm and established Mr. Witek's reputation as one of the best finds of the orchestra and easily among the greatest violinists of the world. These concerts, of which there are three, are the musical events of each season. Reserved seats may be obtained at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JAN 3 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tonight brings at Infantry Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, for its third concert. Mischa Elman, the great Russian violinist, will be the soloist. The program is as follows:

Humperdinck—Prelude to the opera, "Hansel und Gretel."
Dvorak—Symphony No. 5, "From the New World."
Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra.
Sibelius—(a) Valse triste.
(b) "Finlandia."
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

From HERALD
Address Washington, D. C.
Date JAN - 1 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 10, at 4:30 o'clock. This will bring again as soloist for the second consecutive year the greatest of Russian violinists, Mischa Elman. Curiously enough, he is to play this time the Lalo Symphony Espagnole. He was announced to play it last year and the programme so had it, but at the last moment it was found impossible to have a rehearsal of it, and he played Dvorak's "Concerto" instead. The Symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

From TIMES
Address Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 1 1911

Boston Symphony.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 10, at 4:30 o'clock.

This will bring again as soloist for the second consecutive year the greatest of Russian violinists, Mischa Elman, who is to play this time the Lalo Symphony Espagnole. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

From POST
Address Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 1 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given at the National on Tuesday afternoon, January 10, at 4:30 o'clock. This will bring again as soloist for the second consecutive year the greatest of Russian violinists, Mischa Elman. He is playing this time the Lalo Symphony Espagnole. He was announced to play it last year, and the program so had it, but at the last moment it was found impossible to have a rehearsal of it, and he played Dvorak's concerto instead. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

Journal
Providence, R. I.
Jan 4 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Large Audience Hears Boston Orchestra in Brilliant Programme.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season in Infantry Hall last night before an audience which filled the house. The attendance at the present series of concerts is destined, evidently, to be a record-breaker. In view of the bad weather last evening a smaller audience might naturally have been looked for, but there were scarcely any empty seats, and the hall presented the same crowded appearance that has distinguished the two previous concerts. It has taken a long time, but the orchestra has made its influence adequately felt at last.

The programme, of exceptional brilliancy and attractiveness, presented the following numbers.

Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel"...Humperdinck
Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.....Dvorak
I. Adagio; Allegro molto.
II. Largo.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.
Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra. Op. 21 .....Lalo
I. Allegro non troppo.
IV. Andante.
V. Rondo: Allegro.
a. Valse triste, Op. 44.
b. "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7.....Sibelius

Dvorak's "New World" symphony, which formed the chief dish of this very agreeable menu, has an interest to an American audience quite apart from its musical value owing to the circumstances under which it was composed and the long-sustained controversy to which it gave rise. It is nearly 20 years since Dr. Dvorak came to this country to preside over a conservatory of music in New York founded on a most ambitious scale. It was a fine advertisement for the budding institution to have at its head one of the greatest—many thought the very greatest—of living composers. Also the handsome honorarium provided for his services was welcome to the doctor, who, though famous, was by no means rich. However, the Bohemian composer's stay was briefer than was hoped for. He was totally unfitted to fill an administrative position, he did not like New York, and the call of his native country proved too strong for him to resist. So he went back home again. But during his sojourn here he composed this symphony and one or two other pieces, ostensibly by way of showing American composers how they might deal with the musical material at hand.

It was one of the projects of the visionary woman who founded the conservatory and brought Dr. Dvorak over here, to build up a distinguished school of "American" music. Starting with the theory that the distinctive characteristics of the music of the older countries were rooted in their "folk-songs", Dr. Dvorak was importuned to discover—what nobody else has ever been able to do—the American folk-song. The best he could do was to point to the negro plantation melodies as the nearest approach to anything resembling the article sought, and in this symphony he made use of themes, not directly borrowed from but more or less resembling them. Without stopping to revive the interminable discussion as to whether these melodies are typical of anything American, it may be suggested that the Bohemian composer perhaps deceived himself. The themes of which he made such excellent use are of a character common to the traditional melodies of many ancient lands and primitive races. Were these particular ones not labelled "negro" or "American" they might pass for Gaelic or Slavonic or half a dozen other types. Dr. Dvorak merely turned to the sort of material with which he was already familiar when he set about composing an "American" symphony.

The origin, in any event, is a matter of slight consequence. The "New World" symphony is a fine piece of music, and long ago won recognition abroad as well as here on its merits. It is several years since it was last played here by the Boston orchestra, and its spirited performance last night was a distinct source of pleasure. The delicately beautiful prelude to Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" and the brace of charming and highly original pieces by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius, filled out the orchestral portion of the programme most satisfactorily.

The soloist was the talented young Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, who chose for his offering Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra. A brilliant work, but of no great musical depth. Composed originally for the Spanish violinist Sarasate, the solo part clings persistently to the upper register, a point where Sarasate's impeccable tone and delicately finished style were particularly effective. Elman, too, has the technic to handle it with supreme success and this he did last night. The work is long, and he played but three of its five movements. As a matter of course he was liberally applauded.

The fourth concert by the orchestra will be given on Tuesday evening, Feb. 14.

W. A. P.

From EVE. STAR
Address Washington, D. C.
Date JAN 1 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 10, at 4:30 o'clock. This will bring again as soloist for the second consecutive year the greatest of Russian violinists, Mischa Elman. He is playing the Lalo Symphony Espagnole. He was announced to play it last year, and the program so had it, but at the last moment it was found impossible to have a rehearsal of it, and he played Dvorak's concerto instead. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

EVE. TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy on January 9. The soloists will be Micha Elman, who will be heard here for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms Concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own, and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with great interest.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau
News
Providence, R.I.
Jan 4

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT BEST YET GIVEN IN SERIES

The most brilliant audience of the season at the series of the Boston Symphony orchestra concerts, assembled at Infantry hall, last evening, and the bad weather rather seemed to increase than decrease the number of music lovers, who came expecting a real treat and were certainly not disappointed. In fact, it has been noticeable that this season there has been a much larger attendance at these concerts than in previous years.

With such an orchestra, with such a soloist and with such a program, it is not surprising that the large audience displayed its manifest appreciation in no uncertain way, and Dr. Max Fiedler, the conductor of this magnificent aggregation of players, had good reason to feel proud of the results. The program was:

Humperdinck, prelude to "Hansel und Gretel;" Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95, (I) Adagio: Allegro molto, (II) Largo, (III) Scherzo, (IV) Allegro con fuoto.

Lalo, Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, Op. 21, (I) Allegro non troppo, (IV) Andante, (V) Rondo: Allegro; sibelius, (a) Valse triste, Op. 44, (b) "Finlandia," symphonic poem for orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7.

It is doubtful if a program of more exceptional brilliancy could have been presented to Providence music lovers, and while every number was given in a manner that was as near perfection as is customary under Dr. Fiedler's direction, perhaps the greater part of the audience was principally attracted by the appearance of the soloist, that more than talented young Russian violinist, Mischa Elman, who surpassed even the most sanguine expectations.

Elman seems to have improved since his last visit to Providence, if that is possible, and he was able to demonstrate his splendid technique in his choice of selection, Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, a work that is noted among violinists for its unusual brilliancy, and never, perhaps, has this work been heard to better advantage, even at the hands of Pablo Sarasato, for whom it was written. The work is so long that Elman played but three of the five movements, and closed in a burst of applause.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony, proved to be of unusual interest, because the composer, whether rightfully or wrongfully, was under the impression that this work is made up of melodies that are typical of American music, and although this has been a matter of discussion for years the question has never been definitely settled to the satisfaction of many musicians. The fact remains that it is a splendid work, and was received with marked pleasure last evening.

Humperdinck's prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," and the two selections from the works of Sibelius were all played in a manner worthy of this splendid orchestra, and the entire performance was one that will long be remembered in Providence, certainly among musicians and music lovers.

The next concert of the Boston symphony orchestra will be given on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 14.

ITEM

The following announcement appears in the home programmes of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"His Honor, the Mayor, has notified the management of Symphony Hall that, unless the law relating to the wearing of hats by ladies at public entertainments is obeyed at the symphony rehearsals and concerts, he may be forced to revoke the license of the Symphony Hall."

This would mean an end of the Boston Symphony concerts.

It is hoped that the ladies who patronize these concerts will come to the aid of the management in this matter.

The law will be strictly enforced.

EVE. BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Notes

At the third concert of its series, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 9, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be assisted as soloist by Mischa Elman, the violinist, who will be heard here for the first time this season, playing the Brahms concerto.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Pa.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 9. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here then for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms Concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own, and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with much interest.

[123]

NORTH AMERICAN
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert of the season here in the Academy of Music on the evening of January 9. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, will be the soloist. He will play, at his own request, the Brahms concerto.

RECORD
Philadelphia, Pa.

tour of America.

—The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 9. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here then for the first time this season. Elman has sent word that he wishes to play here the Brahms Concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own, and his performance will be awaited with interest.

—One of the most interesting musical [illegible]

PRESS
Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 9. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here then for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms Concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with much interest.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

MADE A NOTE OF

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 9. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms Concerto.

EVE. TELEGRAPH
Philadelphia, Pa.

Music Notes.

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Academy of Music on January 9, has elected to play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." It will be the first time he has played this work in Philadelphia. The "Symphonie Espagnole" is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer, and is melodious and full of atmosphere. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

EVE. BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 9. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the violinist, who will be heard for the first time this season, his number being Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

ARTICLE PEELED AWAY

Cutting Bureau in the World

LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEC 31

THE PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

PROGRAMME:

1. Humperdinck—Vorspiel, "Die Koenigskinder." rt—Symphony, in C major.
owsky—Variations on a Rococo
e, for 'cello and orchestra.
Herman Sandby.
dsen—Overture, "Carnival in Paris."

London

isual large audience heard the ex-performance of the Philadelphia ra at the Academy yesterday on. Mr. Pohlig had invited Engel-mperdinck, with whom he is well d, to appear as guest-conductor formance of excerpts from the from the ha of the com-fansel und Gr l." But the so engro d in the r the New ork premiere day evening t he found o come, and it as left fo d conductor to close, e here, the melod quali part of the opera. was ot y interesting music: it er dull, until the ting the "royal" theme we eard fullest martial dev ment e close. There seeme be any definite thread of ul-ugh there ve many sta s of a here we no gi dissona tions, be su nonies te to e ear; bu not nough tha in ensive. In ohlig's painstaking nd the ability of the sion, e work made er ta e, negative and On is quite willing h the rest of the was given a lluminative in-and profundity makes it the rlyle said of poch in Schu-arliest. It is is great sym-man of 33. It nal impression and makes the n the effort of e and fatuous. ome near the truth he horn passage in elestial visitant glid-ing about in the orchestra, and not less lovely is the conversation of the 'cellos elsewhere in the movement. In the light-hearted and delicately fingered scherzo is a waltz movement of typical Viennese gaiety and abandon, palpably anticipating Strauss.

From first to last, the music failed at no moment to command the devout attention of the hearers. Those who are to enjoy its repetition at this evening's concert are to be felicitated on their coming good fortune.

Mr. Sandby, the well-liked first 'cellist of the orchestra, was at his best in the performance of the Tschaikowsky variations, last heard when played by Alwin Schroeder with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, two seasons ago. Mr. Pohlig showed good judgment in diminishing the orchestral entourage somewhat, for besides the absence of the heavy brasses allowed for in the score, some of the strings were permitted to remain in the wings. The orchestra followed the soloist "con amore," in a spirit of cordial helpfulness imitative of their conductor's example. Mr. Sandby evoked a mellow and well-rounded singing voice from his instrument in the cantabile passages, displayed an entirely accurate intonation which was not to be defeated by prodigious difficulties of fingering, and scampered up to the tip of the fingerboard in thumb position as though it were child's play. It is satisfactory to find Mr. Sandby developing the spiritual side of his art. He did more than astonish by his adroit manipulation of arpeggios and clear-cut harmonics; there was thought as well as technique in his performance. For an encore, after several recalls, he gave his own effective setting of a pathetic Scandinavian folk-song, heard at his own recital last winter. It is something in the temper of Ole Bull's "Solitude on the Mountains"; it reaches the heart-strings.

The finale was Svendsen's "Carnaval" overture—here also there in its stressfulness bringing to mind the more lucid intervals of "Till Eulenspiegel." It is delightful if not especially distinguished music, and the folk-song that preceded it appropriately linked it with the remainder of one of the best of the many good programmes Conductor Pohlig and the orchestra have given us this season.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its third concert of the season in the Academy of Music on the evening of January 9. Mischa Elman will then play the Lalo "Symphony Espagnale." The orchestra, under the baton of Max Fiedler, will interpret the "Seventh Symphony" of Beethoven.

INQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 9, has elected to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. It will be the first time he has played this work in Philadelphia and the performance will be awaited with much interest. Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole is the best-known of the works of this rather neglected French composer. It is intensely melodious, is full of atmosphere and is most grateful to the instrument. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Academy of Music, on Monday evening, January 9, has elected to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. It will be the first time he has played this work in Philadelphia and the performance will be awaited with much interest. Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer. It is intensely melodious, is full of atmosphere and is most grateful to the instrument. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

From PUBLIC LEDGER

Address Philadelphia, Pa.

Date

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 9, has elected to play Lalo's" Symphonie Espagnole." It will be the first time he has played this work in Philadelphia, and the performance will be awaited with much interest. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer. It is intensely melodious, is full of atmosphere and is most grateful to the instrument. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

RECORD

ess

JAN 1911

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, January 9, will play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. It will be the first time Elman has played this work in Philadelphia. Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole is intensely melodious, full of atmosphere and is most grateful to the instrument. The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7.

om NEWS

ldress Baltimore, Md.

ate

Elman Will Be Heard With Boston Symphony

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 11. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here for the first time this season. Mr. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fielder that he wishes to play here the Brahms Concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own.

[124]

ess

EVENING SUN BALTIMORE, MD.

DEC 4 1910

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT

At Lyric, January 11—Uischa Elman Will Play.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, January 11. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here for the first time this season.

Mr. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms Concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with much interest.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

SUN

s

DEC 25 1910

Boston Symphony Coming.

The third concert of the present Baltimore series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, January 11. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, who will be heard here for the first time this season. Elman has sent word to Mr. Fiedler that he wishes to play here the Brahms Concerto. It is a work that he has made peculiarly his own, and his performance will be awaited by music lovers with much interest.

ss

DEC 27 1910

TOPICS DISCUSSED BY STAR READERS.

William E. Walter Asserts Frederic E. Haskin in Error.

QUESTION OF SCHOOLS SHOULD BE SETTLED

Francis B. Livesey Writes About the Mockers of Peace.

Editor The Star: In your issue of December 17 you published a letter from one Frederic J. Haskin in which he makes the extraordinary statement that no compositions of the late Edward MacDowell were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra until after his death. It is a great pity that gentlemen who write special correspondence for newspapers do not make sure of their facts before they make flat statements of this kind. Perhaps, however, this is only a part of the general movement to make out that Mr. MacDowell was grievously neglected by his countrymen during his life, which is very far from the truth.

So far as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is concerned the first work of Mr. MacDowell's it performed was his Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra, No. 2, in D minor, op. 23, which was played in Boston on April 12, 1889, with Mr. Gericke as conductor and with the composer himself as soloist. Since 1889 MacDowell's name has appeared on Boston Symphony programs in Boston and elsewhere 66 times and a total of six of his compositions are regularly in the repertoire of the orchestra. Since 1889 hardly a year has passed that some work of his has not been played, which is a more generous portion than is given to any other minor composer of the world.

WM. E. WALTER.

Boston, Mass., December 23, 1910.

om

ldress

ate DEC 31 1910

TRIO AT LEHMANN'S

Members Of Boston Symphony To Be In Fortnightly Concert.

The Schuecker Trio, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the feature of an elaborate concert to be held by the Fortnightly Music Club, at Lehmann's Hall, on Tuesday evening, January 10. Heinrich Schuecker is the celebrated harpest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who has attracted much attention from music lovers by his skillful interpertation of harp melody. Miss Florence M. Giese is the founder and director of the Fortnightly Music Club.

rom

EVENING SUN BALTIMORE, MD.

ddress

ate DEC 31 1910

ELMAN SELECTS PROGRAM

Will Play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole At Third Concert.

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening, January 11, has selected to play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." It will be the first time that he has played this work in Baltimore and the performance will be awaited with much interest.

Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer. It is exceedingly melodious, is full of atmosphere and is a work most grateful to the instrument.

NEWS

ess Baltimore, Md.

e

Boston Symphony, With Elman, Soloist, Coming

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 11, will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." It will be the first time that he has played this work in Baltimore, and the performance will be awaited with much interest. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer. It is exceedingly melodious, is full of atmosphere and is a work most grateful to the instrument.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

n

ress

JAN 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its third concert here in the Lyric Theater on Wednesday evening, January 11, has elected to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. It will be the first time that he has played this work in Baltimore, and the performance will be awaited with much interest. Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole is the best known of the works of this rather neglected French composer. It is exceedingly melodious and is full of atmosphere.

Baltimore Journal, Mittwoch, den 4. Januar 1911.

☞ Lyric-Theater. — Am Mittwoch, den 11. Januar, Abends um 8.15 Uhr, wird das Boston Symphonie-Orchester unter der bewährten Leitung von Kapellmeister Max Fiedler ein Conzert geben, bei welchem Violinist Mischa Elman als Solist auftreten wird. Bei diesem Conzert wird Lalo's spanische Symphonie zum ersten Male in Baltimore gespielt werden, und man sieht dem Stück in musikalischen Kreisen mit großem Interesse entgegen. Es ist ein äußerst melodisches Stück und das bestbekannte Werk des französischen Componisten.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

om EVENING SUN

dress

te

PROGRAM FOR THIRD CONCERT

Mischa Elman, The Russian Violinist, To Be Soloist.

Mischa Elman, the great Russian violinist, who already has been heard here twice with the Boston Symphony, last year and the year before, will be the soloist at its third concert, to be given in the Lyric Theatre on next Wednesday evening, January 11.

Elman here will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony, a work which, despite its name, is really a concerto and one of the most grateful pieces of its kind in the literature of the violin.

The program in its order is as follows:

Prelude to Hansel und Gretel, Humperdinck.

Symphony in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World".....(Dvorak.

Spanish symphony (for violin and orchestra).....Lalo.

Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration".....Strauss.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1910

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE CONTRASTS OF DVORAK AND LALO

Mr. Noack Plays a Novel Concerto for Violin by the Parisian Composer, and Mr. Fiedler Makes the Bohemian's "American" Symphony the Long Item of the Programme—The Over-Neglected Lalo as the Concerto Exemplified Him — The Over-Popular Dvorak as His Turn Went in the Symphony—The Suggestion of Both

MR. NOACK, the violinist, who was the "soloist" at the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon, has discovered a mislaid concerto by an overlooked composer. Wandering virtuosi have played frequently in Boston Edouard Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra; from time to time the overture to his opera, "Le Roi d'Ys" appears on the programme of a Symphony Concert; now and then at the "Pops" the conductor ventures a single fragment, misnamed "La Source," of his ballet, "Namouna." More of Lalo's music, Boston, like other cities in America, does not know except on occasions so rare that it is forgotten between. European cities are in no better case. By grace of the violinists, they hear the "Spanish Symphony"; by grace of the conductors, the overture to "Le Roi d'Ys." The Opéra-Comique does keep the whole opera in its repertory, usually for "popular" Monday nights or for semi-popular Sunday evenings; but when the Opéra, a few years ago, tried to revive "Namouna," which, beyond most ballets is full of fanciful and pictorial music, its regular public would have none of the piece. Lalo was not indeed prolific, because he meditated his work too long and finished it too carefully to be such. Some of his music he polished until he had worn away all the vitality by which it could endure. A little more is frankly outmoded. Yet enough remains, though conductors and virtuosi overlook it, to make Lalo a far more considerable and individual composer than even the connoisseurs believe. Lalo's music was not liked in its time, which was the seventies and the eighties, in Paris, and the "tradition" has descended to another musical generation. He shares, too, for the moment the partial eclipse of the French composers that immediately preceded the men of our time. Between the musical sons of Franck and Debussy and his brood, Lalo, Chabrier and the rest of their generation have fallen into undeserved neglect. "Carmen," after all, was fortunate for Bizet.

Lalo wrote the concerto that Mr. Noack played yesterday for his friend Sarasate, who played it in Paris in the seventies, with every answering sign of intelligent liking for it. Yet before the concerto had really made its way he wrote also the "Spanish Symphony," and henceforth for most of the violinists he was a composer of only one piece. Yet the concerto seems quite as deserving of them and of those that hear them. Both indeed are intrinsically symphonic pieces in which the solo violin plays "with" the orchestra rather than in distinction from it. Nowhere in the concerto does Lalo subordinate the band and exalt the solo instrument; with an artistry that hides its long meditation, he has fused both into a proportioned whole. He respects his close form; yet he uses it elastically, for he designed the concerto to run in two long movements—a slow introduction and a long allegro; an andante that should be pure instrumental song and a gaily brilliant finale. He spends tireless pains that his music may invite the finer voice of the violin, for which he had a singularly sensitive feeling; but he is sedulous in his care of the idiosyncrasies of the other instruments and of instrumental coloring as a whole. With true French economy and sensitiveness of means, he would not have a note wasted or uncharacteristic.

As in the "Spanish Symphony," the music is woven to an exceeding fineness of texture. Every strand is perceptible to the the ear, but almost always—in Mr. Noack's and Mr. Fiedler's version of it—delicately perceptible. The melodic ideas of themselves are of a like delicate fineness. Lalo, after all, was the forerunner of the musing and wistful melancholy that is the fashion and even the temperament of the generation of French composers that has succeeded him. The Andante of the concerto is of their pensive song, without their novel harmonies, but with a grace of moving line, a felicity of tender shading and a quiet intensity of sentiment that are of Lalo's meticulous fineness of expression. Like Delius in quite another vein, he seems to choose consciously every note. Yet, having chosen, he sets it unforcedly, flowingly in its place.

A Gallic charm that at moments is bright gaiety, runs as brightly through the rhythmic play of the finale. It was not in Lalo to be exuberant, but he could be playful and with light and sure fingers. His embroidery there and in the first Allegro both runs and shimmers. It is a grace to the music of the concerto; it graces the violin, as display will when fancy and artistry touch it, and the half-tints of tonal color that expressed Lalo's curiously secretive temperament glint it. Mr. Noack chose to make the characteristic melody, and the whole vein of the first movement, of Lalo's delicate and contemplative sentiment. Yet the music itself seems to hint of a warmer feeling, an ample, if no less polished song, and a less subdued fire. Mr. Noack's style is not broad; it is all finesse of spun tone, of polished phrases and adroit accent. His tone itself is very fine, sweet and penetrating; it imparts the intricacies and the delicacies of the music and the feeling behind. It is suave to a fault, meticulous, though without dryness, to a degree. It exactly suited the light brightness of the finale and the pensive and subtly varied song of the Andante. Perhaps it a little diminished the Al[illegible] into a delicate purity and dex-

No wonder the audience applauded [illegible]y. Elegance that charms with its melancholy or its gaiety, is not exactly the present cult of the violinists.

The years do measure music, and they have not been sparing of Dvorak's "American" symphony, which was the longest item of a relatively short programme. Seventeen years ago, to a month, it was played for the first time anywhere in New York, where Dvorak was then living most unhappily. Heralding had exalted its "Americanism" with an insistence that even the like and more recent process with "La Fanciulla del West" has not excelled. The Bohemian had written the symphony out of the "storehouse" of "American" folk-song—Negro or Indian—and out of the moods that it and his new life in a new country had stirred in him. How the learned debated of it, how the dullest of us hunted for American savor in the music and tuned ears and fancy to find there what they ought to find. Dvorak returned to Bohemia and to a contented spirit again, and forthwith and for long the wiser Czechs made sarcastic sport of the "American Note" on the symphony. America, quoth they—only in the melancholy mood with which a country and a life that he detested filled the composer. Never, they sneered, was he more the Czech peasant, who wrote music also, than he was when he pined for his native Bohemia.

Who cares for either judgment now? Impartial, winnowing time has fixed the place of Dvorak's symphony in the music of the hour. It is played seldom; but when it is played, conductor and audience alike take it for music of immediate and pleasing "effect." Since the effect is all, the conductor may manipulate it at will, and yesterday, Mr. Fiedler manipulated the slow movement—the song of the English horn—until he had moulded the contour of every phrase and melted every gradation of tone into an "effect" on the instant, of melancholy, and long-drawn sweetness. The simple-minded, straightforward Bohemian might hardly have known it for his own, but the audience knew it for unexpected or anticipated pleasure and applauded accordingly. In similar fashion Mr. Fiedler emphasized the contrasts of the scherzo and the tumult of the finale. Not for an instant could the dullest listener mistake a measure or doubt about a mood. The "effect" was obvious and so was the answering applause. Dvorak popularized—and reasonably enough in these complex musical days—did not even need the glamour that the wind choir lent some of his happiest tonal shadings. With it, he even had his subtleties. He felt these instruments and the virtuosi of them yesterday felt with him.

Brahms's "Academic" overture of student songs made musical scholarship, ended the concert, for a repertory and untaxing piece, as Humperdinck's prelude to his opera, "Hänsel and Gretel," for another, had begun it. "Gaudeamus Igetur," the "Fuchslied" and the rest of the German songs, came and went in the familiar fashion, and between whiles, when Brahms was merely "working out," speculation wandered away over the contrast of the music of Lalo and Dvorak. The Parisian was finely tempered of mind and spirit; he had cultivated both; he lived, except when he hid himself for solitary work, the life of a man of the world. He meditated his music long. He selected and polished endlessly. He wrote economically, metriculously. In him was the passion for a minute and elegant perfection that should flawlessly express the delicacy of his moods, the fineness of his imaginings. His style was indeed the man. It has brought him a posthumous note, a posthumous place among composers that he never won in life, but that mount now with the years. Dvorak wrote easily and obviously. He led a homely, almost a peasant, life. He had the mind and the temperament of a Czech peasant, to whom have also fallen the gift of self-expression in music, a sense of the means thereto, and a native, practised and particular instinct toward instrumental coloring. He wrote much. He did not select; he did not polish; he did not search his mind and heart; he took thought too seldom. When his melodic vein flowed, he took no pains to distill it to perfections. Fineness, as Lalo understood the word, he knew not. The Parisian wrote highly cultivated music; the Bohemian wrote music that at its best is highly spontaneous. Yet Dvorak's declines and Lalo's mounts. What is the moral?

H. T. P.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST
DECEMBER 25, 1910

The last Symphony programme of 1910 next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will bring as soloist for the first time in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra, Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who from her appearance with choral societies is well and favorably known in this city. She will bring two numbers, one a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens, which was sung for the first time in America by Madame Jomelli in Brooklyn, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in November. It has never been heard in Boston. Her second number will be the Mother's air from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

The Music Teachers' National Association meet in Boston at the end of the week, and at the request of their executive committee Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme as his first number Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and as his other number, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

The works to be presented at the third concert this season by the Kneisel Quartet, in Chickering Hall, Jan. 3, are: A new quartet by Rubin Goldmark, nephew of the famous Carl Goldmark, for piano, violin, viola and 'cello, in A major; two movements of Caetani's quartet in F minor; Beethoven's quartet in F major, op. 59, No. 1.

THE Christmas repose of the concert-giving and the concert-going world will continue through next week, and outside the regular Symphony Concerts, only one secondary concert and one minor recital will break the respite. The secondary concert is the first of a new series with music for wind instruments by the Longy Club; the recital is that of Miss Fay Cord, a young singer; while, holidays or no holidays, Mr. Fiedler will make the Symphony Concerts interesting with a repetition of Strauss's tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben." To them, also, for a singer, will come Mme. Jomelli.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

THE collocation of Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and of Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" on the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening is amusing. Really, Mr. Fiedler has put the two pieces into one pair of concerts at the request of the committee that is supervising the meeting of the Music Teachers' National Association here next week. More fancifully the gap that separates the "Jupiter" symphony and "Ein Heldenleben" is wide, and the tone-poem with "Zarathustra" marks the departure of Strauss along paths whereon all who admired his earlier music did not care to follow him. Yet Strauss cherishes Mozart and excels in the conducting of his music. Certainly the first performance of "Ein Heldenleben" under Mr. Fiedler made a remarkable incident in his career as a conductor here; while the virtuosity of the band should share in the "Jupiter" symphony. The assisting singer is Mme. Jomelli of the resonant voice and large style, and her numbers are Saint-Saëns's hymn to Pallas Athena, written for out-of-door performance at a summer theatre in France, and the familiar air—it will soon be hackneyed—from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue."

GLOBE—SATURDAY.
DECEMBER 24, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Sylvain Noack Appears as Soloist.

Excellent Performance of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony.

The program of the 10th symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon included Humperdinck's prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," Dvorak's symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Lalo's concerto for violin with second concertmaster Sylvain Noack as soloist, and Brahm's academic festival overture.

The recognition of Engelbert Humperdinck was timely. He is now a guest of the Metropolitan opera house in New York, where the dress rehearsals of his new fairy opera "King's Children" will be held tomorrow morning, and the first performance on any stage on Wednesday.

The playing of this prelude yesterday had, too, a deeper association. It attuned the audience to the spirit of the hour, for while Christmas is the festival of many things, it is a benison to youth and to age in consecrating the play and the imagination of childhood and all the fabulous wonders of the world of make-believe.

Dvorak's symphony comes like the echo of distant thunder, and of the disputations, at the time of its production, that waxed hot and long over its claim to classification as "American" music, or as the exponent of an American idiom, or the prototype of an American school.

There was a vast deal of pother. There were columns inflated with wisdom, and perhaps a new skill in the use of the philippic. It was all needless, for while Dvorak was in this country as director of the National conservatory in New York, where he wrote the symphony, he repeatedly and expressly stated that his purpose in writing this music was grossly misconstrued.

Those who knew Dvorak personally were assured by him that he had no ulterior motive in the "New World" music other than to give expression to a melodic, harmonic and rhythmic character which attracted him.

Judged by any other standard this symphony was a disappointment to those who expected versions of Stephen Foster melodies, or tunes indisputably of Indian or negro origin. Excepting the old camp meeting song, "Swing Low Sweet Chariot," there is no use of thematic material that is typically American.

There is, however, a quality, as some insist, which may be the outcry of the composer's homesickness, from which he suffered acutely. But there is, particularly in the first two movements, that noble simplicity and that searching power to provoke pathos which is always a mark of the life of a people that have not yet gotten too far away from the soil.

Remembering the strange, exotic and highly sophisticated music which Puccini wrote for much of his opera upon Belasco's American drama, "The Girl of the Golden West," it was impressive yesterday to hear this music, perhaps even less inspired by American influences, but more characteristic of elemental life, and its sincerity of feeling.

The performance by Mr Fiedler and the orchestra was one of great beauty.

Lalo's concerto for violin, as the concerto for 'cello, is a masterpiece. It was not written by a man who knew the technic and possibilities of the instrument and clouded the solo part by inadequate knowledge of the orchestra. The score has emotional beauty of its own.

Mr Noack played with discernment and musicianship. His tone is always possessed of sympathy and loveliness. He performed the embellishment with clearness and fluency, and phrased with taste.

The program next week is as follows: Mozart, C major, "Jupiter," symphony, Saint-Saens, Hymn to Pallas Athene, Debussy, Lia's air from "The Prodigal Son," (Mme Jomelli, soloist) and Strauss, tone-poem, "A Hero's Life."

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY
DECEMBER 24, 1910

CHEERFUL PROGRAMME AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

HUMPERDINCK AND BRAHMS AT BEGINNING AND END

Dvorak and Lalo Other Composers Represented—Violin Solo by Mr. Noack.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Humperdinck. Prelude to "Haensel and Gretel."
Dvorak. Symphony. "From the New World."
Lalo. Concerto for Violin, F minor.
Mr. S. Noack, violinist.
Brahms. "Academic Overture."

The beginning and ending reflected the cheerfulness of the Christmas season, and no part of the concert was at all gloomy or over-complex. Humperdinck, like Mascagni, seems to be a "single-speech Hamilton," a man of a single success. But that success ought to point the way to the composer of the future. If suddenly a composer should arise with the melodic gifts of a Bizet, and should present his tuneful thoughts with the support of the full modern orchestra and with all the resources of modern harmony, that man would find the world at his feet. That is the composer that the world is waiting for in this somewhat barren transition period.

Humperdinck's Prelude, with its central theme of the song of the descending angels, was charmingly tuneful and its exquisite crescendo to a climax was finely given. The simple children's melody is nobly developed, and Mr. Fiedler brought out the musical spirit of this figure treatment most excellently. Especial tribute may be paid to the artistic horn-playing connected with this chief theme. The prelude was keenly appreciated by the audience, much applause following its completion.

We shall not reopen the old debate whether Dvorak's themes in the E minor symphony are distinctly American or not (we consider that they are) the fact remains that he has evolved a very interesting symphony from them. It is a work which wears well, and one which was created because of his residence in America, just as the themes of the plantation were the outcome of the environment of the negroes in America. But Dvorak was not the first to do this. The chief American composer, George W. Chadwick, used plantation themes in one of his symphonies long before Dvorak came to these shores.

Mr. Fiedler read the first movement of the symphony with real artistic insight, catching up the true lilt of the plantation melody. In the slow movement there was something of over-refinement, and the English horn melody might have been louder, but it was very beautiful nevertheless, and the movement won the chief applause of all the four.

The figure treatment of the finale was made very clear. All the readings at present are commendable in the manner in which they cause the auditor to follow points of development even in very intricate passages.

Lalo's concerto for violin was a grateful work for Mr. Sylvain Noack. Mr. Noack has a broad tone and a virility in his work, which is very attractive in these days of extreme polish and technique. He does not lack technical brilliancy, but he does not suffer this to cause him to become too Chesterfieldian in his interpretation. The concerto is not a great work but it is quite violinistic, and gives ample opportunities to the sploist. In spite of the European dictum we consider it less symphonic than an accompanied solo. It is a more direct and interesting composition than the "Symphonie Espagnol" by the same composer. Mr. Noack's excellent work was evidently much appreciated by the public, and many hearty and well-deserved recalls followed the conclusion of the concerto.

Brahms's "Academic Overture" is of sturdy German humor. Its use of the humble "Was kommt dort von der Hoeh'," the most popular of German students' songs, is often grotesque in its figure development. The bassoons had a good chance to display themselves here, and made good use of it. Even in his play Brahms shows himself the well-equipped contrapuntist. Not even Beethoven was better at developing a figure than he. The work was led up to a grand climax in this performance, Mr. Fiedler emphasizing the triumphant side of it very successfully. Some day an American composer will take "Upidee," "The lone fishball," and the song about the Bigelow farm and give us an American college symphony. He will be somewhat put to it, however, to find the grander elements to make a contrast with, for we have a very puny repertoire of good college music compared with the German universities.

[125]

HERALD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1910.

NOACK PLAYS LALO'S CONCERTO

Composition Heard Here for the First Time at the 10th Symphony Rehearsal.

A WORK OF HIGH DEGREE

By PHILIP HALE.

The 10th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Haensel and Gretel"...Humperdinck
Symphony "From the New World".....Dvorak
Concerto for violin, op. 20.....Lalo
Academic Festival Overture.....Brahms

Mr. Fiedler undoubtedly arranged this program with a view to the Christmas season, and yet no specifically "Christmas" composition was on the list. No Shepherds' song by Bach, Handel, or another; no march of the Three Kings; no manger lullaby. But Humperdinck's overture is full of childish mirth and naive devotion; the symphony of Dvorak is of a popular nature; Brahms's overture is designedly jovial.

This program gave much pleasure to the audience, which was not so large as usual. The performance for the most part deserved the uncommonly hearty applause. It might be justly said that the second movement of the symphony was taken at an exceedingly slow pace, and the sugary sentimentalism of the music was thereby accentuated; but Mr. Fiedler's answer to this objection would undoubtedly be: "The audience liked it." There is no answer to this rejoinder.

With this exception, there is little or nothing to be said but praise about the reading or the performance of this symphony, which was once supposed to be distinctively "American," whereas the Czech, hearing it, swears by the graves of his ancestors that it is purely Bohemian.

Mr. Noack played Lalo's concerto, op. 20, for the first time at these concerts and to the best of my knowledge for the first time in Boston. The wonder is that the concerto has been so neglected by local or visiting violinists; for it is a composition of high degree, interesting to both musicians and the general public. It was first played by Sarasate in Paris in 1874, and it is a year older than the familiar "Symphonie Espagnola" by the same composer.

There is not enough made of Lalo and Chabrier and their influence in these days when so much attention is paid to the ultra-modern French. The two were men born out of due time. Harmonic progressions, orchestral effects that in the works of those that came after them and now excite admiration, were invented by them, and there are few to do them reverence. We have yet to hear Lalo's symphony or his piano concerto in Boston.

The compositions of Lalo are characterized by an elegance and a distinction that are approached and sometimes equalled only by Saint-Saens, but Lalo's nature was the warmer. In his orchestration no instrument is introduced unless it has something significant to say, unless it is essential to an effect of color. There is nothing superfluous, any more than there are unmeaning words in a sentence by Anatole France or Marcel Schwob. His music has a peculiar charm. It has its own peculiar atmosphere. The fastidiousness of Lalo's taste would not have allowed him to write the vulgar and thunderous theme on which Chabrier's finale to the "Gwendoline" overture is built, but this fastidiousness never became "precious," unemotional.

Mr. Noack's performance was characterized chiefly by the appropriate elegance, and also by sure and polished technic, and reassuring self-possession. The phrasing was that of the musician; the technical proficiency was that of the accomplished virtuoso. The performance was in many ways admirable. Yet the concerto admits of a broader and more passionate treatment, especially in the first mo nent. The Romanza might have been played with more emotion. Even a little nervousness on the part of the player might have been welcome; the nervousness that fires the soul of the performer and leads him to a stirring revelation of individuality, to an interpretation of sentiment or passion that moves an audience, and not merely delights its ears.

The program next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"; Saint Saens, "Pallas Athene," hymn for soprano and orchestra (first time in Boston); Debussy, Lia's recitative and air from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben." Mme. Jeanne Jomelli will sing with the orchestra for the first time in Boston.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1910.

THE SYMPHONY AND THE CECILIA

What success comes of the Cecilia Society's joining forces with the Boston Symphony orchestra?

First of all, financial success, the thing that no singing club can long do without and exist.

Good! If the society's concerts are at last put on an audience-attracting basis, if its work has again become a constructive force in the community, as in the days when Mr. Lang was building his fame, everybody will be glad to know its plans. No more for the present about Cecilia glories of past seasons, no more about those first-time presentations that were achieved in the good old days at Music hall; we have been whipped up to loyalty by stories of former Cecilia greatness as long as we can be. We are looking for present accomplishment.

A Cremona violin, though it were one with which Paganini brought Europe to his feet, would have no enticement for us today in the hands of anybody but a master player. Now the Cecilia Cremona has just been awakened to a new life of tone and overtone under the master bow of Max Fiedler.

"What rough hands to lay on such a delicate instrument," say some. "Surely, he will spoil it."

Those who speak so are they of the backward look. "We never," they continue, "sang so fast as this before. We have, forsooth, read difficult music in times past; are we not the bravest choral society in New England, or, for anything ever told us to the contrary, the bravest in the whole country, for doing hard things? But we are trying to climb impossible heights in this music of Bantock. We cannot believe that we are interpreting Omar Khayyam, the poet of the quiet riverside. Why this Fiedler speed? Our listeners will not understand half our words."

And what, let us ask the Cecilians of the backward look, do your listeners care if they do not understand your every syllable? Verbally they know their Omar pretty well anyway. They are out not to listen to an exercise in elocution, but to hear a modern choral work performance in a modern way. They have heard, most of them, the old New England singing class music to satiety; they want today's music and they want it in the spirit of today.

There is, indeed, much apparent force in the argument of the bygone years. They who live in the pride of the past will point out to you the Symphony orchestra and refer its present success to its achievements in the 80's, the 90's and the decade just passing. But the public says "no" to all that. It says that it gives the orchestra its patronage because of the quality of the work done today, and not because of any reputation for things done during the conductorship of Nikish, Gericke or Muck. Let the orchestra lag ever so little behind the times, and what will you hear of Symphony preeminence?

FRANCIS A. SHOVE.
Vice-president of Cecilia Society appearing with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

The Cecilia Society's greatest popularity was in the days when singing was singing, and orchestral playing was orchestral playing; in the days when the musical public demanded next to nothing from the conductor in the way of blending voices and instruments into conscious color unity. An opalescent scheme of instrumental-vocal tints had not at that time been devised. Did an orchestra assist at the old concerts? If it did, it was regarded as giving a more sonorous, a more prettily detailed accompaniment than a piano could give; that was all.

There is little probability that the Cecilia managers will have to cry the town this year for audiences. They have a leader now who brings with him an orchestra trained in all the subtelties which string, wood and brass tone qualities can express. When the colors of violin, flute and horn are transfused with the four vocal colors of soprano, alto, tenor and bass, who doubts the directors's ability to handle the new material? Who thinks his choral pictures will not glow with the spirit of our times as vividly as do his purely orchestral pictures? Ask those who heard the performance of "Omar Khayyam" what they think about it.

One new choral piece and two review works was the program agreed upon last spring by the Cecilia and Symphony managers when the combination of singing society and orchestra was brought about—three public concerts, Mr. Fiedler directing the music. The year's work must be a matter of agreement between the orchestral and vocal parties, not a matter of the director's sole choice, because the Cecilia Society, under the terms of the alliance, retains its separate organic existence. This reservation cannot affect the artistic quality of the concerts, provided Mr. Fiedler is allowed his full freedom in interpretation; and it seems wholly likely that he will be, if the first concert is anything to judge by.

The new production of the year, Bantock's cantata, has gone on the records of the concert season. The piece was prepared in a brief space of time that astonished the Cecilia members, so brief that some thought another month of rehearsal would not have been too much. But the Symphony leader is accustomed to dealing with artists of the first rank; and have not the Cecilians always made high claims for their own technical abilities? Well, when new music is put before them, they must rise promptly to its demands, as the rest of Mr. Fiedler's performers do.

There remain "The Children's Crusade" of Pierne to present in February, and the Bach Passion music in April. Doubtless the members of the society are looking forward to the February concert as an opportunity to improve on their production of Pierne's work four seasons ago. They have provided themselves with the most capable soloists (the singer to narrate the events of the legend will appropriately be the French tenor Clement) and they have engaged Mr. Hadley of the Somerville schools to be ready as in 1907, with a chorus of young voices to represent the crusading children.

The Matthew Passion music will be a more important test of Mr. Fiedler as a chorus conductor than anything else on the Cecilia program. The last of the three concerts will in all likelihood make the broadest public appeal of all; it will call out many listeners who have in memory a high standard of Bach interpretation, it will probably call out some whom nothing by the Passion music would ever bring into touch with Cecilia Society or Symphony Orchestra either.

A line of activity which will especially foster the pride of separate existence in the Cecilians is their giving programs of unaccompanied music in private concert. The first of their "a capella" meetings will be in Jordan hall, Jan. 2. No plans for this have yet been made other than the engagement of Mr. Witek, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as soloist. Malcolm Lang will assist in conducting rehearsals, but Mr. Fiedler will, as a rule, conduct the private as well as the public concerts.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Should anybody feel surprise if the tenth Symphony program, with Dvorak's "New World" as the principal number in the first half, and with an unfamiliar violin concerto, played by the assistant concertmaster of the orchestra, as the chief piece of the second half, proved on rehearsal one of the most appealing of the season? We could not have been mistaken in our musical predilections of the nineties, after all; for observe what charm the "New World" allegro, andante and scherzo have, long after we thought they had gone the way of other once fashionable things. There was true originality in them, you see; something that had waited long for a composer to give it expression in the orchestral language. The plantation melodies were not worked into the texture of these movements by mere craftsman's artifice; they wrought themselves there by their own innate symphonic impulsion.

A word about the solo piece, a concerto too long neglected in Boston. Lalo's violin here is not one for the picturesque virtuoso to shake his locks over; it is an instrument of music, not of display. Certainly, then, there is no better artist to entrust it to than Sylvain Noack; and no better orchestra than Max Fiedler's to entrust the score of its accompaniment to. Lalo's background of orchestral tone works for beauty of effect with the solo instrument and does not simply come in after brilliant climaxes, to give the virtuoso a moment to retune his E string and smooth back his locks. The whole concerto is an example of the solo pieces in the presentation of which Mr. Fiedler excels; if there were more music like it in the orchestral repertory, we should more often find conductor and soloist at our Symphony concerts in accord, as they were in a remarkable way at the Friday afternoon rehearsal.

The program of the tenth concert is as follows: Humperdinck, prelude to "Haensel and Gretel;" Lalo, concerto for violin op. 20; (first time at these concerts); Dvorak, Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," op. 95; Brahms, Academic Festival Overture, op. 80. Soloist, Sylvain Noack.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1910

SYMPHONY PLAYS "HANSEL AND GRETEL"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 10th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was composed in honor of the season: Prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," Humperdinck; "New World," symphony, Dvorak; concerto for violin, op. 20 (first time at these concerts) Lalo; Academic Festival overture, Brahms. Sylvain Noack, second concertmeister of the orchestra, was soloist.

The playing of the Brahms overture and the symphony was especially brilliant. It was not Mr. Fiedler's fault that the orchestration of the prelude to "Hansel and Gretel" is thick and heavy. He interpreted the music with the warmest sympathy, and the music itself, though a little obscured by its pretentious orchestral garb, is inimitably tender, humorous, poetic, appropriate to a folk-tale.

There are those who have no great admiration for the Dvorak of the "New World" symphony, who find that work a curious and displeasing blend of classic and romantic styles. It is not necessary to discuss all this. Dvorak was a wonderful melodist, and he had a command of the orchestra that may still be envied. The instrumentation of the "New World" symphony is simply glorious, as if every instrument in the orchestra were exulting by itself and in harmony. And of all composers, it is Dvorak who as a melodist comes nearest Schubert in the spontaneousness and the richness of his invention. The "New World" symphony is the music of a Bohemian, not necessarily of the "New World" at all, is simple, unaffected, nature music. It is as fresh and glowing as Venus risen from the ocean in the morning.

Mr. Noack gave an exceedingly skilful and artistic performance of concerto, new to the Symphony audiences, which gave immediate pleasure. His tone is at once refined and sonorous, his technic amply adequate to any demands that may be made upon it, and he is an admirable artist. The first and third movements are the strongest parts of a composition which does not cease to be entertaining, and which is for the most part of a facture and substance to command the admiration of the serious musician. The orchestral part, as remarked in the programme, is exceptionally interesting and well proportioned. Mr. Noack was recalled, and certainly his success was deserved. After this Mr. Fiedler excelled in his conduction of the rousing "Academic overture," wherein Brahms showed the other composers on the programme that he, too, could score.

[126]

HERALD—SATURDAY
DECEMBER 24, 1910.

XMAS PROGRAM AT THE SYMPHONY

Performance One of the Most Satisfactory Ever Heard in Hub.

There are Christmas suggestions in the Symphony program this week. If no Santa Claus motive figures, there is entertainment for the young ones as well as the grown ups in the prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel." The prelude, with its dances and prayers, returns to the Symphony concerts after an absence of thirteen years. In 1897 it was also on the Christmas program.

There was another Christmas suggestion, as of home, sweet home, in Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony, which the Bohemian composer wrote while sojourning sadly in New York—the "Czech peasant confronted with the rush and din of the feverish life in a great city." It is rich in Czech sentiment, although the theme taken from the negro camp meeting song, "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," plays a prominent part in the development of the second, third and fourth movements.

The performance of the symphony was one of the most satisfactory ever heard in Boston. It seemed as if Conductor Fiedler and his compatriots and all the others with fatherlands abroad just let the sentiment gush forth unrestrained. There was no question about the extraordinary character of the performance. The audience felt it first in the touching second movement, and acknowledged it with applause such as only the popular soloists evoke as a rule. There was another enthusiastic demonstration at the close of the symphony.

Sylvain Noack, the second concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist. Lalo's concerto, written for Sarasate in 1874, was heard here for the first time. The performance gave much pleasure. Brahms' "Academic" overture, with its college songs, was the final, and also appropriate number.

HERALD, BOSTON.
DECEMBER 25, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

In January and February comes the busiest season of the Symphony Orchestra, for in the space of eight weeks there are two trips to the South, each of a week, and one trip to the middle West of a week's duration. Besides these there are five concerts in Boston and concerts in Cambridge, Worcester and Providence.

The last program of 1910, which is No. 11, will bring as soloist for the first time in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra, Madame Jeanne Jomelli, who from her appearances with choral societies is well and favorably known in this city. She will sing two selections, one a Hymn to Pallar Athene by Saint-Saëns, which was sung for the first time in America by Madame Jomelli in Brooklyn with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in November. It has never been heard in Boston. Her second selection will be Lia's air from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

The Music Teachers' National Association will be meeting in Boston at the end of the week and at the request of its executive committee Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program as his first number Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and as his other number Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben." The order of the program will be as follows:

Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"...Mozart
Hymn to Pallas Athene.....Saint-Saens
Lia's Air from "L'Enfant Prodigue"....Debussy
Tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben".....Strauss

DECEMBER 25, 1910.
JOURNAL—SUNDAY

Symphony Orchestra

The last program of 1910, which is No. 11, will bring as soloist for the first time in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli. She is to sing the "Hymn to Pallas Athene," by Saint-Saens, which has never been heard in Boston, and Leah's air from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son." The Music Teachers' National Association will be meeting here this week, and at the request of the executive committee Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program as his first number Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and as his other number Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

TRAVELER, SATURDAY,
DECEMBER 31, 1910.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mischa Elman is to reappear with the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts next week Friday afternoon and evening, playing the Lalo Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra. The Symphony at these concerts will be Sibelius' Second in D major, which Mr. Fiedler performed last year. The other number will be a movement from Humperdinck's "A Moorish Rhapsody," entitled "Tangier—in a Moorish Cafe."

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 25, 1910.

ORCHESTRA BUSY.

Symphony Players to Make Trips for Concerts.

In January and February comes the busiest season of the Symphony Orchestra, for in the space of eight weeks there are two trips to the South, each of a week, and one trip to the Middle West of a week's duration. Besides these there are five concerts in Boston and concerts in Cambridge, Worcester and Providence.

The last program of 1910, which is No. 11, will bring as soloist for the first time in Boston with the Symphony Orchestra Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, who from her appearances with choral societies is well and favorably known in this city. She is to sing two numbers, one a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens, which was sung for the first time in America by Mme. Jomelli in Brooklyn with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in November. Her second number will be the Mother's Air from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

The Music Teachers' National Association will be meeting in Boston at the end of the week, and at the request of their executive committee Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program as his first number Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, and as his other number Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben." The order of the program is as follows:

Symphony in C major, "Jupiter"...Mozart
Hymn to Pallas Athene.....Saint-Saens
Air from "L'Enfant Prodigue"....Debussy
Tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben"....Strauss

SUNDAY GLOBE
DECEMBER 25, 1910.

Eleventh Week of Concerts By the Symphony Orchestra.

In January and February comes the busiest season of the Symphony orchestra, for in the space of eight weeks there are two trips to the south, each of a week, and one trip to the middle west of a week's duration. Besides these there are five concerts in Boston and concerts in Cambridge, Worcester and Providence.

This week's program will bring as soloist for the first time in Boston with the Symphony orchestra Mme Jeanne Jomelli, who from her appearances with choral societies is well and favorably known in this city. She is to sing two numbers, one a hymn to Pallas Athene by Saint-Saens, which was sung for the first time in America by Mme Jomelli in Brooklyn with the Boston Symphony orchestra in November. Her second number will be Lia's air from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son."

The Music Teachers' national association will be meeting in Boston at the end of the week and at the request of the executive committee Mr Fiedler has placed on the program as his first number Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony and as his other number Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

SUNDAY POST,
JANUARY 1, 1911

Symphony Programme

Sibelius figures as the largest contributor to the 12th Symphony programme which will be played on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler will repeat the Second Symphony in D major with which he had such success a year ago. Of the living composers none has gained greater favor in Boston than Sibelius and this particular symphony of his made a deep impression when it was played last year for the first time in a number of seasons. Humperdinck, who is now large in the public eyes, owing to the performance in New York of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder," will be represented by a movement from a suite, a "moorish Rhapsody," the title of the movement being "Tangier—A Night in a Moorish Cafe."

GLOBE—SATURDAY,
DECEMBER 31, 1910.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mme Jomelli Soloist For First Time at the Concerts.

Tone Poem of Richard Strauss' "A Hero's Life" Is Played.

The 11th Symphony rehearsal program yesterday afternoon was as follows: Mozart's ("Jupiter") C major symphony; Saint-Saens' hymn for soprano and orchestra, "Pallas Athene" (op 98), first time in Boston; and Lia's recitative and aria from Debussy's "The Prodigal Son," Mme Jeanne Jomelli soloist in both; Strauss' tone-poem, "A Hero's Life."

The performance of the Strauss was the third by the orchestra at these concerts, the second by Mr Fiedler. There are a limited number of works in orchestral literature which might fittingly be performed once each year as an event of commemorative or festal nature. This is one of them.

The work is colossal in program, in purpose, in workmanship and in emotional and spiritual import. Its theme embodies eternal truth. It is not for today or tomorrow, but for all time. For in every age man has fought, and by physical prowess has conquered; has withstood the gibes and mockery of weaklings and of the earth-bound; has been the nobler for the wooing of woman's love, and has learned of victories of soul and of triumphant death.

The great epic has not yet been written upon some trivial subject which, for its little day, whipped men's minds into a fever and then was forgotten. In every age there has been the conflict between a perishable materialism and an eternal soul. Against him who would fly above the first there have been the Philistines, with their scales and their yardsticks, and their raillery against all who would not measure the future in terms of the past.

Strauss has fancied subjects for his tone-poems, some of them big, some capricious, one of them emphatically unappropriate—that of a day and its doings by his own fireside—but none are of more lofty imagination, more imperishable significance. Here he has written upon both the grim and the glorious realities of human life. Aesthetically his text is one of noble seriousness and beauty. It leads to a supreme fulfillment.

Vast Orchestral Panorama.

The vastness of the span of it is apt for Strauss' cyclopic skill in constructing a vast orchestral panorama of tone. Here is a tapestry of pictures into which he has woven the strands of melodic figures that give identity to the deeds of his hero and illumine the development of his drama. For it is a drama in tone, and the hero, his beloved and his adversaries are the protagonists.

There are said to be 70 of these melodic figures or guiding motifs, for intricate and exhausting analyses of this marvel of contrapuntal genius are not lacking. There are nine, perhaps 10, in the first of the six general divisions and more in the others.

The hero once introduced, his antagonists set upon him in the second and what a masterful caricaturist in color is Strauss. Wagner, in "The Mastersingers," in his exquisite lampoon of Beckmesser and the contemporary hidebound pedants, scarcely penned more wicked irony than Richard II has done here in the waspish mockery in upper woodwind and the sluggish fifths of the ponderous tubas.

The technical display is amazing, yet there is no obvious or blatant virtuosity of a man appallingly dexterous in counter point. What consummate skill in the sixth division in his weaving into the pattern themes from his previous works; from the tone-poems and even from the early opera, "Guntram," and the song, "Traum durch die Dammerung."

Jean Marnold pretends to find 23 of these reechoes. Louis Coerne contends there are 24. Again a comparison with Wagner, for it is not unlike the reminiscent scheme of "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung."

Unescapable Dissonances.

It is true the music descriptive of the battle has unescapable dissonance and rude shocks of onset, but yesterday it seemed less pertinent and indicative. The delineation in the solo violin of the beloved's caprices and evasion of capture also seemed needlessly prolonged, although Mr Noack, in the event of Mr Witek's illness, played the music acceptably.

But there is little in this great work without significance or out of proportion. Of surpassing beauty is the music portraying the bliss of the two lovers. It is an exquisite conceit that makes the theme of the beloved sing high in the violins through the clangor of battle, inspiring hope and courage.

There follows then a triumphant song of victory, such a sonorous paean as suggests finality and departure to those deeply versed in the ways of large orchestral pieces, insomuch that yesterday some of the expeditious considered themselves warned to adjust their hats long before the hero's fate was determined.

The stately funereal music attending the hero's demise is impressive, though lacking the superlative grandeur of the apotheosis in "Death and Transfiguration."

Mr Fiedler read the fiery portions of the score with much ardor and the exquisite love music with no little sympathy. The performance of the orchestra was brilliant.

Mme Jomelli, particularly in the Debussy aria, now familiar through performances at the opera, sang with ravishing beauty of tone, with finished art in phrasing and with emotional fervor. The Saint-Saens ballad, which she sang recently at Brooklyn with this orchestra for the first time in America, is not inspired and is unequal in value. There are stanzas which have neither the succinctness and vitality of recitative, nor the poetic content or passion of melody. The orchestra at times possesses a color, suaveness and grace characteristic of some of the writing of Saint-Saens.

The reading of the symphony did not notably mirror either the elegance or the lightness and zest of Mozart. The tonal quality of the orchestra was euphonious, particularly in the beautifully-sustained song of the second movement.

[127]

POST, SATURDAY
DECEMBER 31, 1910

TEACHERS PICK SYMPHONY BILL

Programme Selected by Vote—Mme. Jomelli Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Yesterday afternoon a number of the teachers of music who have attended the convention which has been in progress here for a week, visited Symphony Hall to hear the Symphony Orchestra play a programme which they had partly determined by vote. Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; Saint-Saens' "Pallas Athene," hymn for soprano and orchestra (first time in Boston); recitative and aria of Lia, from Debussy's cantata, "The Prodigal Son"; tone poem, "A Hero Life," Richard Strauss. The new comers gracefully complied with the new ruling by immediately removing their headgear when they entered the hall.

The plan of commencing the concert with the Mozart symphony and concluding it with the Strauss tone poem proved interesting. It also proved conclusively how solidly the art of Strauss is grounded upon classical principles of construction and key relationship. And it proved again the colossal mastery of Richard Strauss, the dominating musical figure of at least the first half of the 20th century.

Mozart's symphony, too, was modern in its day. The final fugue was then, perhaps, even more of a technical, as well as artistic, feat than Strauss' battle scene. The instrumentation was heavy, and called for a full modern orchestra. The work is still modern, though not, perhaps, as advanced as the G minor symphony.

Strauss' work is perhaps the most overwhelming, ebullient, utterly magnificent expression of a great egotism in tones. It has been our experience to hear this tone poem on every occasion when it has been given here, since the first performance under Mr. Gericke in 1901, and we have never conquered the feeling of aversion amounting almost to disgust as that mammoth thing commences to sound, and as the torturing immensity of Strauss' monstrous design is comprehended, and then—the irresistible swing and pulse of the mighty work, as, whether you like it or not, it sweeps you clean away, and there is left nothing to do but hold the breath and observe the miracles accomplished by him who is a direct descendant of Beethoven in the bigness of his vision and his architectural power.

Strauss moulds a good strong theme to begin with, puts by it contrasting passages, and then works out his material. The definition is simple, but the workmanship and the tremendous lines of that structure are simply indescribable and incommunicable, until the music has caught one up to its own height, and there is, so to speak, a birdseye view of the whole.

Saint-Saens' "Pallas Athene" was sung with superb breadth and artistry by Mme. Jomelli. The piece is in broad, dignified, picturesque holiday style. It was written for a public occasion. Saint-Saens has from the first distinguished himself by his ability to write anything for any occasion, and the Hymn to Pallas Athene is no exception to the rule, save that, although it may not be distinctive, it is never cheap, or boisterous, or vulgar.

The soloists showed her objectivity when she turned from this splurging music to the air of the complaining mother, in "The Prodigal Son." She gave this air remarkable tenderness and dramatic intensity, and the technics of her performances were admirable in the highest degree. Mme. Jomelli was repeatedly recalled.

SUNDAY GLOBE—
JANUARY 1, 1911.

Mischa Elman Soloist at This Week's Symphonies.

Sibelius figures as the largest contributor to this week's Symphony programs. Mr Fiedler will repeat the second symphony in D major, with which he had such success a year ago. Of the living composers none has gained greater favor in Boston than Sibelius and this symphony made a deep impression when it was played last year for the first time in a number of seasons.

Humperdinck, who is largely now in the public eye owing to the performance in New York of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder," will be represented by a movement from a suite which he calls a "Moorish Rhapsody," the title of the movement being "Tangier—A Night in a Moorish Cafe."

Mischa Elman will make his reappearance in Boston at these concerts, playing Lalo's "Spanish" symphony. As Mr Noack played with much success Lalo's quite forgotten first concerto a week ago, it will be interesting for connoisseurs to compare the two works, coming as they do so close together.

Alessandro Bonci's Recital.

The program that Alessandro Bonci will give at his recital in Symphony hall Tuesday afternoon, Jan 10, is one of great interest. He will sing in three languages, Italian, French and English. A part of the selections will be classic tunes from old-time operas. More modern arias will be the lovely "Una furtiva lagrima" from "Elisir d'Amore" and the "Che gelida Manina" from "La Boheme."

He will sing three German songs, but with the English text—Mendelssohn's "On the Wings of Music" and Schubert's "Who is Sylvia" and "Hark, Hark, the Lark." Two modern songs are included, MacDowell's "Long Ago" and "A Maid Sings Light."

T[H]E SYMPHONY CONCERT

MOZART AND STRAUSS TO RARE PERFORMANCE

T[H]E Unusual Circumstance That Counsed Such a Programme—The Orchestra the Top of Its Form and the Finest Its Mettle—Mozart's "Jupiter" Symony and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" the Orchestra Disclosed Them—The ntrasting Exactions of the Two Comsers

MR. Fiedler's programme for the Symphony Concerts yesterday afternoon was so unlike his usual choice and arrangement of pieces that it recalled some of the strange groupings that Dr. Muck used to make and to which none but the conductor himself could find the plausible key. It began with Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; then followed a "Hymn to Pallas Athena" and the mother's air out of Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue" for Mme. Jomelli to sing; and it ended with Strauss's huge tone-poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Now Mozart and Strauss, the "Jupiter" symphony and "Ein Heldenleben," are at opposite poles of music; while the pieces for Mme. Jomelli to sing bore no perceptible relation to the whole programme or to each other, and least of all bridged the gap between its major numbers. The truth is that the programme was not wholly of Mr. Fiedler's choosing. The meeting here of the Music Teachers' National Association gave to many of its members their first opportunity to hear the Symphony Orchestra. The managing committee wished them to hear it first in some classic, and then in some ultra-modern piece. Running through the announced music for the year, Mr. Fiedler pitched upon the "Jupiter" symphony and "Ein Heldenleben." Mme. Jomelli, as it happened, had been engaged to sing at this pair of concerts, and no alternative remained to the sandwiching of her "numbers" between the long symphonic pieces. She chose her music, as most singers at symphony concerts do, with little or no thought of the whole programme of which they were a part, and so the programme settled gradually into the queer congeries of pieces and styles that it was.

Anyhow, the music-teachers had their reward, and some sixty tickets had been placed at their disposal by regular attendants at the afternoon concerts. It seems absurd to say that the Symphony Orchestra could be stirred by the presence of threescore strange music teachers, but the fact remains that, though Mr. Witek and Mr. Schroeder were both sick and absent, it was at the top of its form and the keenest of its mettle throughout the concert. Mr. Fiedler always is or tries his hardest to be, and yesterday, he had his beloved Strauss, his particularly beloved "Heldenleben," and his just reputation for high eloquence in the performance of the piece to stimulate him. The result was a concert that stirred the regular audience of Friday afternoon only less than it did the visitors to whom it was wholly new. The performance of the orchestra dignified the large commonplaces of Saint-Saëns's hymn, and made them sound as though emotion, as well as the capable discharge of a commission, had prompted the music. The subdued voices of Debussy's accompaniment to the air from "L'Enfant Prodigue," and his subtle feeling even in this youthful piece for the timbres of the wood-wind instruments had their soft play. The quality of tone, alike in the string and the wind choirs, was beautifully transparent and edgeless throughout Mozart's symphony. The rhythmic precision was unerring, yet it had no sharpness and it did keep a light elasticity. Man for man, the orchestra seemed to have a sense of each single note in the symphony and to weave it into its place in the web. Only in the occasional breadth of a chord came the disconcerting sense, so common in performances of eighteenth-century music of modern means that are too large for ancient ends.

Through three movements, the symphony went its true way of seemingly rambling loveliness touched with a persistent melancholy. For Mozart is too supple and suave to let form seem rigid, and in these final symphonies, the playful lights of the earlier are a little clouded. Mozart had lived long enough to have moods almost in spite of himself. Then music and orchestra raced away into the fugue of the finale. They kept all its fineness of tonal fibre, all its elasticity that is always yielding to let the significant phrase or figure through at just the right moment; and they gave it a nervous vigor that was exactly of Mozart's quick spirit and leaping fancy. Bach's fugues are mighty, sometimes even thick; they stride oftener than they run. Mozart's race with themselves, make play with their own brightness, fling themselves into sparkle like a firework. And throughout the symphony, Mr. Fiedler content with the "Heldenleben" that awaited him did not force a note or a phrase, never once attempted an "individuality" of pace. The conductor led, the orchestra played, the audience heard—pure Mozart.

It is the final test of an orchestra, as of a conductor, that it shall adapt itself to the music in hand until it is altogether at one with it. Probably there was not a man on the stage yesterday who would not lay his hand on his heart and say that Strauss had crowded his tone-poems and his operas with instrumental difficulties and feats that were born of a wanton and intellectual virtuosity. Beyond any composer of our own time, Strauss knows the possibilities of the instruments of the orchestra and of the virtuosi that should play them. He takes a perverse mental pleasure in the setting of "stunts" for them that multiply difficulties, while they add nothing that the ordinary ear and imagination may detect to the substance, the color or the significance of the music. It is an old story that Strauss is most puissant when he is simplest. "Ein Heldenleben" is full of such instrumental feats, especially in the more polyphonic sections; they must be done, if the music is to be played at all; and—what is more to the point—they must be done so that they shall not seem as feats. Then do the straining and the achieving players beat the composer at his own game. Perversely, again, he would say that such a performance was precisely what he intended, smile his enigmatic smile and depart to the invention of yet more difficult feats.

The Symphony Orchestra, yesterday, played "Ein Heldenleben" as though there were no "exacting passages" in it; and not one in the audience need have suspected, so free and assured was the performance, that there were. It did much more, however, and that which more incumbent upon it. For "Ein Heldenleben" is nearly a perfect example among Strauss's tone-poems of the fusing of the symphonic structure with the delineative and the expressive ends. There is no to detail again its free symphonic form. Those that have an open ear and mind to musical architecture long since discovered it for themselves. It is a little necessary to trace the fashion in which the music seems to develop itself out of itself, because whoever has heard it understandingly and sympathetically has already found therein much of its power, sweep and pervading magnificence. The marvel and the hight of it all is the fashion in which within this symphonic form in the course of this development, it accomplishes its delineative and emotional purpose. "Ein Heldenleben" unrolls its vast symphonic structure and substance clothed in the myriad magnificence of Strauss's instrumental coloring. It unrolls equally its vast panorama of the Hero-Life; flings the hero, full panoplied in his strength into the world whih which he must war — how graphic is the first section that calls him to life; music-drama could not go further—sets him wooing—and with what intimate beauty—sets him fighting—and with what heroic might of spirit—turns him victor, leads him into meditation that is even polyphonic and is music made not felt, and then translates him into the high heaven of those that fought the best fight that is in them for what they believed and practiced. The tone-poem ends in these mighty glories. Yet how just before, and often through all its course, it has teemed with intimate touches. Against the magnificence of the birth and the death of his hero, against the might of his warring, Strauss sets the fine intensity of his passion for the woman he has chosen. (Or is it really the ideal that he pursues because he loves?

And the playing orchestra, the guiding and the inspiriting conductor, must disclose and enhance all these things. They must unfold the masterly might, the self-creation of the symphonic structure. Out of their playing, as well as from the music, the hero must spring into life, run his puissant course, attain and deserve the glories of his passions, his achievements, his ends. Strauss bids his orchestra be virtuosi, musicians, musical dramatists, tone-poets. Wagner's ideal was that every man in his orchestra should be in his mind and heart an actor in the drama on the stage. Strauss would have each one of them a vitalizing element in his tone-poems. They must understand with him, see with him, feel with him—and yet be accomplishing his virtuoso tasks. An orchestra of Strausses ought to play these tone-poems. He ought to conduct in them—did not other conductors, like Mr. Fiedler yesterday, do so far more eloquently than did he. The Symphony Orchestra was such on Friday, and if even music lived in its own image and so engrossed and encompassed its hearers, "Ein Heldenleben" did in such playing of it.

Mere lapse of years aside, though there is now a century and a quarter of them, the beauty of Mozart's symphony is a remote beauty. It is music, after all, that is only faintly related to life, except as here and there the composer's spirit, gaining hard experience of it, touches the symphony with momentary melancholy or restlessness. Music, to Mozart and to his generation, sufficed to itself, expressed only itself. It belonged to muses who might indeed enchant mortals, but not to striving and passionate men. With al its forms and formulæ, with all the play of individual talents and temperaments upon it, seldom was it more than a bloodless and bodiless music, because in it were not the passions and the strivings of the man that wrote it, of the mankind around him, the voice of his time. It is easy to say music that should be so contemplated, so felt in this our very different time. Music, they say, as the voice of passion, intimate or far-reaching, has been carried too far. In its ambition to become, above all else, an expressive art, it is smothering its own intrinsic qualities. Certainly these flower in the "Jupiter" symphony, and yet how many of us yesterday heard it with more than contemplative and somewhat detached response to its beauties? Certainly in "Ein Heldenleben" is the passion for achievement, the passion for conduct, the passion for faith kept and ideals pursued that are of the finer impulses of our time. To hear Strauss's music was to feel it, as something that is a part of it the mental, the emotional, the spiritual life of our immediate time, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh. Mozart gave pleasure; Strauss renewed spirits.

H. T. P.

TUESDAY afternoon, Jan. 10, in Symphony Hall, a recital of old Italian airs, classic German, modern French, a few English songs and two operatic pieces by Mr. Bonci, the eminent tenor, who has left the opera house for the concert-room, and who is adept in many sorts of vocal artistry. In detail his programme is:

Spiagge amate ("Helen and Paris").....Gluck
Caro mio ben.....Giordani
Chi vuol la Zingarella?.....Paisiello
On Wings of Music.....Mendelssohn
Who Is Sylvia?—Hark, hark, the Lark..Schubert
Una furtiva Lagrima ("Elisir d' Amore").....Donizetti
Vieille Chanson.....Bizet
Romance.....Debussy
Embarquez-vous?.....Godard
Che gelida Manina ("La Bohème").....Puccini
Long Ago.—A Maid Sings Light.....MacDowell
Mattinata.....Leoncavallo

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

FOR a third successive year, Mr. Elman is returning to the Symphony Concerts and next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening he will play a piece, Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin and orchestra, in which, though with only a piano accompaniment, he has been heard to admiration here. Hitherto, with Tschaikowsky's and Dvorák's concertos, Mr. Elman has chosen music for the Symphony Concerts that tested the breadth and the intensity of his powers. Next week he will have music that will sound their fineness. In Berlin, where he has lately played, the reviewers noted his advance in such sensitiveness, and it will be interesting to follow it here. Mr. Fiedler justly admires the rugged, terse and tense music of Sibelius and would bring his audiences to like admiration. Only a year ago he revived the Finn's symphony in D major, and now he is repeating it. Not to be out of the fashion, Mr. Fiedler will end the concert with the music of Humperdinck, the movement of "The Moorish Rhapsody" that the composer calls "Tangier—In a Café."

/ / + / /

RECORD, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1910

JOMELLI SINGS AT SYMPHONY

From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Symphony in C Major. "Jupiter."
St. Saens. Hymn to Pallas Athene.
Debussy. Lia's Air from L'Enfant Prodigue."
Strauss. Tone-poem. "Heldenleben."

Vocalist, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli.

Here was indeed a wide sweep. From an 18th century symphony to a specimen of 20th century musical self-homage, with some fairly conservative modern vocalism sandwiched in between, for the Debussy who is here represented is not the musical Keats of the present, but Debussy in the Paris Conservatoire, Debussy competing for the Prix de Rome, Debussy conscious of appearing before conservative judges.

Mr. Fiedler is the peer of any Strauss conductor alive. Perhaps even he is "primus inter pares". Every figure in the complex jungle of tones is carefully disentangled and clearly displayed. For the study of Richard Strauss in his tone-poems we would advise orchestral scholars to come to Boston. Splendidly was the cackling of the hero's enemies interpreted. Mr. Witek gave the feminine theme and the theme of Caprice with excellent effect. The horn rang out the Don Juan theme finely. In short every orchestral point, solo or tutti was done artistically.

But such music only amazes us, it does not thrill us in any great degree. Neither hero nor heroine are musically beautiful. The love episodes fall far behind Tristan and Isolde, or even Lohengrin and Elsa. The battle scene is "sui generis" and Mr. Fiedler did not overforce it. The beginning and end of the work are its best portions. But every one must enthusiastically praise the performance. If ever Strauss is to make propaganda in America, it must be in Boston, for nowhere else, on this side of the Atlantic, would such a glorious interpretation of his work be possible.

St. Saens' "Hymn to Pallas Athene" was heard for the first time in Boston. There seems a certain kinship between the earlier Debussy and the later St. Saens and Massenet, but in this song we do not get the real St. Saens. It was written for the dedication of the great amphitheatre in Orange, in Provence, and it is self-conscious, artificial, bombastic festival music. It naturally seeks to be Hellenic in style, and Mr. Schnecker had plenty of harp-work to do, and did it finely.

The almost constant attempts at grandiloquence are a great demand upon the resources of the singer, and Mme. Jomelli rose to these demands with commendable power. It was not a beautiful song, but it was beautifully sung and the praise must go rather to Mme. Jeanne Jomelli than to M. Camille St. Saens.

MUSIC NOTES.

The programme that Bonci will give at his recital in Symphony Hall on Jan. 10, is one of extraordinary interest. A part of the selections will be classic tunes from old-time operas in the singing of which his art is supreme. More modern arias will be the lovely "Una gelida Manina" from "La Boheme".

He will sing three German songs, but with the English text, Mendelssohn's "On Wings of Music", and Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?" and "Hark, Hark! the Lark". Two modern songs are included, MacDowell's "Long Ago" and "A Maid Sings Light."

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1910.

THE BONCI RECITAL.

Alessandro Bonci will give a recital Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 10, in Symphony Hall. A part of his selections will be classic tunes from old-time operas, some modern arias, "Una Furtiva Lagrima," from "Elisir D'Amore," and the "Che Gelida Manina" from "La Boheme." He will sing Mendelssohn's "On Wings of Music," Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?" and "Hark, Hark! the Lark." Signor Bonci's programme is an interesting one; he will sing in there different languages—French, German and Italian.

DECEMBER 31, 1910.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Enough tickets and about 10 more," was Professor Lewis' reply to the question whether the hospitality of the Symphony rehearsal subscribers equaled his needs. The musical pedagogues who convened in Boston this week could not have taken a farewell impression of their visit more to their own satisfaction, or to that of Bostonians, than they took from the performance by Mr. Fiedler and his men and Mme. Jomelli in Symphony hall Friday afternoon.

The program was representative of the work of the Symphony concerts and at the same time it was one that gave no great difficulty to any of those concerned in its performance. The Mozart symphony was only a trifling problem in time-beating for Mr. Fiedler; the "Pallas Athene" hymn was a transparent medium through which the soloist could let her soprano splendors gleam; the air of Lia demanded just that talent for dramatic delineation which is of the concert platform, and which Mme. Jomelli has in surpassing measure; and as for the "Hero's Life" tone poem, what was it but a review of an old triumph of the Symphony players?

Let us not hasten to call the Saint-Saens hymn a great composition just because of the appropriateness of music to words. For there may prove to be such affectation in the words, when we come to reflect on their meaning, that no music to them can convince us, to any great degree, of its sincerity. Why should poet and composer go into this flattery with the people of Provence about their likeness to the Greeks? No reason why, unless, perhaps, because the old troubadour lays are worn out; or because the southern French, when on occasion they call on the polite artists of Paris to celebrate them, feel that classicism is the better worthy of the day and its reward than romanticism.

The eleventh symphony program follows: Mozart Symphony in C major; Saint-Saens, "Pallas Athene," hymn for soprano and orchestra, Op. 98; Debussy, recitative and aria of Lia from "L'Enfant Prodigue"; Strauss, tone poem, "A Hero Life," Op. 40. Soloist, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli.

* * *

THE CONCERTS.

Mischa Elman, the violinist, appears at the Symphony rehearsal of Friday afternoon, Jan. 6, and at the concert of Saturday evening, Jan. 7, presenting Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra, a work which he has hitherto played in Boston only with piano accompaniment. The orchestral numbers at these concerts will be the Symphony No. 2 in D major by Sibelius and "In a Cafe," from Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody."

Anton Witek is announced as soloist for the fourth symphony concert in Sanders theater, Cambridge, Thursday evening, Jan. 19.

Mr. Bonci's song recital program necessarily has operatic selections. Should we want him to give us songs alone when we know what his interpretations of the "Furtiva lagrima" and the "Gelida manina" are? These familiar airs and an air from Gluck's "Helen and Paris" are announced for his Symphony hall matinee of Tuesday, Jan. 10; also songs of Mendelssohn, Schubert ("Sylvia" and "Hark! hark! the lark!"), Bizet, Debussy, MacDowell.

EVE. MAIL

ress ..... New York City.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Elman again as soloist, gave their second concert Saturday afternoon at Carnegie hall before an audience which filled the house to the doors. He played the Mendelssohn concerto, but with more brilliancy and spirit than we hear it frequently, and again he threatened the "no encore" rule of the staid old organization.

The programme was lent much interest by the performance of a symphony in D minor by Jan Sibelius, his second. The composer is a Finn, and his work is of the north, with its atmosphere of gloom and of ruggedness. It is in four movements, but the third and fourth are not separated. There are innumerable themes, themes, indeed, which are lost because of the great number.

ANCES BAUER.

Even though we are growing accustomed to formlessness, there are many times that one would have wished for more compactness and more that was definite. The last movement was full of beautiful ideas and the vivacissimo before it accentuated the somber mood of the entire work. Mr. Fiedler had evidently given it his very best efforts, and it was played with breadth and nobility by the magnificent orchestra. Humperdinck's sprightly prelude to "Haensel und Gretel" never was placed where it did more good than upon this programme.

[126]

DECEMBER 31, 1910

MUSIC TEACHERS ATTEND SYMPHONY

Guests of Unnamed Subscribers Who Left Tickets for Them.

Some 200 of those who are attending the convention of the Music Teachers' National Association were present at yesterday's Symphony matinee as guests of unnamed subscribers, who courteously left tickets at the box office. The same courtesy will be extended to an equal number of visitors tonight.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony—so named perhaps on account of the Jovian fugue which distinguishes the finale—gives this week's program a classic introduction. The andante yesterday reached the point of absolute languor, beyond which there was nothing but vanishment itself. The performance of the final movement was the most effective feature. Here the orchestra displayed its dazzling brilliancy.

From this celebrated classic there was a long symphonic leap to Richard Strauss' gigantic tone poem, "A Hero Life," down for a third performance in this city, and unheard here since two years ago last month. Here was the new music with a vengeance—a double vengeance in the movement discribing Strauss' contempt for the castercritics who deny his greatness. The French critic who said that the public could not follow the fugue-finale of the "Jupiter" symphony found a companion yesterday in the person who noted that the feminine millinery began to rise during the Strauss hero's battle, when the trumpet fanfares deceived those who would not or could not follow the music into thinking—hoping, perhaps—that the finale had arrived. The consequent violation of the no-hat rule lasted until, after another quarter of an hour or so, the real finale came in the splendid climax marking the full development of the hero's theme. In this last movement Strauss and the orchestra yesterday seemed to be showing their talent to the very finest advantage.

Owing to the unavoidable absence of Concert Master Witek and Mr. Schroeder, the 'cello leader, the full orchestra for which the work calls was not present. Mr. Noack played the violin solos in the Strauss number effectively.

Mme. Jeanne Jomelli sang the Saint-Saens hymn, "Pallas Athene," and Lia's recitative, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," with beautiful effect.

HERALD, BOSTON, JANUARY 1, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Sibelius is the largest contributor to the 12th Symphony program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler will repeat the second symphony in D major with which he had much success a year ago. Of the living composers none has gained greater favor in Boston than Sibelius, and this symphony made a deep impression when it was played last year for the first time in a number of seasons. Humperdinck, who is now in the public eye owing to the performance in New York of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder," will be represented by a movement from the suite, "Moorish Rhapsody." The title of the movement is "Tangier—A Night in a Moorish Cafe." This suite was first done by Mr. Gericke and later under the same conductor it was done in part.

Mischa Elman will make his reappearance in Boston at these concerts and play Lalo's Spanish symphony.

MR. BONCI'S RECITAL.

The program that Alessandro Bonci will give at his recital in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 10, is one of great interest. He will sing in three languages—Italian, French and English. There will be classic arias from old-time operas in the singing of which his art is supreme, and more modern ones. Mr. Bonci will sing three German songs with the English text, Mendelssohn's "On the Wings of Music," and Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?" and "Hark, Hark! the Lark." Two modern songs are included, MacDowell's "Long Ago" and "A Maid Sings Light." The program in full is as follows:

Spiagge amate ("Helen and Paris").....Gluck
Caro mio ben.....Giordani
Chi vuol la Zingarella?.....Paisiello
On the Wings of Music.....Mendelssohn
Who Is Sylvia?.....Schubert
Hark, Hark! the Lark.....Schubert
Una furtiva Lagrima ("Elisir d'amore".....Donizetti
Belle Chanson.....Bizet
[illegible]rous?.....Debussy
Che Gelida Manina ("La Boheme").....Puccini
Long Ago.....MacDowell
A Maid Sings Light.....MacDowell
Mattinata.....Leoncavallo

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1911.

The most interesting musical event of next week will be the song recital which Alessandro Bonci is to give in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 10. Bonci seems definitely to have abandoned opera for the concert stage, and from the sucess that he has had so far this year there seems little doubt that he will hold a place similar to that held by Sembrich in the field of song interpretation.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME BROAD

MOZART, STRAUSS, DEBUSSY AND ST. SAENS MINGLED

Unthrilling "Tone Poem" Magnificently Played—Mme. Jomelli Sings From "L'Enfant Prodigue."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Symphony in C Major. "Jupiter."
St. Saens. Hymn to Pallas Athene.
Debussy. Lia's Air from L'Enfant Prodigue."
Strauss. Tone-poem. "Heldenleben."

Vocalist, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli.

Here was indeed a wide sweep. From an 18th century symphony to a specimen of 20th century musical self-homage, with some fairly conservative modern vocalism sandwiched in between, for the Debussy who is here represented is not the musical Keats of the present, but Debussy in the Paris Conservatoire, Debussy competing for the Prix de Rome, Debussy conscious of appearing before conservative judges.

It may be heterodox, but we do not like Mozart best in his most ambitious moods. The "Jupiter" was certainly the most ambitious symphony of the 18th century. Yet we prefer the less learned and more spontaneous symphony in G minor. When we want our fugues we can go to Bach. Nevertheless, the contrapuntal work in the first and last movements of this symphony is very unstrained and beautiful, even if it is not as "Mozartish" as the delicate first movement of the G minor.

The minuets of these old symphonies are somewhat faded. In this domain of simple "naivete" we hold Haydn the superior of Mozart and on the whole we think that his symphonies wear a little better than Mozart's, if we except the last three—the "Jupiter," the G minor and the Clarinette symphony—written in 1788.

Of the playing of the work nothing new can be said. Mozart contains no technical difficulties for our orchestra, but the scoring served to show the beginnings of symphonic orchestral work, as "Heldenleben" afterwards showed its culmination. The andante was finely played, but it is difficult for a modern to get into the placid mood to appreciate this kind of music. Mozart was too dramatic (in symphony) for his time, and not dramatic enough for ours. He uses more flute than usual, in this slow movement, for Mozart showed a dislike for the flute. The finale was very finely played and made the strongest effect of the work.

We can never quite reconcile ourselves to that modern self-conceit which causes the composer to bow down before himself (if such an acrobatic feat is possible) and worship his own greatness. Under certain circumstances this would be called megalomania. Nor can we ever believe that music may abolish all tonality, simply because a battle does so. We believe that Strauss is likely to fall short of being ranked with the greatest musical geniuses because he has been led astray by his own phenomenal skill. It is a case of "might have been," for there are indications in his songs as well as in some of the larger forms of his second period, which pointed to the highest order of achievement.

Mr. Fiedler is the peer of any Strauss conductor alive. Perhaps even he is "primus inter pares". Every figure in the complex jungle of tones is carefully disentangled and clearly displayed. For the study of Richard Strauss in his tone-poems we would advise orchestral scholars to come to Boston. Splendidly was the cackling of the hero's enemies interpreted. Mr. Witek gave the feminine theme and the theme of Caprice with excellent effect. The horn rang out the Don Juan theme finely. In short every orchestral point, solo or tutti was done artistically.

But such music only amazes us, it does not thrill us in any great degree. Neither hero nor heroine are musically beautiful. The love episodes fall far behind Tristan and Isolde, or even Lohengrin and Elsa. The battle scene is "sui generis" and Mr. Fiedler did not overforce it. The beginning and end of the work are its best portions. But every one must enthusiastically praise the performance. If ever Strauss is to make propaganda in America, it must be in Boston, for nowhere else, on this side of the Atlantic, would such a glorious interpretation of his work be possible.

That Mme. Jomelli should have chosen Lia's air just at the time that Alice Nielsen is singing it upon the opera stage is a fortuitous, but happy, coincidence. After all the air loses nothing by being heard on the concert stage. "L'Enfant Prodigue" has no plot in particular and about as much action as an Egyptian mummy. Of course it is some advantage to have the eye treated to a sight of charming Oriental landscape, or to an appropriate Scriptural costume, but these are not essentials. Mme. Jomelli is an artist of the highest intelligence and she caught the spirit of the song of the brooding mother most sympathetically. The song is simply the lament of the mother over her absent son. As already intimated, Debussy treats this with a directness that is sometimes absent from his later music. There is nothing elusive, nothing mystical, in this maternal cry, and to our mind it is fully as strong as the later, more cryptic, works of the composer. Mme. Jomelli was most expressive, even in the difficult passages in the highest register. The orchestral support was perfect, and the result was a greater display of enthusiasm than we have yet seen over a Debussy work in Boston; but much of this was due to the exquisite singing.

St. Saens' "Hymn to Pallas Athene" was heard for the first time in Boston. There seems a certain kinship between the earlier Debussy and the later St. Saens and Massenet, but in this song we do not get the real St. Saens. It was written for the dedication of the great amphitheatre in Orange, in Provence, and it is self-conscious, artificial, bombastic festival music. It naturally seeks to be Hellenic in style, and Mr. Schnecker had plenty of harpwork to do, and did it finely.

The almost constant attempts at grandiloquence are a great demand upon the resources of the singer, and Mme. Jomelli rose to these demands with commendable power. It was not a beautiful song, but it was beautifully sung and the praise must go rather to Mme. Jeanne Jomelli than to M. Camille St. Saens.

HERALD, THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1911.

Music Notes.

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Liadoff, Baba-Yaga, a musical picture after a Russian folk tale (first time in Boston); Sibelius, Symphony No. 2; Lalo, Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra (Mischa Elman, violinist); Humperdinck, Tangiers: A Night in a Moorish Cafe, from "A Moorish Rhapsody." There will be no Symphony concerts next week.

Alessandro Bonci, the distinguished tenor, will give a song recital in Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock. The program will include arias by Gluck, Donizetti and Puccini and songs by Giordani, Paisiello, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Bizet, Debussy, Godard, MacDowell and Leoncavallo.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN SUNDAY, JANUARY 1, 1911

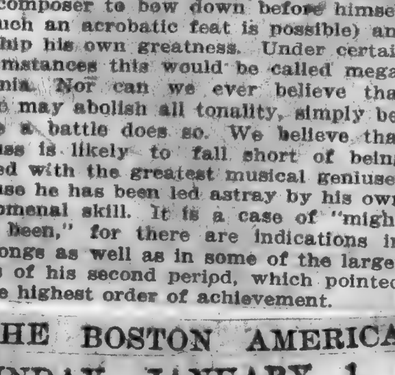
REPEAT SYMPHONY.

Sibelius Largest Contributor to the Twelfth Program.

Sibelius figures as the largest contributor to the twelfth Symphony program which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler will repeat the Second Symphony in D Major with which he had such success a year ago. Of the living composers none has gained greater favor in Boston than Sibelius, and this particular symphony of his made a deep impression when it was played last year for the first time in a number of seasons.

Humperdinck, who bulks largely now in the public eye owing to the performance in New York of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder," will be represented by a movement from the suite which he calls a "Moorish Rhapsody," the title of the movement being "Tangier—A Night in a Moorish Cafe." This suite was first done by Mr. Gericke and later under the same conductor it was done in part.

Mischa Elman will make his reappearance in Boston at these concerts, playing Lalo's Spanish Symphony. As Mr. Noack played with much success Lalo's quite forgotten First Concerto a week ago, it will be interesting for connoisseurs to compare the two works, coming as they do so close together.



MISCHA ELMAN

It is announced that Alessandro Bonci will give at his recital in Symphony Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, January 10, is one of extraordinary interest. He will sing in three languages, Italian, French and English. A part of the selections will be classic tunes from old-time operas, in the singing of which his art is supreme. More modern arias will be the lovely "Una Furtiva Lagrima" from "Elisir d'Amore" and the "Che Gelida Manina" from "La Boheme." He will sing three German songs, but with the English text, Mendelssohn's "On the Wings of Music," and Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?" and "Hark, Hark, the Lark." Two modern songs are included, MacDowell's "Long Ago" and "A Maid Sings Light."

POST, THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1911

BONCI RECITAL TO BE SONG DELIGHT

The most interesting musical event of next week will be the song recital which Alessandro Bonci is to give in Symphony Hall on Jan. 10. Bonci seems definitely to have abandoned opera for the concert stage, and from the success that he has had so far this year there seems little doubt that he will hold a place similar to that held by Sembrich in the field of song interpretation. The parallel of his art and that of Sembrich is curiously close. Both of them are masters of the rapidly disappearing art of bel canto; both of them are expert in languages and both of them have built their singing on the finest qualities of musicianship.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1911

BONCI RECITAL.

Allesandro Bonci, the distinguished tenor, comes to Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 10, at 2:30 o'clock, in recital. Mr. Bonci is one of the few representatives today of the rapidly disappearing art of bel canto, he having relinquished the opera stage to be an exemplar of this art on the concert stage. He has a voice of pure lyric quality. His New York recital evoked enthusiastic praise from the most exacting critics. Particular stress is laid on his marvelous diction—for that his voice is marvelous goes without saying—as he sings in Italian, French and English with perfect enunciation. He will sing much the same programme as in New York.

[129]

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE SINGERS AND THE OPERA HOUSE

The Change in Repertory, Standards and Public Liking That Has Sent Mr. Bonci and Mr. Clement to Concerts—The Opera and the Concert of Yesterday—A Californian Rhapsody Over Tetrazzini Out-of-Doors—The Grave Problem of Miss Farrar's Name—The Possibilities of a Modernized "Lucia"—The Unfinished "Ysobel"—Debussy's New Songs

MR. Bonci, Mr. Clément, and Mme. Sembrich excel all other singers whom America has known in recent years in the finesse of song, and with one accord, they have forsaken the opera house for the concert-room. The years may have counselled Mme. Sembrich to leave the stage; but Mr. Bonci is still in his vocal and physical prime and ambitious of operatic distinction. Mr. Clément is in like fulness of his powers and strength, and in Paris, he is the first and applauded tenor of the Opera-Comique. Mme. Sembrich has long had her high place in concerts in America; but Mr. Bonci and Mr. Clément are both making this winter their first considerable venture into them. The cynical may easily say that neither tenor much interested the public of the Metropolitan and that each prefers to be the one and only figure of his song recitals rather than even a chief item in a cast at the opera house. Of course, too, there are financial persuasions in these things.

Grant both; and yet the fact remains that Mr. Bonci and Mr. Clément seemingly left the operatic stage in America because it gave them no room for their particular and distinctive talents and because the public of the opera house was not especially interested in them. The elder Italian operas in which Mr. Bonci excels come more and more seldom to the stage; the lighter French pieces, in which Mr. Clément shines, have no very firm footing in America. The newer music-drama asks less the beauty and the finesse of song than its power and its characterizing qualities. A new generation in the auditorium prefers such operas and the singers that cultivate them. It seeks the excitements of lyric drama more than it does the distinctions of vocal art. The big voice and not the voice of light and sweet timbre pleases it; the big tone, and not the finely spun tone, is its delight. The vocal likings, the vocal discriminations of operatic audiences have changed; so that almost alone of the operatic tenors of the hour in America, Mr. Constantino can keep to the older ways of song and still find a responsive public.

It is the old reproach, as it is also the peculiar distinction, of opera that it is a hybrid thing asking a mixed art. For the time, the elements of song and vocal artistry are not uppermost in it. They keep—or they should keep—their high places in concerts and the tradition is that audiences are finer-grained there than they are in the opera house. (Yet the "big tone" has been known to excite the coolest of audiences and very bad singing has been applauded in the severest of concert-rooms.) Mr. Bonci and Mr. Clément believe that they will find a more susceptible and appreciative public there. They have the fortunate precedent of Mme. Sembrich before them. They will soon try their experiment here in Boston. Then we shall see—what we shall see.

H. T. P.

GAZZETTA DEL MASSACHUSETTS
Sabato 7 Gennaio 1911
Boston, Mass.

Avvenimento artistico

Richiamiamo l' attenzione dei buongustai di deliziosi concerti al prossimo avvenimento artistico, al grande concerto cioe' che sara' dato dal celebre tenore lirico Alessandro Bonci martedi prossimo alle ore 2 30 p. m. nella Symphony Hall.

Il Bonci sta compiendo una tournee di concerti attraverso gli Stati Uniti, ed e' inutile il ripetere, che ovunque egli si presenta e' accolto con quel massimo entusiasmo riservato esclusivamente ai grandi artisti dell'ugola aurea.

Il programma e' dei piu' attraenti e non v'ha dubbio che nell' Atene degli Stati Uniti questo concerto segnera' l'apoteosi del grande tenore gia' definito la perfezione dell'arte del canto.

I prezzi dei biglietti sono di $2, 1.50, 1.00, 75c, e 50c vendibili alla BoxOffice della Symphony Hall. Affrettatevi a fornirvi di biglietti.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1910

MUSIC TEACHERS ATTEND SYMPHONY

Guests of Unnamed Subscribers Who Left Tickets for Them.

Some 200 of those who are attending the convention of the Music Teachers' National Association were present at yesterday's Symphony matinee as guests of unnamed subscribers, who courteously left tickets at the box office. The same courtesy will be extended to an equal number of visitors tonight.

Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony—so named perhaps on account of the Jovian fugue which distinguishes the finale—gives this week's program a classic introduction. The andante yesterday reached the point of absolute languor, beyond which there was nothing but vanishment itself. The performance of the final movement was the most effective feature. Here the orchestra displayed its dazzling brilliancy.

From this celebrated classic there was a long symphonic leap to Richard Strauss' gigantic tone poem, "A Hero Life," down for a third performance in this city, and unheard here since two years ago last month. Here was the new music with a vengeance—a double vengeance in the movement discribing Strauss' contempt for the castercritics who deny his greatness. The French critic who said that the public could not follow the fugue-finale of the "Jupiter" symphony found a companion yesterday in the person who noted that the feminine millinery began to rise during the Strauss hero's battle, when the trumpet fanfares deceived those who would not or could not follow the music into thinking—hoping, perhaps—that the finale had arrived. The consequent violation of the no-hat rule lasted until, after another quarter of an hour or so, the real finale came in the splendid climax marking the full development of the hero's theme. In this last movement Strauss and the orchestra yesterday seemed to be showing their talent to the very finest advantage.

Owing to the unavoidable absence of Concert Master Witek and Mr. Schroeder, the 'cello leader, the full orchestra for which the work calls was not present. Mr. Noack played the violin solos in the Strauss number effectively.

Mme. Jeanne Jomelli sang the Saint-Saens hymn, "Pallas Athene," and Lia's recitative, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," with beautiful effect.

HERALD, BOSTON, JANUARY 1, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Sibelius is the largest contributor to the 12th Symphony program of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler will repeat the second symphony in D major with which he had much success a year ago. Of the living composers none has gained greater favor in Boston than Sibelius, and this symphony made a deep impression when it was played last year for the first time in a number of seasons. Humperdinck, who is now in the public eye owing to the performance in New York of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder," will be represented by a movement from the suite, "Moorish Rhapsody." The title of the movement is "Tangier—A Night in a Moorish Cafe." This suite was first done by Mr. Gericke and later under the same conductor it was done in part.

Mischa Elman will make his reappearance in Boston at these concerts and play Lalo's Spanish symphony.

MR. BONCI'S RECITAL.

The program that Alessandro Bonci will give at his recital in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 10, is one of great interest. He will sing in three languages—Italian, French and English. There will be classic arias from old-time operas in the singing of which his art is supreme, and more modern ones. Mr. Bonci will sing three German songs with the English text, Mendelssohn's "On the Wings of Music," and Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?" and "Hark, Hark! the Lark." Two modern songs are included, MacDowell's "Long Ago" and "A Maid Sings Light." The program in full is as follows:

Spiagge amate ("Helen and Paris")....Gluck
Caro mio ben.....Giordani
Chi vuol la Zingarella?.....Paisiello
On the Wings of Music.....Mendelssohn
Who Is Sylvia?.....Schubert
Hark, Hark! the Lark.....Schubert
Una furtiva Lagrima ("Elisir d'amore"
.....Donizetti
Mallie Chanson.....Bizet
[illegible].....Debussy
Che Gelida Manina ("La Boheme").....Godard
Long Ago.....MacDowell
A Maid Sings Light.....MacDowell
Mattinata.....Leoncavallo

JOURNAL—THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1911.

The most interesting musical event of next week will be the song recital which Alessandro Bonci is to give in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 10. Bonci seems definitely to have abandoned opera for the concert stage, and from the sucess that he has had so far this year there seems little doubt that he will hold a place similar to that held by Sembrich in the field of song interpretation.

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME BROAD

MOZART, STRAUSS, DEBUSSY AND ST. SAENS MINGLED

Unthrilling "Tone Poem" Magnificently Played — Mme. Jomelli Sings From "L'Enfant Prodigue."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Mozart. Symphony in C Major. "Jupiter."
St. Saens. Hymn to Pallas Athene.
Debussy. Lia's Air from L'Enfant Prodigue."
Strauss. Tone-poem. "Heldenleben."

Vocalist, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli.

Here was indeed a wide sweep. From an 18th century symphony to a specimen of 20th century musical self-homage, with some fairly conservative modern vocalism sandwiched in between, for the Debussy who is here represented is not the musical Keats of the present, but Debussy in the Paris Conservatoire, Debussy competing for the Prix de Rome, Debussy conscious of appearing before conservative judges.

It may be heterodox, but we do not like Mozart best in his most ambitious moods. The "Jupiter" was certainly the most ambitious symphony of the 18th century. Yet we prefer the less learned and more spontaneous symphony in G minor. When we want our fugues we can go to Bach. Nevertheless, the contrapuntal work in the first and last movements of this symphony is very unstrained and beautiful, even if it is not as "Mozartish" as the delicate first movement of the G minor.

The minuets of these old symphonies are somewhat faded. In this domain of simple "naivete" we hold Haydn the superior of Mozart and on the whole we think that his symphonies wear a little better than Mozart's, if we except the last three—the "Jupiter," the G minor and the Clarinette symphony—written in 1788.

Of the playing of the work nothing new can be said. Mozart contains no technical difficulties for our orchestra, but the scoring served to show the beginnings of symphonic orchestral work, as "Heldenleben" afterwards showed its culmination. The andante was finely played, but it is difficult for a modern to get into the placid mood to appreciate this kind of music. Mozart was too dramatic (in symphony) for his time, and not dramatic enough for ours. He uses more flute than usual, in this slow movement, for Mozart showed a dislike for the flute. The finale was very finely played and made the strongest effect of the work.

We can never quite reconcile ourselves to that modern self-conceit which causes the composer to bow down before himself (if such an acrobatic feat is possible) and worship his own greatness. Under certain circumstances this would be called megalomania. Nor can we ever believe that music may abolish all tonality, simply because a battle does so. We believe that Strauss is likely to fall short of being ranked with the greatest musical geniuses because he has been led astray by his own phenomenal skill. It is a case of "might have been," for there are indications in his songs as well as in some of the larger forms of his second period, which pointed to the highest order of achievement.

Mr. Fiedler is the peer of any Strauss conductor alive. Perhaps even he is "primus inter pares". Every figure in the complex jungle of tones is carefully disentangled and clearly displayed. For the study of Richard Strauss in his tone-poems we would advise orchestral scholars to come to Boston. Splendidly was the cackling of the hero's enemies interpreted. Mr. Witek gave the feminine theme and the theme of Caprice with excellent effect. The horn rang out the Don Juan theme finely. In short every orchestral point, solo or tutti was done artistically.

But such music only amazes us, it does not thrill us in any great degree. Neither hero nor heroine are musically beautiful. The love episodes fall far behind Tristan and Isolde, or even Lohengrin and Elsa. The battle scene is "sui generis" and Mr. Fiedler did not overforce it. The beginning and end of the work are its best portions. But every one must enthusiastically praise the performance. If ever Strauss is to make propaganda in America, it must be in Boston, for nowhere else, on this side of the Atlantic, would such a glorious interpfetation of his work be possible.

That Mme. Jomelli should have chosen Lia's air just at the time that Alice Nielsen is singing it upon the opera stage is a fortuitous, but happy, coincidence. After all the air loses nothing by being heard on the concert stage. "L'Enfant Prodigue" has no plot in particular and about as much action as an Egyptian mummy. Of course it is some advantage to have the eye treated to a sight of charming Oriental landscape, or to an appropriate Scriptural costume, but these are not essentials. Mme. Jomelli is an artist of the highest intelligence and she caught the spirit of the song of the brooding mother most sympathetically. The song is simply the lament of the mother over her absent son. As already intimated, Debussy treats this with a directness that is sometimes absent from his later music. There is nothing elusive, nothing mystical, in this maternal cry, and to our mind it is fully as strong as the later, more cryptic, works of the composer. Mme. Jomelli was most expressive, even in the difficult passages in the highest register. The orchestral support was perfect, and the result was a greater display of enthusiasm than we have yet seen over a Debussy work in Boston; but much of this was due to the exquisite singing.

St. Saens' "Hymn to Pallas Athene" was heard for the first time in Boston. There seems a certain kinship between the earlier Debussy and the later St. Saens and Massenet, but in this song we do not get the real St. Saens. It was written for the dedication of the great amphitheatre in Orange, in Provence, and it is self-conscious, artificial, bombastic festival music. It naturally seeks to be Hellenic in style, and Mr. Schnecker had plenty of harpwork to do, and did it finely.

The almost constant attempts at grandiloquence are a great demand upon the resources of the singer, and Mme. Jomelli rose to these demands with commendable power. It was not a beautiful song, but it was beautifully sung and the praise must go rather to Mme. Jeanne Jomelli than to M. Camille St. Saens.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN SUNDAY, JANUARY 1, 1911

REPEAT SYMPHONY.

Sibelius Largest Contributor to the Twelfth Program.

Sibelius figures as the largest contributor to the twelfth Symphony program which will be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler will repeat the Second Symphony in D Major with which he had such success a year ago. Of the living composers none has gained greater favor in Boston than Sibelius, and this particular symphony of his made a deep impression when it was played last year for the first time in a number of seasons.

Humperdinck, who bulks largely now in the public eye owing to the performance in New York of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder," will be represented by a movement from the suite which he calls a "Moorish Rhapsody," the title of the movement being "Tangier—A Night in a Moorish Cafe." This suite was first done by Mr. Gericke and later under the same conductor it was done in part.

Mischa Elman will make his reappearance in Boston at these concerts, playing Lalo's Spanish Symphony. As Mr. Noack played with much success Lalo's quite forgotten First Concerto a week ago, it will be interesting for connoisseurs to compare the two works, coming as they do so close together.

MISCHA ELMAN

[illegible] that Alessandro Bonci will give at his recital in Symphony Hall, on Tuesday afternoon, January 10, is one of extraordinary interest. He will sing in three languages, Italian, French and English. A part of the selections will be classic tunes from old-time operas, in the singing of which his art is supreme. More modern arias will be the lovely "Una Furtiva Lagrima" from "Elisir d'Amore" and the "Che Gelida Manina" from "La Boheme." He will sing three German songs, but with the English text, Mendelssohn's "On the Wings of Music," and Schubert's "Who Is Sylvia?" and "Hark, Hark, the Lark." Two modern songs are included, MacDowell's "Long Ago" and "A Maid Sings Light."

HERALD, THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1911.

Music Notes.

The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows: Liadoff, Baba-Yaga, a musical picture after a Russian folk tale (first time in Boston); Sibelius, Symphony No. 2; Lalo, Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra (Mischa Elman, violinist); Humperdinck, Tangiers: A Night in a Moorish Cafe, from "A Moorish Rhapsody." There will be no Symphony concerts next week.

Alessandro Bonci, the distinguished tenor, will give a song recital in Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock. The program will include arias by Gluck, Donizetti and Puccini and songs by Giordani, Paisiello, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Bizet, Debussy, Godard, MacDowell and Leoncavallo.

POST, THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1911

BONCI RECITAL TO BE SONG DELIGHT

The most interesting musical event of next week will be the song recital which Alessandro Bonci is to give in Symphony Hall on Jan. 10. Bonci seems definitely to have abandoned opera for the concert stage, and from the success that he has had so far this year there seems little doubt that he will hold a place similar to that held by Sembrich in the field of song interpretation. The parallel of his art and that of Sembrich is curiously close. Both of them are masters of the rapidly disappearing art of bel canto; both of them are expert in languages and both of them have built their singing on the finest qualities of musicianship.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1911.

BONCI RECITAL.

Allesandro Bonci, the distinguished tenor, comes to Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 10, at 2:30 o'clock, in recital. Mr. Bonci is one of the few representatives today of the rapidly disappearing art of bel canto, he having relinquished the opera stage to be an exemplar of this art on the concert stage. He has a voice of pure lyric quality. His New York recital evoked enthusiastic praise from the most exacting critics. Particular stress is laid on his marvelous diction—for that his voice is marvelous goes without saying—as he sings in Italian, French and English with perfect enunciation. He will sing much the same programme as in New York.

[129]

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE SINGERS AND THE OPERA HOUSE

The Change in Repertory, Standards and Public Liking That Has Sent Mr. Bonci and Mr. Clement to Concerts—The Opera and the Concert of Yesterday—A Californian Rhapsody Over Tetrazzini Out-of-Doors—The Grave Problem of Miss Farrar's Name—The Possibilities of a Modernized "Lucia"—The Unfinished "Ysobel"—Debussy's New Songs

MR. Bonci, Mr. Clément, and Mme. Sembrich excel all other singers whom America has known in recent years in the finesse of song, and with one accord, they have forsaken the opera house for the concert-room. The years may have counselled Mme. Sembrich to leave the stage; but Mr. Bonci is still in his vocal and physical prime and ambitious of operatic distinction. Mr. Clément is in like fulness of his powers and strength, and in Paris, he is the first and applauded tenor of the Opera-Comique. Mme. Sembrich has long had her high place in concerts in America; but Mr. Bonci and Mr. Clément are both making this winter their first considerable venture into them. The cynical may easily say that neither tenor much interested the public of the Metropolitan and that each prefers to be the one and only figure of his song recitals rather than even a chief item in a cast at the opera house. Of course, too, there are financial persuasions in these things.

Grant both; and yet the fact remains that Mr. Bonci and Mr. Clément seemingly left the operatic stage in America because it gave them no room for their particular and distinctive talents and because the public of the opera house was not especially interested in them. The elder Italian operas in which Mr. Bonci excels come more and more seldom to the stage; the lighter French pieces, in which Mr. Clément shines, have no very firm footing in America. The newer music-drama asks less the beauty and the finesse of song than its power and its characterizing qualities. A new generation in the auditorium prefers such operas and the singers that cultivate them. It seeks the excitements of lyric drama more than it does the distinctions of vocal art. The big voice and not the voice of light and sweet timbre pleases it; the big tone, and not the finely spun tone, is its delight. The vocal likings, the vocal discriminations of operatic audiences have changed; so that almost alone of the operatic tenors of the hour in America, Mr. Constantino can keep to the older ways of song and still find a responsive public.

It is the old reproach, as it is also the peculiar distinction, of opera that it is a hybrid thing asking a mixed art. For the time, the elements of song and vocal artistry are not uppermost in it. They keep—or they should keep—their high places in concerts and the tradition is that audiences are finer-grained there than they are in the opera house. (Yet the "big tone" has been known to excite the coolest of audiences and very bad singing has been applauded in the severest of concert-rooms.) Mr. Bonci and Mr. Clément believe that they will find a more susceptible and appreciative public there. They have the fortunate precedent of Mme. Sembrich before them. They will soon try their experiment here in Boston. Then we shall see—what we shall see.

H. T. P.

CAZZETTA DEL MASSACHUSETTS
Sabato 7 Gennaio 1911
Boston, Mass.

Avvenimento artistico

Richiamiamo l' attenzione dei buongustai di deliziosi concerti al prossimo avvenimento artistico, al grande concerto cioe' che sara' dato dal celebre tenore lirico Alessandro Bonci martedi prossimo alle ore 2 30 p. m. nella Symphony Hall.

Il Bonci sta compiendo una tournee di concerti attraverso gli Stati Uniti, ed e' inutile il ripetere, che ovunque egli si presenta e' accolto con quel massimo entusiasmo riservato esclusivamente ai grandi artisti dell'ugola aurea.

Il programma e' dei piu' attraenti e non v'ha dubbio che nell' Atene degli Stati Uniti questo concerto segnera' l'apoteosi del grande tenore gia' definito la perfezione dell'arte del canto.

I prezzi del biglietti sono di $2, 1.50, 1.00, 75c, e 50c vendibili alla BoxOffice della Symphony Hall. Affrettatevi a fornirvi di biglietti.

SYMPHONY ... FOR THE VISITORS

Program Especially Arranged for Music Teachers Attending Convention.

MME. JOMELLI SINGS ARIAS

Orchestral Pieces by Mozart and Richard Strauss Are Adequately Rendered.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 11th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, soprano, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major, "Jupiter".....Mozart
Pallas Atthene; hymn for soprano and orchestra.....Saint-Saens
Lia's aria from "The Prodigal Son"...Debussy
"Ein Heldenleben".....Strauss

It is said that the orchestral compositions were chosen at the wish of musicians attending the meeting of the Teachers' National Association. About 150 of these visitors were present yesterday, largely through the courtesy of subscribers who gave up their seats for the occasion.

Some might seize the opportunity to discourse on the amazing development of music since 1788, when Mozart wrote his three chief symphonies. "Ein Heldenleben" is now nearly 12 years old, and there are passages in it that sound as old-fashioned as certain pages of the "Jupiter." This "Jupiter" is not so marvellous a work as the symphony in G minor, nor is "Ein Heldenleben," on the whole, so remarkable among Strauss's symphonic poems as "Till Eulenspiegel" or "Don Quixote"; yet nobody could have written the finale of the "Jupiter" but Mozart, and nobody but Strauss in the years since Beethoven could have composed the love music and the noble conclusion of "Ein Heldenleben."

The section that characterizes the hero's snarling, carking antagonists and the musical depiction of the battle field, while they are highly entertaining and show the mastery of the man over the orchestra and his inventive faculty in putting the grotesque and the gigantic into tones, are not the portions of this symphonic poem that raise it to a towering height. There is too much that is purely cerebral in feats of this sort. As far back as 1887 Von Buelow, not wholly clear about Strauss's "Aus-Italien," thought that "the inspired composer" had gone to "the utmost limits of tonal possibility in the region of beauty, had even overstepped them without compelling necessity." Buelow was a man not easily disconcerted by the audacity of a composer. What would he have said to pages of "Ein Heldenleben" and the "Symphonia Domestica"?

Neither Mozart nor Strauss can be justly characterized as a revolutionary. Mozart's music is the fullest, the perfect expression of the formulas and traditions that held sway before him. Neither in opera nor in symphonic music did he strike out new paths. Strauss has invented little or nothing in harmonic scheme, in melodic form, or even in instrumentation that is absolutely new. He has made singular experiments with instruments, but his general scheme is the enlargement of that which already existed. As a melodist, he is by no means pre-eminent. His themes in the symphonic poems are often square-toed, often short-breathed, sometimes commonplace were it not for the fine trappings with which he clothes them.

There are few melodies of Mozart that are emotional as we now understand the word. They are suave, refined, tender, gay, gently melancholy, or they have the old-world charm of a Watteau, but there is little passion. There are few airs in his compositions that breathe the amorous spirit of the songs given to Cherubino. Nowhere in his works is there a page for tragic intensity comparable with the short air of Donna Anna or the awful music that attends the Statue as he enters the supper room to call Don Giovanni to repentance.

But no one, except Chopin, equalled Mozart in the perfection of his style. Haydn was a cunning workman, and it is not easy to pick a flaw in his expression, which was that of his period. This very perfection makes a performance of a symphony, string quartet, air by Mozart difficult. Every phrase, almost every note has a distinct value. There must be absolute proportion, the finest sense of tonal values, the utmost care in the maintenance of melodic lines. There are orchestras that can stun an audience by a thunderous performance of a work by Strauss and butcher a symphony by Mozart. The conductor, Richard Strauss, is never so happy as when conducting Mozart's music. He knows and exults in the difficulties.

The two symphonic works then served to display the superb qualities of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The performance of the "Jupiter" had the requisite clarity, suavity, fleetness and proportion. That of "Ein Heldenleben" was not too boisterous, too frenzied. The inherent grandeur of structure and nobility of expression were brought out without fuss or exaggeration. A feature of the many features of this concert was Mr. Noack's admirable playing of the solo violin, both in the fantastical and capricious passages typical of the coyness and coquetry of the hero's helpmeet and in those glowing measures that portray her love and adoration after he has made her his own. Mr. Noack's performance was brilliant and emotional.

Mme. Jomelli, favorably known here by her singing at Handel and Haydn and other concerts, sang for the first time in this city at a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra. Saint-Saens's Hymn was performed here for the first time. It was composed for the festival at Orange in 1894 and bears all the marks of a piece provided punctiliously for an occasion. It is irreproachably constructed; it has a certain style, even a plausible grandeur at times; but the music is perfunctory in its precision, in its formal cut. There is not one burst of inspiration, no warmth, not even in the music that is set to the poet's praise of Provence with her intoxicating sky and enchanting virgins.

Mme. Jomelli sang this Hymn and Lia's recitative and aria with marked vocal skill. The voice was clear, pure, brilliant. Her performance was an excellent piece of work, an example of uncommonly good singing. There was a lack of true feeling in Lia's lament, and in the interpretation of the Hymn there was not the dramatic fire, the sweeping breadth, the grand delivery, the personal authority that might have lent for the moment impressiveness to the music so correctly and coldly written.

The program of next week's concerts will be as follows: Sibelius, Symphony in D major, No. 2; Lalo, Symphonie Espagnole for violin (Mischa Elman); Humperdinck, "In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody."

THE CONCERTS.

Alessandro Bonci, the former Metropolitan tenor, comes to Boston on Tuesday to give a matinee song recital in Symphony hall. Mr. Bonci made the carefullest preparations for his experiment in the song recital field, knowing the difficulty for an Italian operatic tenor to make his way in a supposedly un-Italian department of vocal art. The problem, as he thought of it, was chiefly one of pronunciation, or, in the singing teachers' language, diction; and he gave all his attention for a time to mastering the French and English consonants and vowels as called for in certain songs that he wishes to interpret.

Recital audiences are more exacting in their demands of singers than opera audiences, and it is not strange that an artist of Mr. Bonci's type should wish to win concert honor.

The tenor found success in New York in a program which, practically, he will repeat in Boston. It includes classic airs by Gluck, Giordani and Paisiello and two modern arias associated with the Bonci of the lyric stage: the "Racconto" of "Boheme" and the "Furtiva Lagrima" of "L'Elisir d'Amore." The songs are by Mendelssohn, Schubert, Bizet, Debussy, Godard, MacDowell and Leoncavallo.

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra gives its fourth Cambridge concert in Sanders theater Thursday evening, Jan. 19, with Anton Witek as soloist.

* * *

(Copyright by A. Dupont, N. Y.)
ALESSANDRO BONCI.
Lyric tenor who gives song recital in Symphony hall Tuesday afternoon, Jan. 10.

GLOBE—SATURDAY JANUARY 7, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mischa Elman Returns an Applauded Soloist.

Admirable Performance of Sibelius' Second Symphony.

The program of the 12th symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows:

Liadoff's "Baba-Yaga": A Musical Picture after a Russian Folk Tale, op 56, first time in Boston; Sinding's second symphony in D major; Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra, op 21, Mischa Elman soloist, and Humperdinck's "Tangier: A Night in a Moorish Cafe," from the "Moorish Rhapsody."

Sibelius' symphony, a puzzle when first played here, better understood when repeated last year, gained a cordial and appreciative hearing yesterday.

It no longer need be said that the composer's writings are saturated with the dominant spirit of the Finns, his countrymen, rugged, long-suffering, grimly persevering in their love of liberty and freedom.

In a peculiar sense his music is characterizing, not of the progress of simulated action upon a stage, but in an abstract way of a national drama, of the brooding modes of thought and life of a people sequestered in a bare, bleak country, in which summer perishes as a flower, and is caught in the grip of winter, isolation and darkness.

Sibelius is aggressively, implacably individualistic. He sings as an epic poet of aspiration, of stern, fierce and unrelenting courage, of rebuff and the melancholy of despair, but of the undaunted determination of final triumph. It is the spirit which permeates the book of national legend, the Kalevala.

There is not a passage of frankly sensuous appeal, unless the plaintive but noble song of the oboe in the second movement be cited as exception. The composer's palette of harmonic and of orchestral color is seldom radiant. It mirrors the dark hues of his native moors and fens, shot through at times by the flash of reflected light, as that of the moon upon fields of ice.

There is much of short, sharp and vehement declaration and retort, and Mr Fiedler punctuated such passages in the brass effectively. Whether the music is of affirmation or of denial is tremendously assertive, virile and masculine; even in the moments of melancholy it is an exalted grief.

The last movement is weakest in continuity and structure. The apotheosis is approached as by a spent and weary runner, but elsewhere there is little to be called labored.

It is not music to excite rapture or rhapsody, but music to hear with growing respect for its spirit, and for the workmanship which has expressed it.

Mr Elman has returned with a little more aplomb, a little more assurance and self-sufficiency. Suffusion of talent is sometimes an impediment in the advance toward a career.

Technical feats are still like a breath of air to this extraordinarily endowed young player—to be taken without a thought. He bows with the same commanding breadth, and his tone retains its peculiar and characteristic virility, but the very facility with which he plays is tainting his brilliance of style with insincerity. He is less the artist than when he came, although he is perhaps even more overwhelming as a performer upon the violin. He was recalled a half dozen times a least by an audience that would eagerly have demanded more.

The Liadoff revealed a piquant sense of color, and of sharply contrasted effects. There are Rusians who have depicted an oriental atmosphere of more luxurious abandon and more languorous beauty than the mild-mannered Mr Humperdinck, but his picture with the droning bassoons and the lethargy rousing finally to life and sense is colorful, fanciful music.

Mr Fiedler was at home in the selections of the day, and the orchestra played with fine spirit.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1911.

RUSSIAN VIOLINIST SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Mischa Elman's Playing Calls Forth Long and Loud Applause.

Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, who is still in his teens, is the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. Yesterday afternoon his playing of the first, fourth and fifth movements from Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" was rewarded with long and loud applause. The five-foot virtuoso shook hands with Conductor Fiedler, bowed right and left to the applauding men of the orchestra and after that took part in several recalls. His playing of the fourth and fifth movements was on the whole the most gratifying feature of the performance. In the first movement the effects were ragged. But there was a ravishing beauty of tone in the fourth movement and a sparkling technical display in the final movement. The Lalo music, which was written for Sarasate, is an uncommonly choice example of virtuoso composition, and in addition to that the orchestration is delightful of itself.

Mr. Fiedler had a little surprise for the audience in the shape of a "musical picture" by one of the foremost Russian composers, Anatol Constantinovitch Liadoff. It bore the title of "Baba-Yaga," and it was described as being based upon a Russian folk tale. There were further elucidations in the program. It seems that Baba-Yaga is a sorceress or demon who lives in the woods. In this particular case pictured by Liadoff, the sorceress "went down into the court, whistled—and before her appeared a mortar, pestle and broom. Baba-Yaga set out seated in the mortar, urging it on with the pestle and rubbing out the traces with the broom. * * * Soon new life stirred in the forest; the trees creaked and the dry leaves cracked." This was the first performance of the piece in Boston and it was thoroughly enjoyed.

Sibelius' second symphony and "Tangier: A Night in a Moorish Cafe," from Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," are also on the program.

RECORD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1911

THE BONCI RECITAL.

The coming of Bonci, the distinguished tenor, to Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon furnishes a decided flavor of novelty to the New Year. Bonci is known here chiefly through his appearances in past years with the Metropolitan Opera Co. as the possessor of a tenor voice of purest lyric quality, as an artist of highest rank, with musicianly qualities that are seldom found today in Italian singers.

Here he will sing much the same programme that he gave in New York. It will consist of three classic tunes by Gluck, Giordani, Paisiello, and two arias most closely connected with his fame, "Una furtiva Lagrima" from "L'Elisir d'amore" and "Che gelida Manina" from "La Boheme," will be the sole representatives of opera of today.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1911

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

A Week with Its Concerts All in One Day—The Absent Symphony Orchestra—Mr. Bonci's Recital of Many Songs and Operatic Pieces—"The Kneisels" Again—A New Quartet by Rubin Goldmark

AGAIN the concerts of the new week are few. The Symphony Orchestra will be absent on one of its journeys to New York and to the other cities to which it pays monthly visits. The wandering singers, pianists and violinists have for the most part gone westward, and of them only Mr. Bonci is left for the moment for Boston. His recital is set for the afternoon of Tuesday in Symphony Hall. The same evening the Kneisel Quartet will give the third of its current concerts here in Chickering Hall, with a new piece by Rubin Goldmark for the chief item in the programme. Thus do the concerts of a week fall within one day of it.

/ / + / /.

Symphony Hall: Mr. Bonci

RARELY does a tenor of distinction in the opera house forsake it through a whole season for the concert-room. At the Manhattan, at the Metropolitan and at many another opera house, Mr. Bonci's distinctions have been the purity and the sweetness of his voice, and his sensitiveness to every refinement of song. Above any other tenor on the operatic stage in America he is skilled in the unalloyed artistry of singing. He is not the singing-actor. He is the singer, pure, but by no means simple, and Boston will hear him as such next Tuesday afternoon. These qualities abundantly fit him for the concert-room, and he has undertaken his new venture not to display himself in a few operatic fragments, but to prove his mettle in old Italian airs, in classical German songs, in modern French pieces, and even in songs in English, wherein he has polished his diction as sedulously as though it were an established operatic language. His programme is:

Spiagge amate ("Helen and Paris").....Gluck
Caro mio ben.....Giordani
Chi vuol la Zingarella?.....Paisiello
On Wings of Music.....Mendelssohn
Who Is Sylvia?—Hark, hark, the Lark!..Schubert
Una furtiva Lagrima ("Elisir d' Amore")..Donizetti
Vieille Chanson.....Bizet
Romance.....Debussy
Embarquez-vous?.....Godard
Che gelida Manina ("La Boheme").....Puccini
Long Ago—A Maid Sings Light.....MacDowell
Mattinata.....Leoncavallo

Thursday evening, Jan. 19, in Sanders Theatre, the fourth concert of the current series by the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge, with Mr. Witek, the concert-master, for solo violinist. He will play Mendelssohn's concerto and the rest of the programme comprises Brahm's "Academic" overture, Beethoven's overture, "Leonore" No. III. and Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World."

Friday afternoon, Jan. 20, in Symphony Hall, thirteenth of the series of afternoon concerts by the Symphony Orchestra.

Saturday afternoon, Jan. 21, in Symphony Hall, a recital by Mischa Elman, the violinist, young in years, but rich in technical resource, songful tone and range of imagination and expression. His programme includes Bruch's concerto in D minor; Händel's sonata in D major; Goldmark's suite for violin and piano, short pieces from eighteenth-century composers and a show piece from Paganini.

Saturday evening, Jan. 21, in Symphony Hall, thirteenth of the series of evening concerts by the Symphony Orchestra.

Sunday evening, Jan. 22, in Symphony Hall, the People's Choral Union in its first public concert of the year, with Mr. Wodell conducting. The chosen choral pieces are Gounod's "Gallia" and "Rheinberger's "Christoforus." The solo singers are Mmes. Brown and Wood and Messrs. Shirley and Cartwright.

Tuesday evening, Jan. 24, in Steinert

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1911

Sibelius' Symphony "Gloriously Rude"

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 12th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was an occasion of unusual interest, not only on account of the appearance of Mischa Elman, the violinist, but still more so by reason of the orchestral pieces.

Liadoff's "Baba-Yaga," a musical picture after a Russian folk-tale, was played for the first time in Boston, and the mighty second symphony of Sibelius completed the first half of the programme. Liadoff's sketch has for its excuse the Russian folk-tale or one of the many Russian folk-tales of Baba-Yaga, the witch with a fancy for men's flesh. There is the portrayal of her start on the ride with her mortar, pestle and broom. Liadoff has written a piquant and fanciful scherzo, cleverly orchestrated. The piece is very short and entertaining.

Sibelius' second symphony is certainly one of the great masterpieces of modern music. There is no more virile music written today. The performance was superb in the appreciation and the rendering of the composer's thought, in the sympathy and understanding of his very individual style. In this work Sibelius is gloriously rude. His protest against fate is elemental.

He has orchestral imagination to a degree unsurpassed by any contemporaneous composer. He is partly the writer of music which is the reflection of nature under sullen northern skies. Then the man speaks for himself and for a great race, with the utterance of the early gods.

After this symphony the composition so admirably played by Mr. Elman was not in itself impressive. There one was always conscious that Lalo, another of the "Symphonic Espagnole," would not dare to tax the attention or the thinking power of his audience for one second beyond the point of being entertaining. Sibelius, with the grip of a giant, the manners of a bear, glooms by himself, magnificently, overwhelmingly.

His symphony will be some time in gaining its way, to general popularity. It is too original and tremendous in its moods to exert universal appeal, and the color is too sombre. Tenderness is too intense; revolt too savage, uncompromising. Superficial picturesqueness is lacking.

There are composers who invent themes, and there are composers whose themes are thrust upon them. Sibelius is one of the latter, and contrary to some gifted melodists, he has to an exceptional degree the ability to make the most of his material. Extraordinary passages abound in the course of the transformation, which short but potent melodies undergo in the first movement. To mention only one, the cry of the violins, with the second theme over pounding kettle drums. There is hardly anything more hypnotic in music than the persistent plucking of the 'cellos and basses, very softly, which introduces the melancholy theme of the bassoons and is the accompaniment of most of the second movement; and there is nothing sweeter, cleaner than a contrasting passage in the major key which follows later.

The ineneffable song of the oboe is heard suddenly, like a voice in a storm, in the flying movement which is a sort of scherzo. When this is remembered, and the lordly, barbaric, battle-drunk finale, with its stupendous peroration, words are futile, impossible. Nor could Mr. Fiedler be over-praised for the masterly breadth and greatness of his reading.

Mr. Elman gave an excellent performance of the Lalo concerto. He has never played more expressively, with more brilliant authority, though his violin or himself might have been in better condition. He is indeed a phenomenal virtuoso, who has fulfilled early promise. He was recalled more often than any soloist thus far this season. Humperdinck's "Tangier: A Night in a Moorish Cafe," a piece without the slightest color or imagination or distinction, brought the concert to an end.

SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 8, 1911

SIBELIUS

There is a nationalist, however, whose music counts. That is Jean Sibelius, whose second symphony was given again at Symphony concerts of last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Sibelius is a big man, the voice of a great people. Unfortunately, such are born, not made. We have waited too long, this season, for some of his music. It is to be hoped that the programmes of the second half of the winter will bear witness to his name more frequently than they have in the last two months.

Posterity settles all things and opinions, but the critic does not live in posterity, and so he talketh as he listeth. Here goes: The Second Symphony in D major will endure as one of the most virile artistic utterances of a tremendous half century. It will stand. Say better, it has stood. Because no one who has heard that opening phrase that has been brooding, somewhere in the air of melancholy Finland, for centuries, or that shouting from Walhalla at the last, will pretend that such tidings came yesterday. It is because Sibelius harks way back to the time when men were the rivals of gods in love and in war, that we need him almost more than anyone else in the music today. He brings all that back, and if we cannot live it we can think it. He can shatter with a phrase the puny modern devices which seek to simulate what was never known, and in most cases never even conceived. It was George Sand who said that in one page of Chopin there was more of dramatic genius than in many a lengthy music-drama. We say, that in such a work, for instance, as "Ein Saga," a short orchestral piece which requires about 20 minutes for performance, there is more of the sheerly epic, more of the mightiness which can never die, but will smoulder forever under northern snows and crack the world at the judgment day, than in the "Ring of the Nibelungen." There is, by the way, enough intellectualism in the "Ring" to damn it to all eternity—that accursed sophistication, that unadjectible psychological analysis so fatal to all moral or artistic progress. There are many compositions of Sibelius, of greater and smaller proportions, promised for the concerts of this season.

Concerts

Next Tuesday afternoon, at Symphony Hall, Alessandro Bonci, the tenor, will sing in French, Italian and English. Mr. Bonci stands in the front rank of the artistic singers of today, and he has successed in mastering foreign languages to a degree very rare indeed with his countrymen. Here is his list:

I.
Spiagge amate ("Helen and Paris").....Gluck
Caro mio ben.....Giordani
Chi vuol la Zingarella?.....Paisiello

II.
On the Wings of Music.....Mendelssohn
Who is Sylvia?.....Schubert
Hark, Hark, the Lark.....Schubert

III.
Una furtiva Lagrima ("L'Elisir d'Amora").....Donizetti

IV.
Veille Chanson.....Bizet
Romance.....Debussy
Embarquez-vous.....Godard

V.
Che gelida Manina ("La Boheme").....Puccini

VI.
Long ago.....MacDowell
A Maid sings light.....MacDowell
Mattinata.....Leoncavallo

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, JANUARY 7, 1911

SYMPHONY PROGRAMME IS INTERNATIONAL

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS A SPANISH SYMPHONY

Sibelius and Humperdinck Represented—Liadoff's Russian Folk Picture Also Given.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Liadoff—Baba Yaga, a Russian Folk picture.
Sibelius—Symphony in D major, No. 2.
Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole, for Violin and Orchestra.
Soloist, Mischa Elman.
Humperdinck—"In a Moorish Cafe."

An interesting programme, in which, if the soloist was, as usual, the chief attraction, at least he appeared in a work in line with the symphonic character of the rest of the programme. Mischa Elman seems to be growing a trifle conscious of his strength. There is not always the constant care in phrasing or shading which marked his earlier performances. His broad bowing, phenomenal in one so young, is too frequently in evidence; he plays with his technique like a giant who is thoroughly well aware of his strength.

Of the title—"Spanish Symphony"—only the first half is true. It is certainly Spanish, and it is certainly not symphonic. It is more thoroughly a violin exhibition, with an obliging orchestra in the background playing an accompaniment, than even a concerto ought to be. The Finale deals with fandango and Saltarello rhythms in a manner which makes the Spanish omelette very palatable. The first movement is very free.

You may break, you may shatter the form if you will,
But the scent of the Garlic will cling to it still.

The finale has a striking carillon effect that reminds one of the "Three Blind Mice" of the time-honored round, but this moving organ-point is not used with the skill that Bizet displays with a similar subject in his "Suite Arlesienne."

In this work the soloist is not obliged to abnegate himself, as he must often do in a real symphony or concerto. There is no need of his sinking into the ensemble. He is almost continuously in the lime-light, and every detail of his wares is displayed.

Perhaps the most impressive part of Elman's work was the broad G-string playing in the finale, but the grace and caprice of the first movement must also be acknowledged. The andante displayed real feeling and expression. The Scherzo and intermezzo of the symphony were omitted.

The great brilliancy and power displayed in the finale brought an ovation to the young artist that was very remarkable for these afternoon concerts. He was recalled over and over again, until it seemed as if the applause would never cease.

The phenomenal technique certainly deserved the tribute, although we would like to see young Elman growing more visibly in a classical direction, for we had hoped that in him the world might find a successor to Joachim.

We confess a fondness for Sibelius and his symphonic thoughts. In common with all the Norsemen in Music, this Finlander is both earnest and melodic. He does not believe that intensity and emotion should abolish tune. We believe that this Northern music is to have a great future, in fact, that the Finnish is only beginning—paradoxical as that may seem. The chief fault of the symphony is that it is too fragmentary. Some may also object to its sombre character, but to us this mood seems very fitting in the work, and many of its themes are very noble. Sometimes there is a monotony in its scoring. There are alternate trumpet blares and bassoon growls, accompanied in either case by trills on the kettledrum. But there are majestic rhythmic effects and grand climaxes, besides some touches of melody that seems to have caught the very essence of Norse folk-song. Musically this symphony was the best part of the concert.

Humperdinck was represented by an unfamiliar work. "Tangier: In a Moorish Cafe," is a movement of his "Moorish Rhapsody" It is not as Moorish as some of St. Saens' Algerian pictures, but 'twill serve. There have been many errors about Oriental music scattered through the classical repertoire. Beethoven's "Turkish March" and Mozart's sonata movement marked "Alla Turca," are both about as Turkish as the Czar of Russia. The Chinese melody that Lachner uses in his "Turandot" overture is more akin to American "rag-time" than to anything Chinese. The languor and dreaminess of the Orient are caught up by very few European composers. In this case there are dance tunes and a prominent march rhythm. The bassoons are very prominent and were very well played. A peculiar climax at the end led three times into kettledrum explosions. The work is not representative of the highest vein of Humperdinck.

The programme was decidedly an international one. To the Finnish, Spanish and Moorish works there was added a Russian one. "Baba Yaga," by Liadoff, is a musical picture derived from a Russian Folk-tale, and the composer has endeavored to keep the narrative characteristics prominent in his music. Baba Yaga is a witch and naturally there was much "diablerie" in the music. As in Dukas' picture of sorcery, there is a good display of the bassoon, although not nearly so attractive as the bassoon work evolved by the Frenchman. There is a picture of the witch's flight, and the final pianissimo indicates the vanishing point. The xylophone is prominently used in this uncanny score. The tone-picture is short but graphic. The opening whistle of the witch, the gathering of her paraphernalia for flight, her dash into space and her disappearance in the air, gave something of a thrill even in these aeroplanic days. It was a "bassoon" afternoon, these grotesque and sombre instruments being prominent in almost every composition. Therefore a special word of compliment may be directed to them, for they were excellently handled.

The reviewer pleads guilty to near-sightedness! The excellent violin obbligato playing in Strauss' "Heldenleben," last week, was by Mr. Noack, not by Mr. Witek. It was brilliant enough to deserve correct record.

THE BONCI RECITAL.

The coming of Bonci, the distinguished tenor, to Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoon furnishes a decided flavor of novelty to the New Year. Bonci is known here chiefly through his appearances in past years with the Metropolitan Opera Co. as the possessor of a tenor voice of purest lyric quality, as an artist of highest rank, with musicianly qualities that are seldom found today in Italian singers.

Here he will sing much the same programme that he gave in New York. It will consist of three classic tunes by Gluck, Giordani, Paisiello, and two arias most closely connected with his fame, "Una furtiva Lagrima" from "L'Elisir d'amore" and "Che gelida Manina" from "La Boheme," will be the sole representatives of opera of today.

HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1911.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

New Piece by Liadoff—Mischa Elman Plays Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, gave its 12th public rehearsal yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mischa Elman was the soloist. The program was as follows:

"Baba-Yaga".....Liadoff
Symphony No. 2.....Sibelius
Symphonie Espagnole.....Lalo
"Tangier: A Night in a Moorish Cafe."
Humperdinck

Liadoff's "Baba-Yaga" was performed for the first time in Boston. It is an amusing, trifling piece, descriptive of a witch's ride through the woods in a mortar, while she hastens the pace by a pestle and removes the traces by a broom. All this is not particularized by the music, for such minute translation into music is impossible.

How would even Richard Strauss typify a mortar in music Given the subject that inspired the composer and the rest is easy. Liadoff is a third rate composer.

Baba-Yaga is a character known to every Russian child, and Liadoff's piece no doubt has in Russia more significance.

The symphony of Sibelius was played here about a year ago and there was no pressing need of a repetition. The music is rhapsodic and profoundly melancholy. The hearer may easily imagine that it will appeal profoundly to the Finns oppressed by Russia, but unfortunately the oppression of a race is not necessarily a subject for aesthetic treatment.

In this symphony there is endless repetition and not sufficient contrast. Nor are the chief themes truly noble or impressive; on the contrary they are rather common. There is a certain rudeness, there is a certain honesty that compels respect; and we should be grateful to any composer who allows opportunity to Mr. Longy to display his art.

Mr. Elman was enthusiastically applauded for his performance of Lalo's beautiful composition, but his playing did not deserve this tribute. Here is a young man of indisputable talent, who now fiddles simply to gain applause. "'T is true 't is pity; and pity 't is 't is true." The first movement was not continuous; it was episodic, disjointed. Throughout the work there were constant and disturbing modifications of rhythm, deliberate appeals through sentimentalism to popular applause, changes and appeals that were injurious to the composer. There was fiddling, often excellent of its kind. There was no true interpretation. We remember gratefully Messrs. Adamowski, Kreisler, Loeffler.

Humperdinck is an over-rated composer. His "Tangier" is conspicuously unoriental. We see the German tourist with his spectacles, his glass strapped around his neck, his open Baedeker. Hearing this music, which at its best is reminiscent, we are reminded of Matthew Arnold's remarks concerning the weak side of the German: "The universal dead-level of plainness and homeliness, the lack of all beauty and distinction in form and feature, the slowness and clumsiness of the language, the eternal beer, sausages and bad tobacco, the blank commonness everywhere." No, a night in a cafe in Tangier could not be as dull as Mr. Humperdinck would have us think.

There will be no concerts next week. Mr. Fiedler has not decided on the program for Jan. 20, 21.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, JANUARY 8, 1911.

Bonci's Recital

Judging from reports which have preceded his coming from other cities, the song recital which Alessandro Bonci is to give in Symphony Hall on next Tuesday afternoon promises to attract every teacher and student in singing in this city, for it seems certain that it will be a concert of most extraordinary interest. The possessor of a singularly pure lyric voice, his operatic appearances here in the past have shown him a master of the art of bel canto and, musically speaking, far above the usual Italian singer. Here he will sing a program that does not differ greatly from that which he sang with so much success in New York some weeks ago. Beginning with three classic arias, he sings songs by Mendelssohn, Schubert, Bizet, Debussy, Godard, MacDowell and Leoncavallo, and confines himself to two operatic arias, both of which are connected with his fame, the aria from "L'Elisir d'Amore," entitled "Una Furtiva Lagrima" and the "Che Gelida Manina" aria from "La Boheme."

SUNDAY GLOBE—JANUARY 8, 1911.

Mr Bonci's Recital.

The song recital of Mr Alessandro Bonci, at Symphony hall, next Tuesday afternoon, bids fair to be one of the significant events of the musical season.

There has been much glorification of late of the English tongue as a medium for emotion expression in song. There has been no more striking revelation recently given of the beauty and sweetness to the ear which may be imparted to it than the recital by Mr Bonci in New York, at which time there was general astonishment at the purity and elegance of his English diction.

His program on Tuesday will be as follows: "Spigge a Mate" ("Helen and Paris"), Gluck; "Caro Mio Ben," Giordani; "Chi vuol la Zingarella," Paisiello; "On Wings of Music," Mendelssohn; "Who is Sylvia," Schubert; "Hark, Hark! the Lark," Schubert; "Una Furtiva Lagrima ("Elisir d'Amore"), Donizetti; "Vielle Chanson," Bizet; "Romance," Debussy; "Embarques-vous," Godard; "Che Gelda Manina" ("La Boheme"), Puccni; "Long Ago," MacDowell; "A Maid Sing" Light," MacDowell; "Mattinaa," Leoncavallo.

HERALD, BOSTON, JANUARY 8, 1911.

MR. BONCI'S RECITAL.

The song recital which Alessandro Bonci will give in Symphony Hall next Tuesday afternoon at 2:30 o'clock should attract every teacher and student of singing in the city. The singing of songs has never been much cultivated in Italy in the sense that it is in Germany and France, and it is rare to find an Italian operatic tenor who can succeed in this difficult and intimate art. Mr. Bonci is the exception which proves the rule. He has succeeded in mastering foreign languages, particularly English, and his enunciation and diction not only in Italian, but in English and French and even German, is said to be extraordinary.

The program in full is as follows:

Spiagge amate, from "Paris and Helen".....Gluck
Caro mio ben.....Giordani
Chi vuol la Zingarella?.....Paisiello
On the Wings of Music.....Mendelssohn
Who is Sylvia?.....Schubert
Hark, Hark, the Lark.....Schubert
Una Furtiva Lagrima, from "L'Elisir d'Amore".....Donizetti
Veille Chanson.....Bizet
Romance.....Debussy
Embarquez-vous.....Godard
Che Gelida Manina, from "La Boheme".....Puccini
Long Ago.....MacDowell
A Maid Sings Light.....MacDowell
Mattinata.....Leoncavallo

GLOBE—TUESDAY, JANUARY 10, 191

Concerts Today.

This afternoon in Symphony hall the celebrated tenor, Alessandro Bonci, will be heard in a song recital, Harold Osborn Smith assisting at the piano. Bonci has showed himself to be a master of diction and his English is said to be nearly as clear as his Italian. His program here will include three classic arias, songs by Mendelssohn, Bizet, Schubert, Debussy, Godard, MacDowell and Leoncavallo, and excerpts from operas by Donizetti and Puccini.

ADVERTISER, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1911

FIRST BOSTON RECITAL BY SIGNOR BONCI

ACCOMPLISHED ARTIST REVEALS HIMSELF

Equally at Home in French, English and Italian—Audience Very Enthusiastic.

By Louis C. Elson.

Alessandro Bonci is an artist every inch of him, and if nature had only added a few more inches he would rival anybody upon the operatic stage. That he is able to give an entire programme unaided and alone, upon the concert platform, without any trace of monotony, places him "primus inter pares" in this field, for we know of no other tenor who could so successfully pass through such a ordeal.

Yesterday afternoon brought out a very enthusiastic and evidently interested audience in Symphony hall to hear this artist's first Boston recital. All through the programme Signor Bonci displayed much intelligence as well as artistic power. His mastery of enunciation in different languages was in itself something to commend. French and English were given with almost as much purity as Italian.

But, of course, in the Italian numbers his foot was upon his native heath, and here he was unapproachable. The following programme may indicate the different schools represented:—

Spiagge amate, from "Paris and Helen"	Gluck
Caro mio ben	Giordani
Chi vuol la Zingarella?	Paisiello
On the Wings of Music	Mendelssohn
Who Is Sylvia?	Schubert
Hark, Hark, the Lark	Schubert
Una Furtiva Lagrima, from "L'Elisir d'Amore"	Donizetti
Veille Chanson	Bizet
Romance	Debussy
Embarquex-vous	Godard
Che Gelida Manina, from "La Boheme"	Puccini
Long Ago	MacDowell
A Maid Sings Light	MacDowell
Mattinata	Leoncavallo

It will be noted that the old Italian school was present, as well as the most modern. Of course the two demanded a different style and the contrasted treatment of Giordani (sometimes called Giordanello) and of Puccini, was an evidence that the tenor knew something more than vocal technique. The Canto Spianato of "Caro Mio Ben" was exactly in place, and in the Gluck number there was a breadth of tone and phrasing that was ideal for this kind of aria.

Per contra, in "Che gelida Manina," from "La Boheme," in which Rodolfo intimates that Mimi is a "cold-hands girl," there was passion and freedom of delivery. In this as in the last song, the climax was most broadly given, with an enthusiasm that was instantly caught by the audience. Encores were given after every group, and the applause was most hearty and spontaneous, and was certainly well deserved.

We were somewhat curious to hear Mendelssohn and Schubert "Lieder," "in Gola Italiana." It is very seldom that an Italian tenor strays into this field. The beautiful legato and shading in "On Wings of Music," was thoroughly in the spirit of this delicate song. The Shakesperian settings by Schubert were brightly given and the English pronunciation was commendably clear; only in such atrocious vowels as are found in "per," "earth," or "bird" does Signor Bonci's English stagger a little and these would puzzle any Italian.

Scarcely less interesting than the German numbers were the French selections. It cannot be denied that there is a difference that must be observed between these three schools. The modern Italian is chiefly passion; the French, subtlety or piquancy; the German, a contemplative, introspective style, usually, although here the Schubert numbers departed from this school. Signor Bonci gave evidence here of a keenness of perception, and of a versatility that calls for some enthusiasm on the part of the critic.

We found "Che Gelida Maina" the best point of the recital, but it was an occasion where everything demanded praise, and, after an hour and a half of almost constant use, the tenor's voice was as clear and smooth and reliable as ever—a convincing proof of a good vocal method.

American songs have not yet achieved a distinctive school, but we were glad to see a recognition of MacDowell's muse in this direction. Although if Signor Bonci wishes to go further in this direction we might suggest Mrs. Beach's "The Year's at the Spring," Chadwick's "Allah," Foote's "Irish Love Song," some of Clayton Johns' songs, and other American ort songs that would be fully as characteristic as the two numbers chosen to represent America.

JOURNAL—WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1911.

BONCI DELIGHTS HIS BOSTON ADMIRERS

Famous Italian Tenor, Singing in Three Languages, Shows Exquisite Art.

One of the extraordinary recitals of the season was given at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon by Alessandro Bonci, the Italian tenor, who sang not only in his native tongue, but also in French and English. No tenor heard here since bell-voiced Ravelli sang with Patti has exhibited so lovely a voice and so polished a style as Bonci. He was a joy in opera; he is even more of a joy in concert.

His recital was a succession of exquisite efforts. Especially enjoyable were Paisiello's lively "Chi Vuol la Zingarella," Schubert's "Hark, Hark, the Lark," the "Una Furtiva Lagrima" from Donizetti's "Elisir d'Amore," and the always captivating "Che Gelida Manina" from Puccini's "La Boheme."

Mr. Bonci's singing was the finest heard in Boston at a recital for years and years. For Bonci is not going, but coming; he is now in his prime. The timbres of his voice are wonderfully delicate yet resonant, and the gracefulness of his manner of singing is the perfection of vocal art. As for his diction, it need only be said that his English is much better than that of most of the well-known singers who claim England or the United States as their native land. It was real English—not the English concert dialect.

There was the familiar fair-sized, encore-demanding audience.

RECORD, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1911

BONCI'S RECITAL

From Louis C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser

Alessandro Bonci is an artist every inch of him, and if nature had only added a few more inches he would rival anybody upon the operatic stage. That he is able to give an entire programme unaided and alone, upon the concert platform, without any trace of monotony, places him "primus inter pares" in this field, for we know of no other tenor who could so successfully pass through such an ordeal.

Yesterday afternoon brought out a very enthusiastic and evidently interested audience in Symphony hall to hear this artist's first Boston recital. All through the programme Signor Bonci displayed much intelligence as well as artistic power. His mastery of enunciation in different languages was in itself something to commend. French and English were given with almost as much purity as Italian.

But, of course, in the Italian numbers his foot was upon his native heath, and here he was unapproachable. The following programme may indicate the different schools represented:—

Spiagge amate, from "Paris and Helen"	Gluck
Caro mio ben	Giordani
Chi vuol la Zingarella?	Paisiello
On the Wings of Music	Mendelssohn
Who Is Sylvia?	Schubert
Hark, Hark, the Lark	Schubert
Una Furtiva Lagrima, from "L'Elisir d'Amore"	Donizetti
Veille Chanson	Bizet
Romance	Debussy
Embarquex-vous	Godard
Che Gelida Manina, from "La Boheme"	Puccini
Long Ago	MacDowell
A Maid Sings Light	MacDowell
Mattinata	Leoncavallo

SUNDAY GLOBE—JANUARY 15, 1911.

Fourth Cambridge Symphony.

The fourth symphony concert in Sanders theatre, Harvard university, will be given next Thursday evening. The soloist will be Mr Anton Witek, whose debut with the Symphony orchestra earlier in the season was such a memorable occasion. In Cambridge he will play the Mendelssohn concerto. The orchestral numbers will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But two concerts intervene between the third southern trip which the Symphony orchestra is just finishing, and the annual western trip on which they depart Sunday, Jan 29. This week's program will be purely orchestral. The symphony will be Schubert's in C major, that of "divine length."

The second part of the program will be French, comprising Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," and two symphonic poems by Camille Saint-Saens, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and the "Danse Macabre." The presence of these last two works on a symphony program will indeed be welcome, for it is many years since they have been played at a symphony concert.

TRANSCRIPT, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1911

MR. BONCI IN CONCERT

THE OPERATIC TENOR IN A NEW FIELD

The Qualities That Distinguished Him There—The Response of the Public—Mr. Bonci's Mastery of Song—A Concert by "The Kneisels"—Rubin Goldmark's New Quartet

THESE are good days, in Boston, for the art of song. On a Saturday and again on a Monday, Miss Destinn was exemplifying it at the Opera House, where, as the way is of "lyric theatres" the world over, it does not always flourish. Then, on a Tuesday, Mr. Bonci comes to Symphony Hall to exercise himself and his audience in the pure art of song, and in nothing else. Of course, that audience might have been larger; but the singer or the virtuoso who out of vanity or misconception chooses Symphony Hall for his recital here must take the consequences of so spacious an auditorium. The wonder was that Mr. Bonci by himself and of himself could attract so many hundreds, especially in the balconies, where listeners resort who have come because they really want to come. Miss Destinn, with all her prestige and with the vogue of "Madama Butterfly" to aid, could not fill the Opera House on Saturday afternoon. Then, and on Monday, she was singer and actress, too, and on both occasions Mr. Zenatello was with her. The wonder is that Mr. Bonci, playing "the lone hand" of the opera singer turned concert-giver, had so many and so eager listeners. The occasion had its little irony, too. When Mr. Bonci was singing at the Metropolitan, his public wished to hear him in songs. When he appeared in a song recital in Boston, his public most applauded the interjected operatic fragments.

There was nothing but the pure artistry of song in Mr. Bonci's concert yesterday. He is not an impressive, unusual, or even an interesting personality on the stage. Romantic, exceptional or even profesional aspects he has none. He seems only a well-poised and very modest Italian gentleman who might be singing for the pleasure of his friends in his own music-room. He is too intelligent, too refined for an "audience manner." His voice, moreover, is not in itself a remarkable voice. It is not large. It could not achieve the "big tone" if it would. It has a dry sweetness that falls on the ear as "brut" champagne falls on the palate. It is not a mellow voice; it is not a "golden" voice; to most normal ears it will lack sensuous quality. There are no heats and few glints in it; and it is not susceptible to much variety of color. To force it ever so little—and Mr. Bonci did force it once or twice in his operatic "excerpts" yesterday—is to turn it momentarily throaty. In fine, Mr. Bonci's voice is a sensitive and mastered instrument upon which he plays with all his finesse in the artistry of song. It is the oboe, and he the perfect oboist, among tenors. Even the songs that were the means to all these things yesterday were not especially interesting in themselves. Two of MacDowell served him to prove that intelligible English in the concert-room depends upon diction and not upon native speech. Two of Schubert showed that the finer ways of Italian singing sort well with German classics. The operatic fragments suggested that Puccini's music gains as an emotional speech by the skill, as well as by the passion, with which it has been sung; while the old Italian pieces recalled the long-breathed melody that all the songful ejaculations of a thousand ultra-moderns will never subdue.

Yet within all these limitations and reserves, the pleasure of the concert was very real and very rare. It lay in the delights of a nearly flawless artistry as flawlessly applied. The connoisseurs and the expert might note the details and draw short breaths at the felicity of them. The uninitiated had the pleasure of the results—of the instinctive discrimination that guides many a listener to the finer beauties of song when no golden voice or great reputation or mistaken loyalties befog the way. Mr. Bonci can shape a single note into a cool and clear perfection of musical sound. He can assemble those sounds, while each keeps its individual quality, into a flowing, rounded, liquid phrase. He can weave those phrases into a web of sustained song that is as elastic and curving as it is fluid and continuous. He is no less master of the ornaments and the finesse of song—of the spinning of a melody to a gossamer fineness that is still unbroken, of the polishing of a vocal figure, of the momentary modification of pace or rhythm to true and unforced effect, of harmonic suggestion—he sang a song of Debussy—of the niceties of mingled verbal and musical emphasis. He does not merely command the technique of song so that it will do his will. He makes it the instrument of intelligence, of imagination, of the indefinable instinct that feels his medium, that knows its susceptibilities, that sensitively uses them. Not a singer now excels him in a sense of vocal values, in the gradations, the proportioning of tones. He has made his diction at once an intelligible and a musical speech. In all that he does, the song and the singing, the music and the voice are perfectly fused. There is no sense of mechanics. There is always felicity.

H. T. P.

GLOBE—WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1911.

MR BONCI'S RECITAL.

Great Tenor Sings a Program of Songs at Symphony Hall With Refinement and Finesse of Style.

Alessandro Bonci appeared yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall for the first time in Boston as a concert singer of a program of songs. Between the lyric stage and the concert platform there is a great gulf fixed, so that he who would pass from the one to the other, if he be only the average opera singer, finds formidable impediments in his path.

It is one thing to have one's vocal defects screened by an orchestra intervening between stage and audience, to submerge one's own identity in character and costume, and to patch out a labored phrase by a diverting gesture. It is quite another to stand upon a bare platform with merely a grand piano and to support strands of musical tone in which the least break in continuity, or deflection from pitch, or blurring of the text they bear, will be as apparent to all who listen as though proclaimed from the housetop.

Hope for the average tenor is slight in such a passage from opera to concert with a gulf of such proportions fixed. But Mr Bonci is not an average tenor. Within 24 hours Boston is receiving valuable lessons—not merely in singing, for there is a vast deal of that—but in the art of singing, which has never yet been as plentiful as the lack of it.

Mr Bonci is a great artist, not by the endowment of natural opulence or beauty of voice, but by the grace of intelligence, of unflagging industry, of an uncommon and an all-pervading æsthetic sense, and of a vision.

How admirable his technical as well as his emotional mastery in song. How unobtrusive yet how secure his respiration. With what art he prepares a hearer for the emotional content of a phrase by his attack of it; with what a wealth of suggestion he develops it and with what ravishing elegance of style he spins it out as a thread of silver and relinquishes it. There is an art itself in the ending of a musical phrase.

The "Spiagge amate" of Gluck and the "Caro mio ben" of Giordani, which began his program, and later the air from "Elisir d'Amore," disclosed a continence and a lofty serenity of style which is heard too little in this day of obvious and intrusive singing. It is a question if these were not his best songs.

To one whose language contains no sound of th and no such undeterminate vowel qualities as a short "i," or a short "u," English presents difficulties. Yet what an atmosphere and illusion he imparted to the text of his English songs. His enunciation had an exotic tang, as in the vowels noted above, but this singer molded and rounded each vowel sound and made it even as a sweet morsel in the mouth. Native singers would do well to learn to impart such distinctness and such distinction to their speech.

Of the English songs, Mendelssohn's "On Wings of Music" is merely pretty and is without sentiment. There may not have been the true Teutonic sturdiness in the "Who is Sylvia" and the "Hark, Hark! the Lark," but had Schubert heard the latter so sung on the day he perused it hastily in the tavern, he would have found the true note of impromptu rhapsody transcribed within it.

The Vieille Chanson discloses more invention than is usual in Bizet's songs. Mr Bonci did not quite touch the subtlety and ethereal remoteness of Debussey's "Romance," but he sang Godard's swinging boat song, "Embarquez-vous," with due appreciation of its spirited rhythm.

The racconto from "La Boheme" has been sung ardently in Boston, but not in recent years with the dramatic finesse, the adroit narrative and emotional accent and the incessant flow of nuance. It set the house in an uproar of applause and brought a partial repetition. MacDowell's exquisitely imagined songs, "Long Ago, Sweet Heart Mine" and "A Maid Sings Light," were given their true delicacy and fragrance, and Leoncavallo's "Mattinata" its appropriate legato.

Cavaradossi's aria at his easel from "Tosca" was added in the program and "La Donna e Mobile" at the close of it—the latter with a rubato in keeping with its style.

Harold Smith accompanied well. There was an audience of moderate size and much applause.

HERALD, BOSTON, JANUARY 15, 1911.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

But two Symphony concerts intervene between the third southern trip which the Symphony orchestra is just finishing and the annual western trip for which it departs Sunday, Jan. 29. The 13th program for Friday afternoon, Jan. 20, and Saturday evening, Jan. 21, will be purely orchestral. The Symphony will be Schubert's in C major, the one of "divine length." The second part of the program will include Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," and two symphonic poems by Camille Saint-Saens, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and the "Danse Macabre." The presence of these last two works on the program will indeed be welcome. It is several years since they have been played at a Symphony concert. Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" will be almost a novelty to many, for it has not been played here at a Symphony concert since 1904.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, JANUARY 14

FOURTH CAMBRIDGE CONCERT OF THE SYMPHONY.

The fourth Symphony concert will be given in Cambridge in Sanders' Theatre, Harvard University, on next Thursday evening, Jan. 19. The soloist will be Mr. Anton Witek, and he will play the Mendelssohn concerto.

[132]

TRAVELER, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 11, 1911

BONCI SONG RECITAL

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Signor Allesandro Bonci, famous opera tenor and recitalist, gave a song recital in Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, before an audience that enthusiastically applauded throughout, calling for many encores. Signor Bonci's programme included songs in Italian, French and English. The first group of English songs were Schubert's "Who is Sylvia?" and "Hark! Hark! the Lark." In response to much applause, he repeated the latter, singing it both times with freshness and spontaneity that was delightful to hear. Although somewhat stilted, his English enunciation might well put to shame some of our own singers, who fail to communicate with audiences intelligibly. Other English songs were Mendelssohn's "On Wings of Music," which flowed musically and gracefully. The two McDowell songs "Long Ago" and "A Maid Sings Light" were perhaps appreciated best of any of the English groups. He sang the former with a regard for all its deep and tender beauties, and to the latter he gave the delicate esprit de corps which it demands of the singer.

In his Italian opera arias, the "Che Gelida Manini" from "La Boheme," which was on his programme, and the two encores, "La Donna E Mobile" from the "Rigoletto" and a "La Tosca" aria. Signor Bonci gave firm proofs of his prestige in operatic work. And, despite his excellent song singing, one felt that it was in the opera arias that he was best at home, for here he shone with distinction quite as much as in the songs. He gives to aria singing that peculiar intimate note and delicate finesse which they so often fail to receive. Broad effects and dramatic fervor in opera often preclude the finer sentiment and finished execution, but Signor Bonci maintains both. His "Che Gelida Manina" was full of the stifled sob of the piece, yet its vocalization was never interrupted or marred.

One of the pretty song bits was the "Debussy Romance," which has an accompaniment that is a piano solo in itself—its beauty almost makes one forget the song. Godard's "Embarquez-Vous" Signor Bonci sang with ripple and brilliancy.

Of the Italian songs, "Spiagge amate," by Gluck, the "Caro mio ben" of Giordani, "Chi vuol la Zingarella" of Paisiello, and "Una Furtiva Lagrima" by Donizetti, the last was sung the most exquisitely. Here the warm, fluent note of Signor Bonci demonstrated its power.

Firm, free breath control and absolute freedom and lack of constriction, pure tonality and clear-cut enunciation, florid execution and delicate perception characterize the singing of Signor Bonci. His diminuendos are a trifle less well controlled than the long, sustained crescendos, the withdrawing of the breath from the tone occasionally breaking its perfect smoothness.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1911

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

As usual, after one of the monthly journeyings of the Symphony Orchestra, the programme of their next concerts at home, on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, will consist, for the most part, of familiar music. The symphony will be Schubert's in C major, and Mr. Fiedler is disposed to let Schubert's music run in its own lyric voice, while the virtuosi of the orchestra, especially of the wind choir, can play it with rare beauty of tone and delicacy of euphony. The whole orchestra indeed knows this symphony as so much instrumental song, and to take it so has been a tradition from Mr. Gericke's time. The rest of the programme is unified to symphonic poems by two of the elder generation of French composeers: Franck's "The Wild Huntsman" (Le Chasseur Maudit") and "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel" and the "Danse Macabre" from Saint-Saëns. It is long since any one of the three pieces has been played at a Symphony Concert. Franck's huntsman asks Mr. Fiedler's romantic imagination and Saint-Saëns's spinning-wheel the rhythmical finesse of the orchestra.

The fourth of the current series of concerts in Cambridge by the Symphony Orchestra falls on next Thursday evening in Sanders Theatre. Mr. Witek, the concert-master of the band, will then play Mendelssohn's concerto for violin for the first time hereabouts, and it is music admirably suited to the fine texture of his tone and the fine skill of his playing. The purely orchestral numbers comprise Dvorák's symphony "From the New World," Brahms's "Academic" overture, and Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture.

Pension Fund Concert Postponed

Owing to the lack of time for preparation of the programme, the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Orchestra has been postponed to Sunday evening, March 12. The tours of the orchestra have required much time which would otherwise have been available for the preparations for this concert.

SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 15, 1911

But two Symphony concerts intervene between the third Southern trip which the Symphony Orchestra is just finishing and the annual Western trip on which they depart Sunday, Jan. 29. The thirteenth programme for Friday afternoon, Jan. 20, and Saturday evening, Jan. 21, will be purely orchestral. The symphony will be Schubert's in C major, Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit," and two symphonic poems by Camille Saint-Saens, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and the "Danse Macabre," will complete the list.

MONITOR, BOSTON JANUARY 14, 1911

CONCERT NOTES.

The Boston Symphony orchestra presents the Schubert Symphony in C as the principal number of the concerts of Friday afternoon, Jan. 20, and Saturday evening, Jan. 21. The concerts will be without soloist. Three symphonic poems of the French school will be played: "Le Chasseur Moudit," of Franck, and "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saens.

The orchestra gives its fourth concert in Sanders theater, Cambridge, Thursday evening, Jan. 19, with Anton Witek taking the solo part in the Mendelssohn violin concerto. The program includes Dvorak's "New World" symphony, the Brahms Academic overture and the Beethoven "Leonora" overture, No. 3.

The first pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra is now being planned, and tickets are going on sale Monday, Jan. 16. The program will consist partly of Wagnerian selections, in one of which a German opera soprano from the Metropolitan opera house of New York is expected to assist. The "Blue Danube" waltz, performed with male chorus, according to the original intention of the composer, Johann Strauss, will be one of the numbers. The pension fund, which was started during Mr. Gericke's conductorship, has proved successful both in helping to attract to the orchestra European artists of distinction and in providing retired members with stipends. Every player in the orchestra gives a percentage of his weekly salary to the fund and the Symphony managers arrange two special pension concerts each season to augment it still further. Details of the first concert in aid of the pension fund will soon be announced.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SUNDAY, JANUARY 15, 1911

FRENCH MUSIC ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

But two Symphony concerts intervene between the third Southern trip which the Symphony Orchestra is just finishing and the annual Western tour on which it departs Sunday, January 29.

The thirteenth program for Friday afternoon, January 20, and the following Saturday evening will be purely orchestral. The symphony will be Schubert's in C-major, comprising Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," and two symphonic poems by Camille Saint-Saens, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and the "Dance Macabre."

It is many years since these last two works have been played at a Symphony concert and, in fact, they have generally been relegated by all orchestras to more popular programs. At the same time, they are works of high merit, and deserve better fate than that which seems to have been given them. Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" will be almost a novelty to the majority of patrons of the concerts, as it has not been played here since 1904.

The fourth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, on next Thursday evening. The soloist will be Anton Witek. In Cambridge he will play the Mendelssohn concerto. The orchestral number will be Brahm's Academic Festival overture, Dvorak's Symphony, "From the New World," and Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3.

The sale of seats for the first of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Symphony Hall on Monday (tomorrow). Negotiations a erin hand for one of the principal dramatic sopranos of the Metropolitan Opera House, with the idea of lending peculiar distinction to the Wagner numbers, which constitute the first half of the program. The performance of the "Blue Danube Waltz," with male chorus in the form that it was originally written by Johann Strauss, promises to be a most interesting feature of the program. The number of pensioners of the orchestra increases each year and the demand on the fund increases correspondingly.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, JANUARY 15, 1911.

Symphony Concerts

The program for this week's Symphony concerts comprises the Schubert symphony in C major, the one of "divine length;" Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," which has not been played here since 1904; and, for lighter numbers, Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Ophale" and "Danse Macabre," which also have long been absent from Symphony programs.

Concert Postponed

Owing to lack of time needed for preparation, the concert in aid of the Symphony pension fund announced for Thursday evening, Jan. 26, has been postponed to Sunday evening, March 12.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA AND OUR REPUTATION

The Monthly Journeys of the Symphony Orchestra and the Prestige, Deserved or Undeserved, That They Bring This Town —"La Traviata," with Mr. Amato and Mr. Jadlowker, at the Opera House—The Pieces for Next Week—The Alternation of Old and New in Opera—The Virtuosi and Their Concerti—Mme. Samaroff Plays Again—Dr. Wuellner and Vaudeville

THIS morning the Symphony Orchestra returned from one of the journeys that it makes time after time each season to New York, Philadelphia Baltimore and Washington, and a small city or two along the way. No one much heeded the return of the band, except the faithful press agent in the communique proper to such occasions. The public of the Symphony Concerts merely knows that from month to month, from November through March, there is a break in the series. The orchestra, it recalls vaguely, has departed for concerts in other cities. The impression is that the public of those cities receives the concerts well. It does, indeed. The concerts of the Boston Orchestra in New York have a more numerous and a finer-grained public than do those that either Mr. Mahler or Mr. Damrosch conducts. It is the orchestra of Brooklyn. Philadelphia, in spite of its own orchestra, yields it audiences. Baltimore and Washington welcome it. The cities of call along the way—Hartford or New Haven or Newark—are similarly responsive. Nowadays, wherever the orchestra goes, an audience awaits it be the programme what it may, the "assisting artist" whom he happens to be.

It is the easy truth to say that the orchestra deserves these fair fortunes. It does richly because its works justify them. The public of these concerts in other cities believes in the Symphony Orchestra quite as much as Bostonians do—perhaps even more—and believes that in standard, spirit and achievement it is typical of Boston in the arts of the theatre and the concert-room. We who sit at home may sometimes sigh over the vogue of musical plays on our stage when nearly all other pieces languish for lack of audiences. We may regret the scattered hundred or two of auditors at concerts that deserve better things. We may be bidden to bestir ourselves in behalf of our opera house, if it is to win the support that will maintain it. And so forth and so on. But the rest of the world will not believe these things of us. It hears the Symphony Orchestra. Surely the arts must flourish in Boston, if it has maintained these many years such a band to such purpose. The guide-books say that it is one of the "glories" of Boston. It is more: it is the present salvation of the artistic reputation of a whole community.

H. T. P.

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY JANUARY 17, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNING TODAY

The Symphony orchestra returns from its third Southern trip this morning after having given seven concerts with the remarkably successful results which have characterized all of its out-of-town work the present season. With the exception of the Hartford concert last night, when Mr. Witek was soloist, Mischa Elman played at each of these concerts, the two in New York and the concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. It is a matter of gratification that at these seven concerts every seat was sold.

There will be only two home concerts, this week and next, and then the orchestra departs on its annual Western trip, visiting among other cities Pittsburgh, where it has not given a concert since 1893.

RECORD, TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNED TODAY.

The Symphony orchestra returned from its third Southern trip this morning after having given seven concerts with the remarkably successful results which have characterized all of its out-of-town work the present season. With the exception of the Hartford concert last night, when Mr. Witek was soloist, Mischa Elman played at each of these concerts, the two in New York and the concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. It is a matter of gratification that at these seven concerts every seat was sold.

There will be only two home concerts, this week and next, and then the orchestra departs on its annual Western trip, visiting among other cities Pittsburgh, where it has not given a concert since 1893.

HERALD, THURSDAY, JANUARY 19, 1911.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There will be no soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. Mr. Fiedler's program begins with Schubert's symphony in C major. The second part will be devoted to French music, three symphonic poems, Cesar Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit," and Saint-Saens's "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

HERALD, TUES JANUARY 17, 1911.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Symphony orchestra returns from its third southern trip this morning after having given seven concerts with the remarkably successful results which have characterized all of its out-of-town work the present season. With the exception of the Hartford concert last night, when Mr. Witek was soloist, Mischa Elman played at each of these concerts. At the seven concerts every seat was sold. There will be only two home concerts, this week and next, and then the orchestra departs on its annual western trip.

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY JANUARY 19, 1911

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

There will be no soloist at the Symphony concerts this week, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Fiedler has arranged a more than usually attractive programme. It begins with Schubert's symphony in C-Major. The second part will be devoted to French music, three symphonic poems. They are Cesar Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit," Saint-Saens "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

n EVENING JOURNAL,

ress New York City.

Music

LET us consider to-day, for a few minutes, the seventh symphony of Beethoven.

Yes, it has been considered many hundreds of times since its first performance in Vienna, in 1813. One is humbly quite aware of that. But it can hardly be considered too much.

It was played for the first time this season in New York at Carnegie Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it was played so well that it made its deepest impression upon the audience that, as is usual at these concerts, filled the house.

This symphony of Beethoven has suffered, to some extent, from the more or less trivial interpretations that have been put upon it by numerous commentators. Of course, it would be supererogatory folly to assume that it needs any defense. But it does need a broader acceptation than it generally receives.

"Such music needs no analysis; it escapes the commentator," says Philip Hale, who is so invariably and so justly denominated the "erudite" writer of the Boston Symphony programme notes. "As the landscape is in the eye of the beholder, so the symphony is in the ear of the hearer," he adds.

The landscape IS in the eye of the beholder, but once that landscape has been transferred to canvas, one must learn, to some extent, what was in the eye of the painter. And, of course, it is the mind's eye that is in question.

Beethoven rarely discussed his music. He preferred to let it create its own impression. But it is known that his was a deeply introspective nature. During the middle portion and toward the end of his life, that was filled with so much loneliness, so much frustration of hopes for happiness, his innermost spirit yearned for the fulfillment of some embodied joy.

The ninth symphony is a philosophical expression, in part, of this state of mind.

The seventh symphony, it would seem, is the expression of this state of mind in its more humanely concrete aspect.

May one not think of Beethoven seeking, for once, to indulge himself in the imaginative fulfillment, through his expressive art, of the "ungeknopft" (lamely, "unbuttoned") yearnings of his nature?

The first movement, with its distinctly feminine second theme and its alternating give-and-take of emotional, highly rhythmic jubilance, is surely suggestive of a frankly human exposition of the world-old episode—man and woman.

Then comes the solemn second movement—this world-old episode, to a man like Beethoven, always contains so much more than mere beautiful exuberance. Some commentators have seen in it a wedding march, but it is no more anything so paltrily and formally descriptive than the second movement of the "Eroica" symphony is a funeral march.

And the wonderful scherzo! Has it not, in spite of its ebullience, that purposeful sustained single note, the key note—a master stroke of invention, to denote the continuance of the solemnity established in the second movement?

The last movement Mr. Hale calls orgiastic. It is the expression of the furious seizure of a joy Beethoven had never known. His was a toweringly masculine nature, a bold and forceful temperament. The spirit of Pan lurked in the lacunae of the inner man.

It is a somewhat long way from the seventh symphony of Beethoven to the "Spanish Symphony" of Lalo, which followed—that is, three movements of it.

This symphony, which is little more than a concerto for the violin, gave an opportunity for the first appearance this season here of young Mischa Elman. He had a little disagreement as to tempo with Conductor Fiedler, but that was a minor affair.

The rest of the programme consisted of the second movement from Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony in B minor, and the second movement from Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody."

[133]

STAATS ZEITUNG

s New York City.

JAN 13 1911

Bostoner Symphonie-Concert.

Das gestrige Abendconcert der Bostoner in Carnegie Hall, das bei gänzlich gefülltem Saal stattfand, wurde mit dem weihevollen Andante Con Moto aus Schubert's unvollendeter Symphonie in H-Moll eingeweiht, und zwar in Memoriam des letzte Woche in Boston verstorbenen Herrn James Jackson Higginson, des Bruders des verstorbenen Gründers des Bostoner Orchesters. Die Musiker spielten es unter Fiedler's Leitung mit tiefster Empfindung.

Darauf folgte Beethoven's 7. Symphonie in einer Ausführung, welche uns das lebhafteste Vergnügen bereitete und vom Publikum begeistert anerkannt wurde. Dithyrambisch erregt und dabei geheimnisvoll feierlich dirigirte Fiedler dieses unsterbliche Werk, welches das berühmte Orchester in unnachahmlich virtuoser Weise bewältigte. Der erste Satz gelang mit wirksamster Betonung der wechselnden Stimmungen, und das Wildtrotzige, Kriegerisch-Erregte war dabei effektvoll festgehalten. Wie eine edle, innige Klage erklang das himmlische Allegretto, in dem namentlich die Episode zärtlichsten Trostes überwältigend schön herauskam. Voll Schwung, Lust und Humor ertönte das Presto. Bewundernswerth war der köstliche Fluß, das rythmisch Prickelnde, das Effektvolle der unvermittelten dynamischen Kontraste. Das Finale schwoll mächtig an. Die riesenhafte Steigerung der Coda wurde bis zur äußersten Schallkraft, aber doch weise in Zaum gehalten, geführt. Mit Recht ließ Fiedler auch das Orchester an dem warmen Beifall theilnehmen.

Das Orchester spielte noch den zweiten Satz von Humperdinck's „Mauriſcher Rhapsodie" genannt „Tanger; In einem mauriſchen Kaffeehaus". Es ist ein glänzend geschriebenes und reizvoll instrumentirtes musikalisches Reise-Feuilleton, das ganz brillant gespielt, außerordentlich gefiel. Mit Vergnügen würde man das ganze liebenswürdige Werk hören.

Der Solist des Abends war Herr Mischa Elman, der gestern zum erstenmal in dieser Saison vor das New Yorker Publikum trat. Er spielte, vom Orchester brillant begleitet, Lalo's effektvolle „Symphonie Espagnole" mit virtuosem Schmiß und künstlerischem Geschmack. Seine Kantilene klang in virtuoser Bindung einfach exquisit, und die Kunststückchen des letzten Satzes bewältigte er mit spielender Leichtigkeit. Elman, dem wir nur größere Ruhe beim Spiel anempfehlen würden, wurde wie ein alter Liebling empfangen und lebhaft gefeiert. H.

EVENING JOURNAL,

om

dress New York City.

te

Music

THREE orchestral concerts in two days took us all the way to Finland, that outpost of the North, now in the throes of musical nationalism, and then left us in the sunlight and cloud-flung shadows moving across the uplands of Beethoven and Wagner.

The farthermost coasts, where is being born into musical expression a racial consciousness heretofore more or less unknown in the more central East and West, are well enough in their way, but the well known uplands are the more solid portion of our goodly heritage of music and better for our feet to stand upon.

Jean Sibelius is the Finn whose music has been vibrating down from the North. Here and there his earlier works have been performed outside of his own land of the thousand seas. Much has been heard recently of his tone poem, "Finlandia," but his second symphony had not been played in New York until Saturday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, when Max Fiedler and his Boston Orchestra introduced us to it.

Sibelius, of course, has found his form of musical expression in more Southern Europe, but his inspiration was his native Finland. His is the land of the long night, of the ever-heard beating of the sea, of the hard and endless struggle against nature in its most unyielding mood. All this is reflected in the people and their native music.

Thus, this Sibelius symphony is full of strange rhythms and curious twists of thematic melody. It is without suavity or geniality, but its sincerity is plain and its workmanship is effective. There is a strain of hopefulness toward the end, worked out with much forcefulness, but the climax of the finale relapses into doubt.

But that is to the credit of this nationalist, who is not so wrapped up in his nationalism as to be a too facile optimist.

Mr. Fiedler had given the symphony much thought, and it was played by his men with full grasp of its meaning and with beautiful execution.

Mischa Elman, the young Russian, was the soloist of the afternoon. He played the Mendelssohn violin concerto. It is well within his powers both of penetration and technique. The rest of the programme was the "Tannhaeuser" overture stirringly played, and the prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel."

SUN

ress New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

MISCHA ELMAN THE SOLO PERFORMER.

Beethoven's Symphony in A Major Played With Exquisite Finish—Elman Dashes Off the "Symphonie Espagnole" of Lalo—With Humperdinck in Tangier.

Carnegie Hall yesterday ceased to resound with the splendors of Wagner. No longer did Tristan invite the night of love to sink around him and give forgetfulness of life. No more did Siegfried waken the sleeping beauty with a thirty second kiss and cry "Be mine!" No more did the brass blare the pomp and circumstance of proud guildsmen who could make poems strictly according to the "leges tabulaturæ." No more did the shrieks of gales around the Cape drive back the doomed Dutchman. The Wagner concerts were over and the storm and stress period was past.

So last night the Boston Symphony Orchestra seated itself upon the much disturbed platform and poured forth music of a kind not altogether foreign to Wagner's, but instinct with a different art spirit. The concert was one of the most reposeful, most aristocratic in its elegance and elevation, most soothing and uplifting in its content, that has been heard this season.

It began with the slow movement of Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, put on the programme in memory of one of the orchestra's good friends, James J. Higginson. We do not know whether this particular movement was a favorite of the friend, but if it was it is a pity that he could not hear it as it was played last night. Seldom has the Boston orchestra done anything quite so flawless in its finish.

It was a peaceful, serene, lovely performance. There was no reaching out after effects. Everything fell into its place with the inevitableness of a perfect art. The phrases were all as transparent as crystal, as rich in color as bubbles. The movement made a profound effect and attuned the audience to the still more exquisite performance which was to follow it.

The second number on the list was Beethoven's seventh symphony, which has in recent seasons been reduced to the humble office of providing a musical medium for the support of Isidora Duncan's bare pedals. Doubtless Richard Wagner was right when he declared that this symphony was the apotheosis of the dance, but there may, indeed there must, be some differences of opinion as to whether the apotheosis is rendered any more deifying by the arsis and thesis of Miss Duncan's untrammelled limbs.

It is quite certain that the symphony was all the better last night for standing upon its own legs and asking for no others to enhance its interest. It is generally conceded that it is one of its composer's masterpieces. It is a composition which sings with a perennial freshness and has an undying charm. When it is played as it was last evening it is one of the most ravishing of all musical delights.

The perfection of balance of tone in the orchestra and the consequent clarity and airy lightness of each phrase were things to be cherished in the memory for many a long day. Mr. Fiedler made no attempt at a strongly personal interpretation of the music. He devoted his attention to securing an entrancingly clear and lovely general result and to adhering as closely as possible to the letter of the score in every nuance. It was a joy to hear such a performance of such a work.

The solo number came next. This was Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" for violin and orchestra, with Mischa Elman as the solo performer. It may be that Mr. Elman has been in Spain and it may be that he has been no nearer to it than Lalo's composition. This matters little.

The important fact is that he revels in the rhythms and melodic contours of the music which he played last night and that consequently his reading was full of life and color. There were moments when the fastidious ear craved a little more elegance of style, but on the whole the interpretation was so warm, so spirited and withal in some spots so rich in the sensuous lure of the Spanish ideas that it was a thing to be much enjoyed.

The concert concluded with the "Tangier" movement from Engelbert Humperdinck's "Moorish" rhapsody. From "Königskinder" witchland to Tangier is a far cry, but it was by no means a bad notion to let people see that the good Papa Humperdinck could write something else than fairy music and that he had been where there are not too many of the Ten Commandments and a man can certainly raise a thirst. If you do not believe it get on board the good ship Gibel Dersa any Saturday morning at Gibraltar—but that is another story.

Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y

JAN 14 1911

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

An Ideal Programme for the Orchestra and Great Popularity for Mischa Elman.

With the names of Handel, Beethoven, Lalo and Humperdinck on a programme for a symphony orchestral concert, it would be well assured in advance that majesty, poetry and romance in turn sway the souls of the audience. But that would be only a part of the story, for much would depend in interest on the selections. Mr. Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony that gave the third in the series of five Philharmonic concerts at the opera house of the Brooklyn Academy of Music, last evening, showed his ability as a programme maker, which is a rarer art than is generally supposed. He demonstrated the way to first arouse attention, but not too abruptly, in an overture which is one of a series of concert compositions by G. F. Handel. It was the No. 1, in D major, and the first movement in march time, with woodwind, trumpets and kettledrums preponderating over the strings that made the audience that filled every nook and corner of the opera house come to as strict attention as a regiment on parade at command of the colonel. With all of the choirs in full voice the grand classic had a finished interpretation; its progressions pleased aand gratified the ear, without easing it and leading it into puzzling intricacies of development of themes or sudden changes of modulation. Even the fugue in the second movement seemed simplicity itself, from the way in which the conductor led his men, preserving the sharp outlines of the phrases and yet giving to the main feature of the composition its exact value and its splendid and sustained volume of tone.

Beethoven's famous Seventh Symphony in A major, opus 92, was in the right place on the programme. To fully appreciate it the ear had to be tuned to it and nothing else. As many kinds of meanings have been read into this symphony by commentators as there have been kinds of interpretations of it. It has been turned into a march, a dance and a musical presentation of an orgie. And it has been termed the successor to Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, that is, a sort of programme music. The best that can be done with it, however, is to term it merely absolute music. Indeed, Beethoven had a notion now and then that music speaks for what it is to those who can love it. The question is then, as always, in absolute music, whether the conductor and his men produce effects that reach the heart and clarify the mind. In many ways Mr. Fiedler did this last night; he preserved in each of the movements its own peculiar melodic outline, and he never once overstepped the line that separates sound from noise. He played his masses so sonorously that they loomed up before the hearer as a dense forest shuts out all light from the wayfarer, and then he led the way to the opening where the distant blue sky relieved the gloom and a single violin, or a flute, would sing out sweetly as a shepherd piping to his flock. Especially popular was the third movement, with its recurrence, according to tradition, to an old pilgrim hymn in Lower Austria, and there was an outburst of applause at the close, and Mr. Fiedler signaled the members of the orchestra to rise in their places in response to the long-continued plaudits.

Mischa Elman, who will not be of legal age to vote in this country for at least a year, even though he had the right to do so, was the solo violinist in Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, Opus 21. The Russian temperament is famed for versatility, and it is not considered on that account that there is anything so wonderful in so young a boy being a violin virtuoso. But let a boy of less than 20 play as he does and come out of Sou-sou-East Flatbush as his birthplace, and it would be a seven months wonder. The ease and certainty with which he produces any impression he wishes is remarkable. Indeed, the only possible criticism of his playing is that it may be more rounded as he matures. But, by that time, he may have lost the juvenile fire that flies off from the bow he wields. He was recalled eight or nine times and the audience even then was eager to hear him again. The rule, very properly, however, is "no encores."

Some persons may say that there had to be something by Humperdinck on an orchestral programme nowadays, because his star is in the ascendant with his "Hansel und Gretel" and the new "Koenigskinder." But not so on this programme, for the music was a part of his "Moorish Rhapsody" and was entitled "Tangier—In a Moorish Cafe." Humperdinck once lived in Spain, teaching in the Barcelona University, and this sketch, for it amounts to that, describes in a dreamy way, not in a programmatic way, the playing of strange instruments in a cafe among the Moors, and then you fancy a song and then a dance and then the drowsy spell that overspreads the night. And not a line of the score that was reminiscent of the Humperdinck operas. Probably few in the audience had heard this music. Into it were woven arias, like the "Malaguena" and the "Habanera," but only as suggestions, and the thread of the theme in the cafe on the shore of Africa was resumed.

Mr. Fiedler never here conducted with such consummate skill. He never once drove his men, but seemed to put them on their mettle, and they gloriously responded. Applause followed each movement in no stinted measure.

WORLD

ss New York City.

ELMAN SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Beethoven's "Dance" and Lalo's "Spanish" Symphonies Features of Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

Mischa Elman, making his first appearance this season, was the soloist at the third concert of the Boston Symphony last night. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnol," which he chose for his solo number, in its piquant variety, vivid color, rhythmic force and technical opportunities, was well adapted to display the striking talents of an artist who has certainly broadened and deepened since last heard. The dash and brilliancy, authority and accuracy of his style and technique, and the beauty of his tone, were again in evidence, while his gallery posings had largely disappeared.

The contained feeling and poetic sentiment of the andante showed just where and how Elman had gained artistically.

"In memoriam James Jackson Higginson," a relative of its founder and patron, the orchestra played with tender pathos the andante from Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony. Beethoven's seventh was played with that absolute finish of detail and elegance of style which characterize these Boston players, and Mr. Fiedler's reading was rhythmic, sympathetic and in accord with the best traditions. The allegretto was simply exquisite.

"Tangier—In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody," by Humperdinck, concluded the programme. The Oriental feeling and bizarre orchestral color which marked this number hardly suggested the tenderly philosophic composer of "Koenigskinder." A delighted audience applauded with enthusiasm, recalling Elman many times.

HERALD

ess New York City.

1911

MR. ELMAN SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Young Russian Violinist Appears Again with Boston Orchestra—New Composition Played.

Mr. Mischa Elman was again the soloist yesterday afternoon at the second of last week's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The young Russian violinist was in his usual brilliant form, and, although the weather was not conducive to perfect intonation upon stringed instruments, he played in tune and with the beautiful certainty of technique that apparently never fa'ls him.

In the Mendelssohn concerts Mr. Elman displayed almost every attribute of fine violin playing. The famous old concerto was received with enthusiasm and at its close the violinist was recalled nearly a dozen times.

Mr. Sibelini's second symphony, in D major, to which Mr. Fiedler and his men devoted nearly a solid hour, offers little of interest. The composer seems constantly on the verge of a theme that might prove of value, but gets no further. It does not even give the orchestra a chance to show its virtuosity. The audience listened with patience and applauded with relief when it was ended.

Mr. Humperdinck's lovely prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel" began the concert. A stirring performance of the "Tannhäuser" overture brought it to a close and called forth the loudest applause of the afternoon from an audience that packed the hall.

Daily Eagle, Brooklyn, N. Y

JAN 13 1911

Musical Moments

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, is to give its third concert to-night at 8:15 o'clock at the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The soloist is to be Mischa Elman, the distinguished Russian violinist. The programme is as follows:

Overture in D major, No. 1.....Handel
Symphony in A major, No. 7.....Beethoven
Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra..
.....Lalo
"In a Moorish Cafe," from "The Moorish Rhapsody".....Humperdinck
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

[134]

PRESS
New York City
JAN 16 1911

SONGS AND SINGERS.

In two seasons Gustav Mahler has lifted the Philharmonic Orchestra to a point of artistic proficiency no organization of its kind in America, except the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has ever attained. In two short seasons this remarkable work might easily be undone if a lesser man than he should be placed at the helm. Surely no such calamity will befall this distinguished organization at a time when it has approached nearer than ever to its ideals. Surely the energy and enthusiasm of the last two years, the thousands of dollars spent in forging forward toward lofty artistic aspirations, will not be wasted by a sudden decision to stop.

Gustav Mahler is one of the most accomplished orchestral conductors now living. Like most great men, of course, he has his enemies, and there are many musicians and critics who take him to task for his habit of revising the instrumentation of other composers. Yet even such persons as honestly differ with him—that interesting French critic, for example, Romain Rolland, who felt shocked by Mahler's "neurasthenic" interpretation of the Ninth Symphony—should recognize readily his extraordinary knowledge of orchestral resources, and certainly every competent and unbiased observer in New York should appreciate what this man has accomplished since he undertook to make out of the Philharmonic Orchestra an instrument that could hold its own with other famous organizations here and abroad.

It would serve little purpose to insist, even if it were one's conviction, that Mahler is the only man fitted to keep the Philharmonic Orchestra in its present state of efficiency. After all, there are other great conductors in the world. Felix Weingartner, for instance, who is Mahler's successor in Vienna; Nikisch, who flashes stellar radiance as visiting conductor in various musical centres of Europe; Richard Strauss, who, like Mahler, is conductor as well as composer; Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming back to Boston as soon as he can break away from Berlin; Arturo Toscanini, who some day may prove to New Yorkers that he is as remarkable on the concert stage as in opera. But the fact remains that it was Gustav Mahler, and no one else, who reorganized and developed the Philharmonic Orchestra; that it was he and no one else who gave New York a series of symphony concerts which challenge comparison with recent performances of the band from Boston.

For persons accustomed to sit awe-inspired, with open-mouthed amazement, at the feet of fair reputation and to turn their backs, with stiff-necked obstinacy, against anything that has suffered from reproach it may seem sacrilege to utter a word of adverse criticism concerning the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra; absurd to speak with enthusiasm of the long-suffering Philharmonic Society. Yet, with the most cordial feelings of admiration for the Hub's excellent aggregation of musicians, which still holds its own as a body of players among the world's best orchestras, this writer is bound to say that the Philharmonic men have done finer work this season than their neighborly rivals. It is no fanatic admiration of Mahler that prompts this opinion; nor is it any unreasonable depreciation of Max Fiedler, fully though one realizes the shortcomings of that leader. The conclusion is simply the result of a careful and conscientious comparison of recent concerts given by the Boston and New York orchestras.

Go back a few years to the time when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, graduated from the school of Wilhelm Gericke, was turned over to the expert care of Dr. Muck. In those days the most hypercritical ear could hardly detect a flaw in the playing of this band. The stolid, lifeless, rigid interpretations of the rigorous drillmaster Gericke had been supplanted by the fluent, vital, elastic readings of his admirable successor. Yet one noticed no diminution in the euphony, in the technical nicety, in the dynamic balance and rhythmical precision of the famous organization.

After a few years of Fiedler things, unfortunately, have changed. To be sure, the beautifully limpid tone, the technical skill and natural refinement of the Boston orchestra are not seriously affected; for after all the personnel of the band is still above reproach. But Fiedler, at times, does force his men to undue noisiness and does fail to keep them in strict rhythmical order. And so, strange as it may seem, there have been performances this season which would not have brought glory even to the Philharmonic Society in the days of yore.

Consider, on the other hand, the concerts given since last October by Mahler and his men. Programmes there have been which did not meet all demands. Soloists there have been who failed to awaken wide public interest. But the playing of the orchestra has shown few technical flaws and never has had the fatal fault of being tiresome. Rhythmically Mahler's men have responded with extraordinary unanimity and precision to his exacting and at times erratic demands. Their attack has been invariably of electrifying incisiveness. Extreme clearness, nice balance of voices, sharply defined contrasts, nervous vitality, have characterized the performances of these men almost without exception. Hardly a moment of crudeness, of blurred lines, of haphazard dynamics, does the record reveal; hardly an instance of rhythmical see-sawing, of ungoverned, turbulent noise.

Only in one respect perhaps does this season's showing of the Philharmonic Orchestra suffer in comparison to that of the Boston band, and that is in the quality of tone put forth. This is not due solely, though, to superiority in the instrumental body, but also to Mahler's fondness for characteristic rather than mellifluous sound. It is only necessary to listen to the Philharmonic Society's violins when they are singing in unison to observe the difference. Our ears do not absorb the mellow flood of melody we are accustomed to hear from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nor the tide of sensuous and throbbing song poured forth by the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra under Toscanini. They harken to a volume of tone brilliant, tense, penetrating, forceful rather than fair to the senses, acrid rather than sweet. And that is just what Mahler, a designer of sharp musical etchings, wants.

As yet the public at large does not realize what excellent symphonic concerts the Philharmonic Society, thanks to Gustav Mahler, has been offering this season. Consequently, the bi-weekly performances have not won the generous support they deserve. But the backers of the society's rejuvenated orchestra should not feel discouraged at this critical time. It takes years to convince a slow-moving crowd of concert goers that some change has taken place, whether for the better or the worse. It requires a longer time to influence long-established opinion in New York probably than in any other musical city in the world.

Take the Flonzaley Quartet, for instance, founded by Edward J. De Coppet, which in a few years has risen to the very top among chamber music organizations of the world. In all musical centres in Europe this association of four men has won laurels. In Boston it draws crowded houses. Throughout the United States, outside of New York, it has been remarkably successful. Only in the musical metropolis of the western world folk still hold aloof. And why? Simply because the public here, after years and years of journalistic coaxing, has become convinced that the Kneisel Quartet represents the loftiest attainments in chamber music, just as it has been persuaded by reiterated assertions that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unrivaled in its realm. Simply because once that idea has been fixed in the conventional public mind—once it has grown to be a tradition—it is exceedingly difficult to implant any new impressions.

Let there be no misconception of the writer's intention here. The Kneisel Quartet still deserves the enthusiastic support of this community; so does the visiting orchestra from the Hub, despite recent shortcomings for which Max Fiedler is mainly responsible. But actual merit ought to count for more than reputation, which unfortunately it does not, and according to just estimates the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Flonzaley Quartet are entitled to as much favor as the two other organizations.

Last Thursday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra furnished an example of how much the average audience is influenced by reputation. Max Fiedler and his men inspired paeans of praise by their performances of the Andante from Schubert's "unfinished" symphony and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Yet the playing of the orchestra was admirable for little else than its smoothness and euphony, and those perfectly praiseworthy qualities were due in large part to the innocuously rigid flat and tiresome readings of Max Fiedler. With so wonderful an instrument as the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is easy enough to give interpretations that sound sweet to the ear, sweet and harmless. All sorts of difficulties arise, however, if the conductor asks for rhythmical elasticity, for strongly incisive accents, for refined gradations of dynamics, for marked contrasts, for vigor and power. To seek monotonous perfection, which in the minds of some persons in New York appears to be the highest aim, is one thing. To strive to combine variety of expression with impeccable execution is quite another; and that is the goal Mahler and his musicians have been struggling for with so much success.

Now that New York actually has an orchestra which can hope to compete with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, this season, in fact, has achieved finer results than the visiting organization, the time has come, it would seem, when local pride and enthusiasm should come to the fore. This writer has always insisted that in art feelings of patriotism ought to play no part. There is such a thing, however, as snobbish reverence for what is alien and supercilious disregard for what is indigenous. The best symphony orchestra this city has ever possessed ought to win the support and encouragement of every public-spirited citizen. And to maintain its present efficiency it is extremely important that no conductor inferior to Gustav Mahler should be the musical helmsman.

MAX SMITH.

EVE. WORLD
ess New York City.
JAN 7 1911

Boston Orchestra and Mischa Elman Give Fine Concert

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra added another brilliant concert to its list at Carnegie Hall last night. A programme of just the right length and substance, Mischa Elman, the distinguished violinist, as soloist, and the electric raport between players and audience made the evening an especially enjoyable one.

Schubert's "unfinished" symphony was played first, in memory of the late James Jackson Higginson, and its soaring harmonies were a touching tribute to the lover of music. Then a quick transition to the gayer things, the joyous seventh symphony of Beethoven, played with such fire and abandon as to move even the most representative of musical audiences to an outburst of enthusiasm which the entire orchestra had to acknowledge. Max Fiedler has rarely conducted with more spirit, and the musicians under him responded as one man.

Elman chose the well known "Spanish" symphony, by Lalo, which loses less in repetition than most modern violin concertos, for his debut of the season. The young violinist has already gained an enviable place among the masters of the bow, and last night his tone sounded even more mellow and round than ever. He surmounted the [illegible] passages with [illegible] with a depth [illegible] used the entire [illegible] recalls.

[illegible] the present [illegible] by adding [illegible] of Moorish [illegible] Moorish Rhapsody, the last of which, called "In a Moorish Cafe," ended the programme. It is a clever combination of whirlwind motifs and barbaric dance music, the modern orchestral instruments imitating the ofttimes weird sounds of African musicians. It comes as rather a shock to those who think "Santa Claus" Humperdinck never strayed from his German fairyland.

[135]

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 14 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVEN OVATION AFTER OVATION

Mischa Elman Is Applauded Even More Loudly.

SOME WONDERFUL PLAYING

Soloist Paints Marvelous Music Pictures in Spanish Symphony—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony Interpreted in Glorious Fashion.

The opera house of the Academy of Music held last night by far the most brilliant, as well as the largest audience it has had so far this season. It was the occasion of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mischa Elman as the soloist, and it was no wonder that Max Fiedler and his big orchestra received nothing short of an ovation. While the Boston orchestra is always worth traveling miles to hear, they have seldom been heard to play anything any better than they did the beautiful Seventh Symphony of Beethoven last night, and certainly they have seldom received a greater ovation than was accorded them at the conclusion of this number. Mr. Fiedler responded time and time again to the applause, which finally became so great that he made the entire orchestra rise to acknowledge it.

Mischa Elman was treated even better. He played the solo in Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, and played it in wonderful fashion. The great violinist fairly reveled in the ryhthms and melodic contours of the Spanish masterpiece that he played last night. His playing was replete with color, elegance and life, and his interpretation was brilliant enough to warrant the statement that he must have studied for the number especially in the very country in which it was written. It was so spirited, and yet so rich in the warm, sensuous lure of the Spanish ideas that the great audience was held spellbound during the three movements. The accompaniment of the orchestra was as near perfection as any human conductor could bring it, and the blending of the soft tones of the violinist's music with that of the big orchestra added to the sense of perfect enjoyment.

The first number was Handel's overture in D major, and served well as an introduction to the masterpiece which followed. While Handel's composition could never bring out the beauty and color from the orchestra of the symphony which it preceded, the volume and tone of the overture seemed to fit perfectly into place, and made a deep impression on the audience. It was played almost flawlessly.

The second number was the Beethoven seventh symphony. This is generally conceded to be one of the great composer's masterpieces, which will always hold a perennial freshness and never fail to charm. As played last night by the Boston orchestra it was ravishing. The perfection of balance of tone in the orchestra and the consequent clarity and airy lightness of each phrase were things to be cherished in the memory for many a long day. Mr. Fiedler made no attempt at a strong personal interpretation of the music. He devoted his attention to securing an entrancingly clear and lovely general result and to adhering as closely as possible to the letter of the score in every instance. It was a joy to hear such a performance of such a work.

The concert concluded with Humperdink's Tangier movement, "In a Spanish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody." As in the Spanish symphony which it followed, the orchestra played with all the brilliant colors written into this rhapsody by the composer.

AMERICAN
New York City.
JAN 10

Music News Notes.

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, with Mischa Elman as soloist. Each programme will contain a work by Humperdinck. Beethoven's seventh symphony will be the chief feature on Thursday, and Sibelius's second symphony will be played on Saturday.

[illegible]
BROOKLYN, N. Y
JAN 7 - 1911

Levy, Miss Rose Rothman and Miss Katherine McFarland.

Mischa Elman, who is to be soloist at the Boston Symphony concert next week, Friday evening, at the Academy of Music, is to play the violin solo in Lalo's "Symphonic Espagnole." The symphony will be Beethoven's No. 7 in A major, Opus 92. There are but two other numbers on the program, Handel's Overture in D major and Humperdinck's "Tangier—In a Moorish Cafe."

An excellent program is to be given at the organ recital and choir

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 13 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Mischa Elman, Violinist, Will Be the Soloist.

To-night brings the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, beginning at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the distinguished Russian violinist. The programme is as follows:

Handel, overture in D major, No. 1; Beethoven, symphony in A major, No. 7; Lalo, Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra; Humperdinck, "In a Morish Cafe," from "The Moorish Rhapsody."

PRESS
New York City

SONGS AND SINGERS.

In two seasons Gustav Mahler has lifted the Philharmonic Orchestra to a point of artistic proficiency no organization of its kind in America, except the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has ever attained. In two short seasons this remarkable work might easily be undone if a lesser man than he should be placed at the helm. Surely no such calamity will befall this distinguished organization at a time when it has approached nearer than ever to its ideals. Surely the energy and enthusiasm of the last two years, the thousands of dollars spent in forging forward toward lofty artistic aspirations, will not be wasted by a sudden decision to stop.

Gustav Mahler is one of the most accomplished orchestral conductors now living. Like most great men, of course, he has his enemies, and there are many musicians and critics who take him to task for his habit of revising the instrumentation of other composers. Yet even such persons as honestly differ with him—that interesting French critic, for example, Romain Rolland, who felt shocked by Mahler's "neurasthenic" interpretation of the Ninth Symphony—should recognize readily his extraordinary knowledge of orchestral resources, and certainly every competent and unbiased observer in New York should appreciate what this man has accomplished since he undertook to make out of the Philharmonic Orchestra an instrument that could hold its own with other famous organizations here and abroad.

It would serve little purpose to insist, even if it were one's conviction, that Mahler is the only man fitted to keep the Philharmonic Orchestra in its present state of efficiency. After all, there are other great conductors in the world. Felix Weingartner, for instance, who is Mahler's successor in Vienna; Nikisch, who flashes stellar radiance as visiting conductor in various musical centres of Europe; Richard Strauss, who, like Mahler, is conductor as well as composer; Dr. Karl Muck, who is coming back to Boston as soon as he can break away from Berlin; Arturo Toscanini, who some day may prove to New Yorkers that he is as remarkable on the concert stage as in opera. But the fact remains that it was Gustav Mahler, and no one else, who reorganized and developed the Philharmonic Orchestra; that it was he and no one else who gave New York a series of symphony concerts which challenge comparison with recent performances of the band from Boston.

For persons accustomed to sit awe-inspired, with open-mouthed amazement, at the feet of fair reputation and to turn their backs, with stiff-necked obstinacy, against anything that has suffered from reproach it may seem sacrilege to utter a word of adverse criticism concerning the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra; absurd to speak with enthusiasm of the long-suffering Philharmonic Society. Yet, with the most cordial feelings of admiration for the Hub's excellent aggregation of musicians, which still holds its own as a body of players among the world's best orchestras, this writer is bound to say that the Philharmonic men have done finer work this season than their neighborly rivals. It is no fanatic admiration of Mahler that prompts this opinion; nor is it any unreasonable depreciation of Max Fiedler, fully though one realizes the shortcomings of that leader. The conclusion is simply the result of a careful and conscientious comparison of recent concerts given by the Boston and New York orchestras.

Go back a few years to the time when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, graduated from the school of Wilhelm Gericke, was turned over to the expert care of Dr. Muck. In those days the most hypercritical ear could hardly detect a flaw in the playing of this band. The stolid, lifeless, rigid interpretations of the rigorous drillmaster Gericke had been supplanted by the fluent, vital, elastic readings of his admirable successor. Yet one noticed no diminution in the euphony, in the technical nicety, in the dynamic balance and rhythmical precision of the famous organization.

After a few years of Fiedler things, unfortunately, have changed. To be sure, the beautifully limpid tone, the technical skill and natural refinement of the Boston orchestra are not seriously affected; for after all the personnel of the band is still above reproach. But Fiedler, at times, does force his men to undue noisiness and does fail to keep them in strict rhythmical order. And so, strange as it may seem, there have been performances this season which would not have brought glory even to the Philharmonic Society in the days of yore.

Consider, on the other hand, the concerts given since last October by Mahler and his men. Programmes there have been which did not meet all demands. Soloists there have been who failed to awaken wide public interest. But the playing of the orchestra has shown few technical flaws and never has had the fatal fault of being tiresome. Rhythmically Mahler's men have responded with extraordinary unanimity and precision to his exacting and at times erratic demands. Their attack has been invariably of electrifying incisiveness. Extreme clearness, nice balance of voices, sharply defined contrasts, nervous vitality, have characterized the performances of these men almost without exception. Hardly a moment of crudeness, of blurred lines, of haphazard dynamics, does the record reveal; hardly an instance of rhythmical see-sawing, of ungoverned, turbulent noise.

Only in one respect perhaps does this season's showing of the Philharmonic Orchestra suffer in comparison to that of the Boston band, and that is in the quality of tone put forth. This is not due solely, though, to superiority in the instrumental body, but also to Mahler's fondness for characteristic rather than mellifluous sound. It is only necessary to listen to the Philharmonic Society's violins when they are singing in unison to observe the difference. Our ears do not absorb the mellow flood of melody we are accustomed to hear from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, nor the tide of sensuous and throbbing song poured forth by the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra under Toscanini. They harken to a volume of tone brilliant, tense, penetrating, forceful rather than fair to the senses, acrid rather than sweet. And that is just what Mahler, a designer of sharp musical etchings, wants.

As yet the public at large does not realize what excellent symphonic concerts the Philharmonic Society, thanks to Gustav Mahler, has been offering this season. Consequently, the bi-weekly performances have not won the generous support they deserve. But the backers of the society's rejuvenated orchestra should not feel discouraged at this critical time. It takes years to convince a slow-moving crowd of concert goers that some change has taken place, whether for the better or the worse. It requires a longer time to influence long-established opinion in New York probably than in any other musical city in the world.

Take the Flonzaley Quartet, for instance, founded by Edward J. De Coppet, which in a few years has risen to the very top among chamber music organizations of the world. In all musical centres in Europe this association of four men has won laurels. In Boston it draws crowded houses. Throughout the United States, outside of New York, it has been remarkably successful. Only in the musical metropolis of the western world folk still hold aloof. And why? Simply because the public here, after years and years of journalistic coaxing, has become convinced that the Kneisel Quartet represents the loftiest attainments in chamber music, just as it has been persuaded by reiterated assertions that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unrivaled in its realm. Simply because once that idea has been fixed in the conventional public mind—once it has grown to be a tradition—it is exceedingly difficult to implant any new impressions.

Let there be no misconception of the writer's intention here. The Kneisel Quartet still deserves the enthusiastic support of this community; so does the visiting orchestra from the Hub, despite recent shortcomings for which Max Fiedler is mainly responsible. But actual merit ought to count for more than reputation, which unfortunately it does not, and according to just estimates the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and the Flonzaley Quartet are entitled to as much favor as the two other organizations.

Last Thursday night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra furnished an example of how much the average audience is influenced by reputation. Max Fiedler and his men inspired pæans of praise by their performances of the Andante from Schubert's "unfinished" symphony and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Yet the playing of the orchestra was admirable for little else than its smoothness and euphony, and those perfectly praiseworthy qualities were due in large part to the innocuously rigid flat and tiresome readings of Max Fiedler. With so wonderful an instrument as the Boston Symphony Orchestra it is easy enough to give interpretations that sound sweet to the ear, sweet and harmless. All sorts of difficulties arise, however, if the conductor asks for rhythmical elasticity, for strongly incisive accents, for refined gradations of dynamics, for marked contrasts, for vigor and power. To seek monotonous perfection, which in the minds of some persons in New York appears to be the highest aim, is one thing. To strive to combine variety of expression with impeccable execution is quite another; and that is the goal Mahler and his musicians have been struggling for with so much success.

Now that New York actually has an orchestra which can hope to compete with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, this season, in fact, has achieved finer results than the visiting organization, the time has come, it would seem, when local pride and enthusiasm should come to the fore. This writer has always insisted that in art feelings of patriotism ought to play no part. There is such a thing, however, as snobbish reverence for what is alien and supercilious disregard for what is indigenous. The best symphony orchestra this city has ever possessed ought to win the support and encouragement of every public-spirited citizen. And to maintain its present efficiency it is extremely important that no conductor inferior to Gustav Mahler should be the musical helmsman.

MAX SMITH.

EVE. WORLD
New York City.

Boston Orchestra and Mischa Elman Give Fine Concert

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra added another brilliant concert to its list at Carnegie Hall last night. A programme of just the right length and substance, Mischa Elman, the distinguished violinist, as soloist, and the electric raport between players and audience made the evening an especially enjoyable one.

Schubert's "unfinished" symphony was played first, in memory of the late James Jackson Higginson, and its soaring harmonies were a touching tribute to the lover of music. Then a quick transition to the gayer things, the joyous seventh symphony of Beethoven, played with such fire and abandon as to move even the most representative of musical audiences to an outburst of enthusiasm which the entire orchestra had to acknowledge. Max Fiedler has rarely conducted with more spirit, and the musicians under him responded as one man.

Elman chose the well known "Spanish" symphony, by Lalo, which loses less in repetition than most modern violin concertos, for his debut of the season. The young violinist has already gained an enviable place among the masters of the bow, and last night his tone sounded even more mellow and round than ever. He surmounted the difficulties of the "test" passages with perfect ease and played with a depth of sentiment that roused the entire house to almost countless recalls.

Mr. Fiedler joined in the present Humperdinck celebration by adding that composer's sketches of Moorish life as set down in his "A Moorish Rhapsody," one part of which, called "In a Moorish Cafe," ended the programme. It is a clever combination of whirlwind motifs and barbaric dance music, the modern orchestral instruments imitating the oftttimes weird sounds of African musicians. It comes as rather a shock to those who think "Santa Claus" Humperdinck never strayed from his German fairyland.

[135]

AMERICAN
New York City.

BLITZ

Music News Notes.

The third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and on Saturday afternoon, with Mischa Elman as soloist. Each programme will contain a work by Humperdinck. Beethoven's seventh symphony will be the chief feature on Thursday, and Sibelius's second symphony will be played on Saturday.

Daly's B. & 30—8:30—W. & S.,
Eden Musee—55 W. 23—10 a.m. t
Waxwo
Elliott's—39 n. B.—8:30—W. & S
Empire—B. & 40—8:15—W. & S.,

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 14 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVEN OVATION AFTER OVATION

Mischa Elman Is Applauded Even More Loudly.

SOME WONDERFUL PLAYING

Soloist Paints Marvelous Music Pictures in Spanish Symphony—Beethoven's Seventh Symphony Interpreted in Glorious Fashion.

The opera house of the Academy of Music held last night by far the most brilliant, as well as the largest audience it has had so far this season. It was the occasion of the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mischa Elman as the soloist, and it was no wonder that Max Fiedler and his big orchestra received nothing short of an ovation. While the Boston orchestra is always worth traveling miles to hear, they have seldom been heard to play anything any better than they did the beautiful Seventh Symphony of Beethoven last night, and certainly they have seldom received a greater ovation than was accorded them at the conclusion of this number. Mr. Fiedler responded time and time again to the applause, which finally became so great that he made the entire orchestra rise to acknowledge it.

Mischa Elman was treated even better. He played the solo in Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, and played it in wonderful fashion. The great violinist fairly reveled in the ryhthms and melodic contours of the Spanish masterpiece that he played last night. His playing was replete with color, elegance and life, and his interpretation was brilliant enough to warrant the statement that he must have studied for the number especially in the very country in which it was written. It was so spirited, and yet so rich in the warm, sensuous lure of the Spanish ideas that the great audience was held spellbound during the three movements. The accompaniment of the orchestra was as near perfection as any human conductor could bring it, and the blending of the soft tones of the violinist's music with that of the big orchestra added to the sense of perfect enjoyment.

The first number was Handel's overture in D major, and served well as an introduction to the masterpiece which followed. While Handel's composition could never bring out the beauty and color from the orchestra of the symphony which it preceded, the volume and tone of the overture seemed to fit perfectly into place, and made a deep impression on the audience. It was played almost flawlessly.

The second number was the Beethoven seventh symphony. This is generally conceded to be one of the great composer's masterpieces, which will always hold a perennial freshness and never fail to charm. As played last night by the Boston orchestra it was ravishing. The perfection of balance of tone in the orchestra and the consequent clarity and airy lightness of each phrase were things to be cherished in the memory for many a long day. Mr. Fiedler made no attempt at a strong personal interpretation of the music. He devoted his attention to securing an entrancingly clear and lovely general result and to adhering as closely as possible to the letter of the score in every instance. It was a joy to hear such a performance of such a work.

The concert concluded with Humperdink's Tangier movement, "In a Spanish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody." As in the Spanish symphony which it followed, the orchestra played with all the brilliant colors written into this rhapsody by the composer.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
JAN 13 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Mischa Elman, Violinist, Will Be the Soloist.

To-night brings the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music, beginning at 8:15 o'clock. The soloist will be Mischa Elman, the distinguished Russian violinist. The programme is as follows:

Handel, overture in D major, No. 1; Beethoven, symphony in A major, No. 7; Lalo, Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra; Humperdinck, "In a Morish Cafe," from "The Moorish Rhapsody."

From TIMES

Address New York City.

Date JAN 15 1911

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

A Gloomy Symphony by Sibelius Played for the First Time.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second concert took place yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall and the audience was large. Notice was again taken of Prof. Humperdinck's recent presence in New York and his work here by the performance of the prelude to his "Hänsel und Gretel," familiar music, but still fresh and charming. The symphony was the second of Jean Sibelius, in D major. Not a little of the music of this Finnish composer has been played here in recent years, and its quality—the best of it, for, like most morals, Sibelius is not always at his best—has been such as to place him among the strong men of to-day. This symphony, we believe, had not before been heard in New York.

It is a work of stern and gloomy imagination; the imagination of one who thinks for himself and works in his own way. There is the character of the North in it; probably also the suggestion of the folk song of Finland; but Mr. Sibelius has not made this element prominent in the texture of his music, and has not, apparently, sought for sharply defined local color. There is not much following of conventional formularies in the symphony; but the music, though it has much that is rhapsodic, turbulent, impulsive, is finely shaped by a hand that understands the meaning and necessity of musical structure. The last movement seems unduly drawn out in its long coda with its sonorous fanfares. The "Vivacissimo" stands in the place of a scherzo, in which gayety is far from entering into the mood of the music; that mood is savage, and again ironical. There is absolutely nothing in this symphony that is written to please the ear, as many wish to be pleased. There is much that sounds chaotic and disordered; but it is evident to the listener who can take a larger measure of it, that it is all very definitely related, the coherent expression of a consistent idea. It is not too much to say that this second symphony of Sibelius is one of the strongest compositions in the symphonic form that have been heard here in a considerable period. It was played with a splendid eloquence, and Mr. Fiedler had evidently immersed himself deeply in the spirit of the work.

Mr. Mischa Elman was again the soloist, and played Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin. The extraordinary powers of the young man were displayed in it; but Mendelssohn's serene and classic work also brought out some of his limitations and deficiencies—which we are fair to regard as unripeness, something that will be outgrown with the maturing of this youth, who will be 19 years old this week, if the books give truly the date of his birth. Repose was at times lacking in Mr. Elman's playing of the concerto; there was now and again a rhythmic unrestfulness that is peculiarly damaging to the true physiognomy of Mendelssohn's music. There is plenty of room in it for all of Mr. Elman's spirit, but it needs to be poised and chastened. For all that, there was much to admire in the performance; the beauty and poignancy of the tone, the elasticity of the bowing, the clean precision of the technique of the left hand, the brilliancy that lightened it all. Much of the applause that was bestowed upon Mr. Elman was deserved. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra also deserved some for the uncommon finesse and beauty of the accompaniment. The programme was brought to an end with the overture to "Tannhäuser."

SUN

ess New York City.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Mischa Elman Plays Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

The matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday permitted Mischa Elman, who was again the solo performer, to delight a large audience with his brilliant playing of the familiar Mendelssohn concerto for the violin. The orchestral numbers were not altogether in the common order. To begin with there was the prelude to "Hansel und Gretel," which was given as another illustration of the excellent things furnished by the talent of Engelbert Humperdinck. It is not necessary to tell New York music lovers what a good thing this prelude is, they all know it and love it. But a note may be made of the fact that it is almost excellent thing to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra play it.

The second number on the list was the second symphony of Jean Sibelius, the Finnish composer. This symphony, which was completed in 1902, shows a firmer and clearer construction than the composer's first symphony. But one finds in it the same characteristic type of melody and the same remarkable harmonies. Sibelius writes with much independence, yet he is certainly in the ranks of the extreme moderns. He finds his ideals of musical beauty not where the classicists found them, but where D'Indy, Strauss, Debussy, Reger and other seekers after new methods of expression have discovered theirs. This is equivalent to saying that many if not most music lovers will have to acquire a taste for this second symphony.

The final number on the programme was the "Tannhäuser" overture, which is not heard at the opera in these days of the Parisian version. It is therefore welcome, particularly when it is performed upon such a fine instrument as the hydra headed one which comes once a month from Boston.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N.Y.

JAN 14 1911

MUSICAL.

Boston Orchestra Heard in Third Concert, Mischa Elmen as Soloist.

A sold out house was Brooklyn's greeting to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their first concert of the new year at the Academy of Music last night. This orchestra is attraction enough in itself, and when they bring to town with them an artist like Mischa Elman, the youthful genius of the violin, the occasion is likely to furnish musical food for reflection, and so it was last night. Elman is one of the exceptions in the long list of concert artists. He is a rare embodiment of hereditary impulse as an interpreter through the violin, this youth who lacks just one week of being 19 years old, and exemplifies the astonishing gift of temperamental intuition. He has so much of the insight which cannot be acquired by ordinary methods of study. The spirit of the instrument fairly cries out through the searching appeal of his tones, and then with respect to the practical fundamentals of violin playing his technique is something to marvel at for tone purity and facile accuracy. This was disclosed last night through the performance of three movements (first, fourth and fifth), from Lalo's Spanish Symphony, a work which until recently had been omitted for a while from the repertoire of violinists. It is a work of engaging melodious content, while being exacting enough as to difficulty in execution. Elman was recalled again and again after his performance, and some enthusiasts seemed to entertain hopes of an encore, but when the young artist had been brought out nine times the audience gave up expecting that the rule against encores would be broken.

The principal orchestral number was Beethoven's dear old Seventh Symphony, the joyous loveliness of which has undiminished power to charm. It was received as an old friend last night, and the applause following each movement was unusually prolonged. At the close, Mr. Fiedler recognized the persistent plaudits by calling upon the orchestra to rise in acknowledgment. An odd choice for an opening was Handel's Overture in D major, No. 1, a composition which illustrated wherein the older overtures were different from the modern ones, and also typical of the Handelian manner without being a work of marked distinction. The final number of the programme was by a composer of the hour, Humperdinck, who was represented by "Tangier, in a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody." It was a welcome piece of original writing in the characteristic use of the many instruments in the painting of a tone picture in which the Oriental atmosphere is vividly suggested. The concert apparently gave great satisfaction to the distinguished audience and had an appreciable effect in upholding the prestige of the splendid orchestra that it is always a privilege to hear.

omEVE. TELEGRAM

dress New York City.

ate JAN 13 1911 JAN 13 1911

There are only words of praise to be given the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which fairly surpassed all its glorious records at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night. The opening number was the andante from Schubert's unfinished symphony, played in memory of Colonel Higginson's cousin, James J. Higginson, of ted at the Metropolitan.

New York. Following this came the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, played with a perfection of detail and a mighty fusing of all the voices in the big orchestra. If this symphony is the apotheosis of dancing, the Boston orchestra's performance was the apotheosis of interpretation.

Mischa Elman, the nineteen year old violinist, played the solo part of Lalo's Spanish Symphony with a golden tone and a splendid mastery of all the technical difficulties. He was again an arresting figure, dominant, aggressive, confident. A selection from Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" brought to its close one of the most delightful concerts of the season.

MME OLIVE FREMSTAD
- PHOTO BY HALL

AMERICAN

New York City.

Boston Symphony Heard in Splendid Programme

Mischa Elman Makes His First Appearance This Season and Plays in Fine Form.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Rarely if ever has the Boston Symphony Orchestra been in more magnificent form than last night, when it gave the first of its third pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall.

A programme of much dignity and charm had been compiled by Mr. Fiedler for the occasion. It contained nothing at all sensational, unless a selection from "A Moorish Rhapsody" of Humperdinck deserved to have that adjective tacked on to it. There was something distinctly humorous in the idea of so placid and discreet a composer as the creator of "Koenigskinder" being tempted, so to speak, from fairyland into the unvirtuous Orient.

The concert opened with an admirable rendering of the Andante from the "Unfinished" Schubert symphony.

The place of honor in the scheme had been reserved for Beethoven's seventh symphony, one of the master works of music, as beautiful in its own way as anything conceived by mortal man. The reading of this work by Mr. Fiedler and his followers had breadth and charm. Every shading, every delicacy, was respected without one single moment's loss of power.

A special attraction of the concert was the appearance, for the first time since last season, of Mischa Elman. The work which he interpreted was the familiar "Spanish Symphony" of Lalo. He played it with assurance, taste and skill.

EVE. MAIL

ss New York City.

MISCHA ELMAN SOLOIST WITH BOSTON BAND

Young Violinist Plays Lajo's Concerto with Feeling and Power—Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and Beethoven's Seventh Performed in Masterly Style.

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

Mischa Elman was the soloist last night, when the Boston Symphony orchestra paid its third visit to New York. Max Fiedler made an alteration in the programme announced by playing the unfinished symphony by Schubert, in memory of James Jackson Higginson, brother of Col. Higginson of Boston, patron of the Boston orchestra.

This was given with a fine poetic sense, and it was followed by a delightful reading of the Seventh symphony of Beethoven. The orchestra also gave a brilliant performance of a Moorish fantasy by Humperdinck, which had many of the characteristics that were enjoyable in the recent opera by the same composer.

This is the third successive season wherein Mischa Elman has visited America, and while he was acclaimed at his first appearance as a real genius, there were many failings due to immaturity. There was much gain last season, but last night he reached a higher plane, both of conception and of purpose. He approaches his task with greater reverence and he discharges it like few artists in the world to-day are capable of doing. The sweep in the Lalo concerto was one which carried the audience into countless recalls, not one of which was more than he deserved.

He will be the soloist at the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston orchestra, and he will repeat the Lalo concerto to-night in Brooklyn.

m EVENING JOURNAL,

ress New York City.

e JAN 11 1911

Mischa Elman, who is to be the soloist at both of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall to-morrow evening and Saturday afternoon, has elected to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole at the evening concert and the Mendelssohn Concerto at the Saturday concert. To-morrow evening Mr. Fiedler has selected Beethoven's Seventh Symphony for the principal numbers, and for Saturday afternoon the second symphony of Sibelius in D major will be the principal work.

Mr. Elman is to give only one violin recital in this city. It will be given in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon, January 28.

MORN. TELEGRAPH

ess New York City.

JAN 15 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAS NOVELTIES

The Sibelius Affair Entirely Unnecessary Because of Its Length, Breadth and Thickness.

The Boston Symphony Society gave a concert yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. It contained two numbers which might be regarded as concessions to the demand that from time to time we should be regaled with the sweetness or familiarity.

They were the Vorspiel to "Haensel und Gretel" and that to "Tannhaeuser." These were beautifully done and enthusiastically received. The Sibelius "Symphony," on the other hand, was not a concession to any one. It was long. That is a rule of modern composition. "Say little, but, by Hercules, say it in an hour." It was checkered with variety styles. It was grandiose. It went on, seriously, pomposly, pretentiously, and finally came to an end.

Herr Max Fiedler, the brilliant conductor of this celebrated society, is quite right to give novelties to help us to keep pace with the development, if any, of latter-day symphonic music. Yet one found oneself secretly pining—yes, actually longing, to hear those delectable, inimitable Bostonians in a little Beethoven, a little Brahms, a little something of the masters and not the mastersingers, to which association of worthy people Sibelius may probably belong. He is very prolix. He is very certain, and very fond of a form in which it is most difficult to excel.

Mischa Elman was the soloist. She played a violin concerto or Mendelssohn in E minor. Many were the manifestations of delight.

1 STANDARD UNION,

ess BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 13 1911

The lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert given in the Opera House, Academy of Music, tonight, was set in Lecture Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, and, like the concert, was under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. Howard Brockway, the composer and pianist, interpreted the programme, giving it mainly as a piano recital and thereby delighting his hearers. He omitted the opening Handel number, the Overture in D major, No. 1, but gave many exerpts from the Beehoven Symphony in D major, No. 7, opus 21, which he called one of the most beautiful and cheerful of the Beethoven symphonies. He directed attention to the play between the two voices in the second movement, and the richness of color in the third movement, but said that the fourth is always very annoying to him, "impressing me like a St. Vitus dance, a strathspey, or a Highland fling, coming after so much melody."

The Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra, the first, fourth and fifth movements of which Mischa Elman is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-night, was called an exquisite example of Lalo's composition. The andante, the second movement, was found to have but little Spanish color, although wholly charming, and attention was called to the melodic expression of the whole. Humperdinck's "Tangier—In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody," was discovered to have such melody as makes "Hansel und Gretel" delightful and to occasionally remind the hearer of pretty folk songs. The humor introduced by the bassoon was illustrated as clearly as the difference in piano and bassoon would allow.

Miss Margaret Steele Anderson, of Louisville, gave her second lecture on "Interpretative Studies in Art," in Science Hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon. She particularized on "Modern German Romanticism," and displayed a series of pictures illustrative of the work of that school, mainly reproductions of paintings. Similar reproductions will prevail in her lecture of next Thursday, which is to be devoted to "The Spirit of Later French Painting."

HERALD

s New York City.

ORCHESTRA'S TRIBUTE TO A DEAD PATRON

"Unfinished Symphony" Played in Memory of Brother of Colonel Higginson, of Boston.

There was an extra number at the beginning of last night's programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given at Carnegie Hall, namely, the slow movement from Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." It was played in memory of James Jackson Higginson, who died a few days ago. He was the brother of Colonel Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, and had been an ardent frequenter of its concerts.

After that the programme proceeded in its original order. The audience was huge and the applause in proportion. The soloist was Mr. Mischa Elman, the Russian violinist, well known here, but last night marked his first appearance this season.

He was greeted as an old friend and was kept bowing for a long time before the applause would permit him to play. He played three movements from Lalo's Spanish symphony, and at the close was recalled a dozen times. His playing was well nigh technical perfection, colored by temperament. He still appears a mere lad, but his playing is that of a veteran.

The orchestra, conducted by Mr. Max Fiedler, played as though it were on its mettle every minute. It was ideal in balance of tone, and the solo parts were again faultless. They were heard in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, and in Mr. Engelbert Humperdinck's brilliant composition called "Tangier," a movement from "A Moorish Rhapsody." After the symphony there was tumult of applause, Mr. Fiedler being called out numerous times until he asked the men of the orchestra to arise and share the honors. Then the audience cheered.

STANDARD UNION,

ss BROOKLYN, N. Y.

JAN 14 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Friday, the 13th, is not unlucky when it brings Boston's great virtuoso orchestra to Brooklyn, even though the programme last evening was but a repetition of Thursdays in New York. Nowhere in this country is there such technique, such masterly precision, such refinement of tone, such orchestral perfection as in that band of players governed by Max Fiedler; yet often have we been more moved by the rougher organization at the Metropolitan Opera House, to say nothing of fifty men under Seidl, simply because of the nature of the four numbers given. To audiences fed on the fire and fury of the Slavs, on the impassioned glory of Wagner, Tschaikowsky and their successors, Father Handel, with his musical pulse beating with exasperating slowness, or Beethoven, not Beethoven of the heights or depths, but amidst the placid vivacity of the Seventh Symphony, can never appeal. Indeed, nowadays, with all the wild melancholy of the "Pathetique" and its fellows, Beethoven's Seventh begins to seem a bit automatic, sacrilegious though the sentiment may seem. Or is it that having witnessed an enterprising young woman dancing almost in "the altogether" through its measures, we no longer fall victims to illusion, but recall only bare feet and high hung knees.

The Handel Overture No. 1 was all it should be with its simple strains and quiet feeling; it almost seemed as if the orchestra were "jollying" its composer in the dust of his tomb, so slight were the demands on this great body of instruments interpreting something adapted to a totally different state of things. Nor did Beethoven ruffle the surface of emotion much more definitely, charming as this "apotheosis of the dance" undoubtedly is; but with the Lalo composition, the introduction of Spanish color, as well as the Russian Mischa Elman, emotions began to stir. Particularly was the Andante adapted to the beautiful cantabile of this remarkable artist, who already suggests the ripe maturity which goes not with twenty years. The audience, occupying every section of the auditorium, with many standing at the rear, was most attentive through the three numbers, and possibly a trifle too enthusiastic at the end. For after all, what is a mere lad with a fiddle that he should receive round after round of applause while that noble body of a hundred musicians accompanying him did not command a hand? Thus does the public invariably respond to the merely personal element as against supreme art in a form which he who runs may not read.

The evening closed with an interesting fragment from "A Moorish Rhapsody," by Humperdinck, picturing the gay irrelevancy of an Oriental cafe. It is new to this public, but has considerable character and style, with a life and color sure to take. The Boston Symphony concerts have one great merit—they are brief; the last note was sounded by 10.

EVE. GLOBE

s New York City.

JAN 16 1911

Three Concerts.

THREE symphony concerts, each in some respect at least of extraordinary interest, made a strong record for instrumental music in this town Saturday and Sunday. Saturday afternoon Carnegie Hall was crowded for a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that again brought forward Mischa Elman as soloist. His choice of concerto this time was Mendelssohn's. Now and then the youth of the player betrayed itself in a liberty with the rhythm or a lack of repose, but in spite of slight drawbacks his performance was one of great beauty and brilliance, and fully deserved the thunderous applause with which it was received.

The symphony of the afternoon was Sibelius's in D major, played, unless we are greatly mistaken, for the first time here. It is one of the most characteristic works of its interesting composer, a work in which the national element is strong, the prevailing mood sombre, the harmonization modern and biting, the orchestration often strikingly novel and never mindful of mere ear pleasing. It is not a work that one can grasp at a single hearing—for that very reason it has the more chance of turning out a great work—but it is so interesting and it was played in such a masterly manner that Mr. Fiedler would do well to produce it here again this season.

The admirable performance of the orchestra in the symphony and in the accompaniment to the concerto is especially worth emphasizing, because elsewhere there was something to question. The prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel," which opened the concert as one more tribute to Humperdinck, has been played here much more poetically, and when the "Tannhäuser" overture came along at the end of the programme Mr. Fiedler was moved to deliver himself of a "reading." It was a stirring performance in all truth that he wrung from his men, but one that made you wonder that they could play the notes so fast. In the hurry grandeur was left far behind.

all attempt at display. The violinist was absorbed in showing forth the true beauty of Beethoven's music. The andante she played with particular feeling and in the finale she was duly brilliant. And since Miss Parlow is still very young, it is safe to say that in a few years she will make even more of the concerto than she does now.

PRESS

JAN 15 1911

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Mischa Elman Has Another Triumph.

Mischa Elman had another triumph yesterday afternoon, when he played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, opus 64, a work that showed to full advantage his brilliant style and almost incomparable feeling, was the medium. The same enthusiasm which greeted Elman's first appearance in this city was noticed yesterday. There were almost a dozen recalls of the artist, and his appearance to-night in the Metropolitan Opera House concert is bound to attract many who heard him yesterday. Seldom has it fallen to the lot of New York music lovers to hear such a master of his instrument as is Elman, and it is safe to say his name will go down to posterity as one of the most finished musicians of his time.

Max Fiedler offered a Symphony in D major, No. 2, of Silebius, a work that did not please the critical audience as did the same composer's Third Symphony, heard previously. The themes at no time were worked out with skill, lacking distinction and decidedly giving the impression of uncouthness. In two of the four movements were suggestions of Debussy ideas, though lacking the charm of that composer's perfect orchestration.

The orchestra's opening number was the prelude to "Haensel und Gretel," a far more pleasing interpretation than was the "Tannhauser" overture that closed the programme. In the last named work Fiedler disregarded tempo utterly, producing a sensationally brilliant but intrinsically weak version. It was disappointing to lovers of Wagner as the master wrote. Especially was this true in the Venusberg music, taken at a tempo that cost almost all the charm and that violated every tradition of Bayreuth.

from EVE. WORLD

address New York City.

date

MISCHA ELMAN PLAYS AGAIN WITH THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mischa Elman again was the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concert at Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. He was heard in the Mendelssohn violin concerto in E minor, and in his playing showed all the skill that makes him one of the marvels of the age. He is discarding the youthful tricks and gallery plays that were his wont, and is showing the understanding and feeling that go to the making of a great artist. Under Mr. Fiedler's masterful direction, the finished body of players that make up this exceptionally fine orchestra played Sibelius's second symphony in D minor, the prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel und Gretel" and the "Tannhauser" overture. The house, of course, was crowded, as it always is at these concerts.

EVE. POST.

ress New York City.

JAN 1911

The Boston Orchestra.

On Saturday the Boston Symphony concert programme consisted of two operatic preludes, the first Humperdinck's "Hänsel and Gretel," the second Wagner's "Tannhäuser," besides Mendelssohn's concerto, played by Mischa Elma, and the second symphony of Sibelius, the Finnish composer. Later hearings of this symphony may reveal beauties unsuspected at present, but, except for occasional snatches of melancholy melody, very characteristic of the Northland, where the sun hides itself for so many weeks during the year, Sibelius seems to have little that is new to say. One effective and interesting portion of the symphony is the slow middle part of the scherzo. This is marked lento e suave, and a stately melody for oboe sounds above the accompaniment of bassoons and horns. In the first movement there was a short pizzicato ostinato for the strings, which somewhat recalled the wonderful movement in Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, but unfortunately Sibelius leans toward the school of Richard Strauss, and he has written dreary stretches of mere noise, quite in that composer's manner. With every fresh work that appears on concert programmes one looks for a real melodist, but the search is seldom rewarded.

Fortunately there was melody to be heard at Carnegie Hall, a great deal of it, and, after the symphony, the Mendelssohn concerto sounded deliciously fresh and young. Mr. Elman played it with great beauty of tone, and was enthusiastically recalled many times. The two overtures were performed splendidly by the orchestra, so the concert proved enjoyable, in spite of the heat in the hall, the depressing atmospheric conditions, and the symphony.

Daily Citizen,

ess Brooklyn, N. Y

JAN 13 1911

LECTURE-RECITAL.

Howard Brockway Interprets the Philharmonic Society Programme.

The lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert given in the opera house, Academy of Music to-night, was set in lecture hall, Academy of Music, yesterday afternoon, and, like the concert, was under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute. Howard Brockway, the composer and pianist, interpreted the programme, giving it mainly as a piano recital and thereby delighting his hearers. He omitted the opening Handel number, the overture in M major, No. 1, but gave many excerpts from Beethoven, Symphony in A major, No. 7, Op. 27, which he called one of the most beautiful and cheerful of Beethoven symphonies. He directed attention to the play between the two voices in the second movement, and the richness of color in the third movement, but said that the fourth is always very annoying to him, "impressing me like a St. Vitus dance, a strathspay, or a Highland fling, coming after so much melody."

The Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, the first, fourth and fifth movements of which Mischa Elman is to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-night, was called an exquisite example of Lalo's composition. The andante, the second movement, was found to have but little Spanish color, although wholly charming, and attention was called to the melodic expression of the whole. Humperdinck's "Tangier—In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody," was discovered to have such melody as makes "Hansel und Gretel" delightful and to occasionally remind the hearer of pretty folk songs. The humor introduced by the bassoon was illustrated as clearly as the difference in piano and bassoon would allow.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

ess JAN 15

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLEASES

Third Concert of Season at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third matinee of the season yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The soloist was the same as at the previous concerts—Mischa Elman. The young Russian violinist chose Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's Concerto in E minor, and played it with wonderfkul technical finish and luscious beauty of tone.

The programme opened with the prelude to "Hänsel und Gretel," and the pièce de résistance was Sibelius's Second Syhphony, which was played last season by the Russian Symphony Orchestra. It is a composition of singular beauty, a beauty enhanced by the national character of its spirit. Mr. Fiedler led his musicians with admirable understanding, bringing out the rhythms in splendid fashion, and yet never passing the bounds of good taste.

The audience was of Boston Symphony size and appreciation.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

JAN 13 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Third of the Season Pleases Carnegie Hall Audience.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its third concert of the season last night in Carnegie Hall. It would be no surprise to those familiar with the orchestra's New York concerts to say that there was not an empty seat in the hall, although the announcement of Mischa Elman as the soloist made this condition doubly sure. It is only fair to say that last night the famous orchestra fairly outdid itself. Its precision, its gloriously luscious tone, its alternate power and delicacy, spoke volumes in favor of Mr. Fiedler.

The programme opened with the andante from Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, played in memory of James Jackson Higginson, who died last week. Mr. Higginson was the brother of Major Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, and Mr. Fiedler and the musicians gave to the performance a labor of love. But the triumph of the evening was in Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, which was played with marvellous ensemble effect and great poetic feeling. The band seemed like one great instrument, capable of infinite detail, as well as splendid sonority. Mr. Fiedler had his musicians under perfect control, and they responded to his every call in a manner beyond praise.

Mr. Elman signalized his return to New York by playing Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnol," for violin and orchestra. Mr. Elman's brilliancy and technical prowess are now a byword and he proved them again last night. There was in his playing a fire, a warmth of tone and a breadth of style that were a delight. The programme closed with Humperdinck's "In a Moorish Café."

n EVE. POST.

ress New York City.

e

MUSIC AND DRAMA

Elman and the Boston Orchestra.

Instead of the Handel overture which was to have opened last night's Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra the slow movement from Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony was played, in memoriam James Jackson Higginson, the brother of the founder of this admirable orchestra. Then came a smooth and elegant performance of Beethoven's seventh symphony, the allegretto and final allegro of which went particularly well. The final orchestral piece was "Tangier; in a Moorish Café," from Humperdinck's Moorish Suite, a brilliant and interesting composition in which the composer of Königskinder embodied some of the impressions he gathered during the years when he was one of the professors at a conservatory in Barcelona.

More or less Spanish, also, was the remaining number on the programme, Lalo's violin concerto, which bears the name of "Spanish Symphony." The solo part was played by Mischa Elman with dazzling brilliancy of execution. More than that, the young Russian violinist displayed, in the andante, a greater depth of feeling than he had ever before shown in this city. His playing of the Mendelssohn concerto will doubtless be one of the most enjoyable features of to-morrow afternoon's concert by the Boston Orchestra. It is needless to say that both soloist and orchestra were warmly applauded last night.

MORN. TELEGRAPH

JAN 13 1911

ess New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE PROGRAMME

Mischa Elman the Soloist at Carnegie Hall—A Humperdinck Selection.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in one of its most benign and accomplished moods was heard last night at Carnegie Hall.

The first number was the andante from the unfinished symphony played in memory of James Jackson Higginson, the brother of the generous and patent Maecenas, to whose support and belief the very existence of the Boston Symphony is due.

This was followed by the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven, the allegro of which was played with a most extraordinary unity of purpose and idea.

Mischa Elman was the soloist and played the Spanish Symphony of Lalo for violin and orchestra with all his customary sangfroid and ability.

The concert ended with a selection from the works of our esteemed contemporary and imminent issue, Engelbert Humperdinck. It was entitled "In a Moorish Cafe."

We did not know that his gentleness frequented such riotous places.

[137]

MORN. TELEGRAPH

New York City.

JAN 15 1911

The third of the Boston Symphon orchestral concerts was heard at Academy of Music on Monday nigh with Mischa Elman as soloist. The pr gramme was well varied, and the orches tra, Director Fiedler and the soloist appeared to good advantage. The Academy was well filled, and Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra were enthusiastically applauded at the end of each selection.

Mischa Elman has been heard in this city several times before. He more than repeated his former successes. The opening number of the programme was Handel's Overture in D major, No. 1. This overture has not been often heard here, and was given a fine descriptive rendition. The symphony was Beethoven's Seventh. This symphony, unlike the overture, is well known here, and is a great favorite. Lalo's difficult Spanish Symphony was the selection played by the young violin soloist. Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," one of the finest of all descriptive music, closed the programme, and was admirably done by the orchestra.

EVE. TELEGRAM

New York City.

JAN 16 19

At the Boston Symphony's concert on Saturday afternoon Humperdinck's overture to the delightful "Hansel and Gretel" was performed with all that smoothness of phrasing and sonority of tone for which the Boston players are justly celebrated. Sibelius' Second Symphony followed. It proved to be a superb work in the modern revolutionary manner. Mischa Elman in the suave Mendelssohn concerto for violin delighted his hearers with his brilliant playing. Then Mr. Fiedler and his players brought a notable concert to a superb finish with the overture to Tannhauser, nobly played.

STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

Aus dem Reiche der Töne.

Im Opernsaale der Academy of Music giebt morgen Abend das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester das dritte Brooklyner Konzert der Saison unter den vereinigten Auspizien des Brooklyn-Instituts für Künste und Wissenschaften und des Brooklyn-Philharmonischen Vereins. Der Solist des Abends ist der gefeierte Violin-Virtuose Mischa Elman, der Lalo's „Symphonie Espagnole" und Humperdinck's „Tanger" zu Gehör bringen wird. Das Orchester spielt unter Max Fiedler's Leitung Piecen von Händel und Beethoven.

From WORLD

Address New York City.

Date

Mrs. Taft and Miss Taft were in the audience at the Boston Symphony concert at the National Theatre this afternoon.

EVE. SUN

New York City.

JAN 14 1911

After the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-day plays Humperdinck's "Hansel" prelude, Sibelius's Second symphony, and, with Elman, the Mendelssohn violin concerto, the men from Boston go home, to return here Feb. 23 with Busoni.

EVE. GLOBE

New York City.

JAN 13 1911

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of its local pair of January concerts at Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme opened with the Andante from Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, played in memory of the late James Jackson Higginson, a brother of the founder of the orchestra. Beethoven's Seventh Symphony came next, and then Mischa Elman was heard here for the first time this season in Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." "In a Moorish Café," from Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," completed the programme.

The performance of the orchestra on this occasion was one of the finest it has ever given here. One might well doubt whether orchestral playing could be carried to greater perfection than it was in the music of Schubert, Beethoven, and Humperdinck. "In a Moorish Café" had also the function of presenting the gentle author of "Hänsel und Gretel" and "Königskinder" in a different, but not too different, light.

Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" is not music of any particular depth or significance, but Mr. Elman glorified it by the brilliance of his performance. He played not only with beauty of tone and irreproachable technique, but with the communicating fire that can make such music seem for the time being really worth while.

MISCHA ELMAN,
Soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

STAR

ess

JAN 13 1911

Baltimore Journal, Mittwoch, den 11. Januar 1911

Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester.

Mischa Elman, der große russische Violinist, der bereits in den beiden Vorjahren zweimal mit dem Boston Symphonie-Orchester hier gehört worden ist, wird der Solist bei dem dritten Conzert dieses Orchesters sein, welches unter Leitung von Dirigent Max Fiedler am Mittwoch, den 11. Januar, Abends, im Lyric Theater stattfinden wird. Ein Zeichen der Bedeutung Elman's ist, daß das Boston Symphonie-Orchester ihn nun im dritten Jahre hintereinander als Solisten engagirt hat, was bisher niemals zu verzeichnen gewesen ist. Elman wird Lalo's Spanische Symphonie spielen, ein Conzertstück, das eines der dankbarsten der Violin-Literatur ist. Lalo wird immer mehr als einer der bedeutendsten französischen Componisten anerkannt, und besonders dieses Tonwerk besitzt einen außerordentlich hohen musikalischen Werth.

Dirigent Fiedler wird sein Programm, der Feiertagszeit entsprechend, mit dem Vorspiel zu Humperdinck's Märchenoper „Hänsel und Gretel" beginnen. Der Componist steht jetzt im Vordergrunde des Interesses, da sein neues Werk „Die Königskinder" bei seiner Uraufführung in New York jüngsthin einen Sensationserfolg erzielt hat. Die Symphonie, die aufgeführt werden wird, ist Dvorak's Symphonie in E-Moll Nr. 5 „Aus der neuen Welt", über welche sich die musikalische Welt so lange gestritten hatte. Die einen erklärten sie für eine amerikanische, die andern für eine czechische Symphonie. Diese Controverse ist vorüber, die Neigung des Conzert-Publikums zu diesem Tonwerk ist geblieben. Richard Strauß' Tongemälde „Tod und Verklärung" vervollständigt das hochinteressante, künstlerisch hochstehende Programm.

REAL TRIUMPH FOR BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Success in Concert Given at the Lyric Shared By Mischa Elman.

A real triumph, shared by Mischa Elman, the soloist, was celebrated by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its concert at the Lyric last night. Never has one of their Baltimore concerts seemed to give such real enjoyment to everyone present. Mr. Max Fiedler, the conductor, made a happy selection in the numbers of the program and not only did he give them a thoroughly musical and dignified reading, but the men played them in a finished and inspiring fashion. It is difficult to imagine any orchestra surpassing this accomplished body of musicians in quality and balance of tone.

The opening number was the prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," which was very appropriate at this time, especially as its composer is at present in the musical spotlight—his new opera, the "Konigskinder," having its initial performance in New York but a few weeks ago. It was charmingly played, the men seemingly inspired more than usual. The Dorak Symphony is always an interesting and pleasing composition, but last night, under the baton of Max Feidler, it seemed to take on a new charm and the audience listened with a spellbound interest.

The soloist, Mischa Elman, a violin virtuoso, played the Lalo Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, and did it in such a way as to defy adverse criticism. Though the composition has but few profound problems in the deeper and more classical exposition of the art of violin playing, the rendition of the work was accomplished with such ease and grace that he seemed to take the audience by storm, and time and time again he was compelled to bow his acknowledgement of the applause. The concert closed with the true poem of Richard Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration," the most worthy of the celebrated composers symphonic poems.

The program was as follows:

Humperdinck—
Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel."
Dvorak—
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.
I. Adagio: Allegro molto.
II. Largo.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.
Lalo—
Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21.
I. Allegro non troppo.
IV. Andante.
V. Rondo: Allegro.
Richard Strauss—
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.

om NEWS

ldress Baltimore, Md.

ite

Boston Symphony

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater will be given tomorrow. The concert begins promptly at 8.15, and the soloist will be the famous Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. The program is as follows: Humperdinck—Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel." Dvorak—Symphony in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World." Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole for violin and orchestra. Strauss—Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Soloist, Mischa Elman.

k, 1884

ess BALTIMORE, MD.

JAN 11 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Tonight brings the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theater. The concert will begin promptly at 8:15 and the soloist will be the famous Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. The program is as follows: Humperdinck, prelude to "Hansel und Gretel;" Dvorak, symphony in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World;" Lalo, symphonie espagnole for violin and orchestra; Strauss, Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Soloist, Mischa Elman.

[138.]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau

ess

JAN 12 1911

'WAS A GREAT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra And Mischa Elman In Fine Form.

STRAUSS TONE POEM CHARMS

Young Violinist Gives The Lalo Spanish Symphony A Masterful Interpretation.

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held last evening at the Lyric, with Mischa Elman, violinist, as soloist. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel".....Humperdinck
Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.....Dvorak
I. Adagio: Allegro molto.
II. Largo.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.
Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21.....Lalo
I. Allegro non troppo.
IV. Andante.
V. Rondo: Allegro.
Tone-Poem—"Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.....Richard Strauss

Of all the Baltimore concerts that this magnificent organization has given under the direction of Mr. Fielder, the one of last evening was decidedly the best and most interesting. Firstly, the program was unusually well constructed and, secondly, Mr. Fielder and his orchestra interpreted the music as they have rarely done. They appeared to be almost under the influence of an inspiration. The balance and quality of tone were perfect, the emotional feeling was strongly in evidence, and the temperamental quality was exceptionally marked. And this not in one composition alone, but throughout the entire concert.

The symphony "From the New World" is well known here and has received all manners of interpretation, but never one so essentially satisfying as that of last night. And the work itself is so beautiful. Just as Dvorak in his national Bohemian compositions rarely adopted a ready-made tune, but created new melodies in folk-song form, so he has treated the melodic basis of this symphony. His motives are original while strongly tinged with characteristic features suggestive of the folk songs of this country. He has absorbed the local coloring and laid it on with the hand of a master in a free and lavish manner, always, however, retaining his own originality of conception and adhering to the atmosphere that surrounds the melodic inventions of the New World.

The orchestration is a pleasure to followers of both classic and modern schools, for while adhering closely to the orthodox symphonic form, he enriches his melodics with modern harmonies and with novel and effective modulations, exhibiting the while an astonishing freedom of tonality. It is, therefore, little wonder that the performance received an ovation.

Mischa Elman is a virtuoso grown from a prodigy and is now among the most marvelous violinists of the day. Technique he possesses to an unlimited extent, but his temperament overrides his perfection of technique, which he uses merely as a medium of expression. Although so young, it is scarcely credible that he can broaden out more in conception than at present, and his perception of tone values and musical expression is essentially artistic. The composition he selected is not of the most interesting and it was reserved for the last movement to really arouse popular admiration, but at the close he was recalled several times, and when he finally left the stage it came upon the audience that they had been listening to a young genius.

Appreciation of Strauss' music has been of short but steady growth, because difficult of comprehension, and those who have watched the steady growth will find food for thought in the enthusiastic nature of the reception of his work last evening. Owing to the extreme nature of the dissonanies he uses a conductor naturally concludes that these should be accentuated. M. Fielder, however, made them less prominent, by permitting the important theme, which invariably follows, to override the jarring sounds, thus smoothing over the harsh effects.

The opening section was given with peculiar emphasis, the aim evidently being to express the solemnity of death. In the remaining portions which follow, this would seem to be the central idea of the composer, until the entrance of the "Transfiguration" theme, when "Death was Swallowed up in Victory" and the idea of enlightenment dawning on the soul on its separation from the body is so finely suggested in the closing section of the composition.

After listening to the work few would be inclined to deny that Strauss is a great composer and Mr. Fiedler a great interpretor.

W. G. O.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau

STAR

m

ress

e JAN 7 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, the great Russian violinist, who already has been heard here twice with the Boston Symphony, last year and the year before, will be the soloist at its third concert to be given in the Lyric on next Wednesday evening, January 11. Elman has just returned to America and all of his early concerts are with the Boston Symphony.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
rom EVENING
Address
JAN 12 1911

NEWS
Baltimore, Md.

Mischa Elman

It is generally conceded that the drawing powers of an artist do not solely depend upon technical equipment, but are largely due to the influence of personality. Technical ability is the essential thing, but when temperament is added to this, and a soloist further possesses that rare attribute, personal magnetism, these combined authoritative qualifications then become instrumental in attracting great audiences.

This point was forcefully illustrated last night at the Lyric by Mischa Elman, and it can be said, without any disparagement of the artistic excellence of the Boston Orchestra, that doubtless it was Elman who brought the attendance at the third concert of the series to such vast proportions. However, aside from the popularity of this soloist, it must be admitted that an ideal program was offered, which in itself may have been the attraction for many.

Mr. Fiedler began the concert with the prelude to the fairy opera—"Hansel and Gretel," by Humperdinck. This delightful composition was played as a mark of respect to the composer in recognition of the furore recently created in New York by his new opera, "King's Children." Of course the prelude was well received, not only because of the prestige of Humperdinck, but through the charming nature and melodic simplicity of its music.

Dvorak's "New World" symphony followed the prelude. The impressive beauty, life and rhythmic action of the themes of this work were admirably set forth by the orchestra. Through the temperamental reading given to the score by Mr. Fiedler this symphony made an eloquent appeal to the audience.

The natural musical endowments of Mischa Elman in conjunction with his masterful ability as a violinist have long since become evident to the public at large, but last night this artist surpassed himself in the playing of Lalo's "Symphony Espagnole," and the audience witnessed a wonderful performance. Technically, Elman's playing was as near perfection as could be wished. His tone, which on former appearances has always been pure, refined and noble, was, on this occasion, even more so. The three movements which were played are effective not only for the solo violin, but also contain music of decided character.

The program closed with Richard Strauss' "God und Verklarung." The complexity of the music of this symphonic poem contrasted greatly with the simplicity of the opening number. The weird poem, upon which Strauss' work is based, has necessitated the use of music which at times is uncanny and gruesome, and yet it cannot be denied that many lovely phrases are in the composition. Opinions are divided as to its beauty. While some enjoyed the music in its entirety, others merely endured it.

In closing it must be mentioned that the woodwind horns and brass choirs did not play with their accustomed precision, and that faulty intonation was noticed in these sections of the orchestra. In the days of Herr Gericke and Dr. Muck such occurrences were rare. F. C. B.

so much how the orchestra plays as how the conductor makes it play. As the orchestra heard last evening is practically a perfect instrument, the interest of the occasion lay, of course, in seeing what Mr. Fiedler would do with it. He is, in many respects, a remarkably satisfactory conductor, whose work is marked by accent and usually by a splendid rhythmic sense. It has been said of him that he is not afraid of climaxes, but it was very apparent last evening that he gains his effects by the use of almost exaggerated "pianissimos," increasing the body of sound to little more than "normal," this giving the suggestion of great crescendos of sound without absolutely producing them. There was no blare of trumpets, no great sweep of violins. It was not until the Strauss number that one had any sense of broad emotional feeling in Mr. Fiedler's interpretation of the works he was conducting. It was impossible not to be impressed by a sense of that suppression for which the Boston school has always been so famous. It is doubtful if a more perfectly balanced, rich and warm orchestral coloring could be produced, but only in one instance did Mr. Fiedler seem to bring his musicians to great emotional heights.

He is so careful never to give voice to any particular choir of his band. It is all so exceedingly even. One felt this especially in the symphony. It was like a wonderful tapestry dimmed by time, rich and beautiful. But individual colors did not stand out. Perhaps this is the ideal after all, but when favorite bits and themes are too dim to be easily distinguished a sense of favorite value is lost. The "slow" movement of the symphony is probably the most popular and familiar—it is often heard on the organ—and this, the great test perhaps of the evening, was played with a real spirit. It often drags too much. But the failure to give voice to special instruments made for a certain muddiness in the more emotional portions of this wonderful Largo. The Strauss tone-poem, however, was given with the greatest breadth and emotional feeling. In this Mr. Fiedler really rose to great heights, giving this wonderful work a really masterful reading. It is marvelous music and takes one entirely out of oneself, so rich in suggestion is its atmosphere. Only once was there any sense of disappointment, and that because of the suppression of the gong at that fearsome moment of death. It was there, but it failed to clang out in that awful moment before the Transfiguration. It is a great moment with Richard Strauss wielding the baton. Last evening it seemed an emotional point lost.

The soloist of the evening was Mischa Elman, who was heard to especial advantage in the first, fourth and fifth movements of Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." These are most grateful numbers for the violin, and as the Boston Orchestra is one of the most perfect accompanying instruments in the world, the impression created by this number was deep and lasting. Mr. Elman is one of the most satisfactory concert violinists of the day. His tone is marvelously rich, his cantabile exquisite. His violin, deep-voiced almost as a viola, actually sings and sobs as he seems to pour his whole soul into it. That he has exquisite technical facility goes without saying. But his tone is so rich that he makes the "gymnastics" of the violin more than usually interesting. In the more appealing singing passages of the Lalo work, full of the suggestion of homesickness and wandering on endless plains, a real Romany suggestion, he moved his great audience to real enthusiasm and at the close was recalled again and again.

Another View Of Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program last night was of modern compositions which, from their very nature, their richness and warmth of tonal coloring, are essentially fitted for the exposition of the particular prowess of a great band like the Boston organization. Because this orchestra is to all intents and purposes a perfect instrument, unusually rich and full in its stringed choirs—it is doubtful if anywhere in the world one can hear such violins—so that it lends itself wondrously well to the interpretation of the modern writers. The classic composers are often heard to sufficient advantage in orchestras of smaller size, but it is only by a great company of musicians such as played last evening that such works as "Tod und Verklerung," for instance, can be given any adequate interpretation at all.

The prelude to "Haensel and Gretel" is by this time familiar to most music lovers. It is a charming work, full of grace and suggestion—one of those delightful bits of music that would be entirely beautiful in itself even though one did not know the fairy tale around which it was written and was unable to picture the children in the wood and recall, from having seen the operatic picture, their childish prayer and the lovely folk-song quality of their pleadings. Then, too, the "New World" symphony, with its barbaric suggestion, its curious Czech sadness and its insistent minor note, picturing so wonderfully the sadness of an exiled people in a strange land, is one of the delights of modern musical literature. In fact, it may be said to demonstrate in a rather remarkable way the transition between the period of "pure music," so-called—music demonstrating the pure joy of musical expression but having no special meaning of its own, and the ultra-modern period in which composers like Strauss are writing so much of what is known as "program music"—music that would convey no special meaning to those who hear it unless they know the story which it is intended to illustrate and express. The "New World" has merely a "subject." One can sit and listen to it and dream and picture exile and hopelessness and nervous joy. But whether the exiles are in America or Egypt or Siberia matters little. "Death and Transfiguration," on the other hand, has a distinct story to tell and tells it with marvelous sincerity. A man lies dying. He reviews his past life, its failures, successes and hopes, his horrible discouragements. Death comes and snaps the cord of his life. He passes out. Then come knowledge and the great light—music that is meaningless unless one follows it step by step with its particular "program."

It is in such a program as this, presented by an organization like the Boston Orchestra, that the greatest strength as well as some of the weaknesses of Mr. Fiedler's conducting are most clearly demonstrated. Because in the last analysis it lies entirely in the conductor's power either to make or mar. It is always to be remembered in receiving an impression of any concert that it is not

THIRD CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Fiedler Presents Attractive Program, Headed By Humperdinck.

Mr. Fiedler presented the following works at last evening's concert:

Humperdinck..Prelude to "Haensel und Gretel."
Dvorak..Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.
I. Adagio: Allegro molto.
II. Largo.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.
Lalo..Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21.
I. Allegro non troppo.
IV. Andante.
V. Rondo; Allegro.
Richard Strauss.....Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.

"Haensel und Gretel" has quite justly made Humperdinck's name honored in each and all of the world's musical communities. Few modern works, possessing sterling qualities, present them with such unalloyed purity and direct simplicity as does this fairy opera. It fascinates all unpolluted art natures, whether highly learned or untutored. Herr Humperdinck evidently loves children and nursery songs, and this deep regard must have guided his great technical skill in weaving them into a texture almost Schubertian in its mellow richness. The prelude which Mr. Fiedler performed last evening is the essence of the opera. It is like the aroma of a rose. We have heard it much better played. It sounded as if insufficiently rehearsed. The wood-wind often manifested a disregard of ensemble balance and euphony, producing undesirable and unintended effects. If properly blended, there is no harshness in the episodes intrusted to these instruments.

Mr. Fiedler made many parts of the "New World" symphony more interesting than one is wont to regard them; he indeed read the whole work as if thoroughly in sympathy with it. This symphony is too familiar to the public to warrant the restatement of detailed opinion as to its merits. It is sufficient to say to say that Dvorak in it shows marvelous routine and fertile technical invention, especially in his instrumental assignments and combinations, but it is more kaleidoscopically interesting than emotionally convincing.

The program gives 1875 as the year in which Lalo made public the "Spanish symphony." It is dedicated to Pablo de Sarasate, who was the first violinist to play it. The first performance was in Paris, and when the great Spanish virtuoso made his initial tour of Europe the Lalo symphony was his war horse. Leipzig was at that time (1876) the most influential musical center in the world—the measure of success achieved there often grading subsequent receptions in other towns. Sarasate and Sauret both made their German debuts at the Gewandhaus concerts during that season, the former with the Lalo and the latter with the Mendelssohn, and they both aroused unaccustomed enthusiasm. As music the most amiable critic could not pronounce the Spanish symphony great. It is interesting, and some of its episodes are beautiful, but its greatest virtue is its violinistic qualities. These latter are so marked that the work would doubtless be oftener performed were it not exceedingly difficult.

Elman's reading was musicianly, and his command of his instrument was astounding, but one felt that he was speaking an alien musical dialect. There is something far beyond technic and clear comprehension, some occult power which great artists sometimes exert when thoroughly in sympathy with their tasks. The great tragedian, Edwin Forrest, once recited the Lord's Prayer to a gathering of friends. When he finished there was silence and tears. One cannot analyze such diction. Elman, in the Tschaikowski, which he played on his first visit to Baltimore with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, manifested the possession of this occult power, but it was not in evidence last evening.

The Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" was well performed and brought an eventful evening to a heroic close.

O. B. B.

n ress ALTIMORE, MD
JAN 8 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mischa Elman, the great Russian violinist, who already has been heard here twice with the Boston Symphony, last year and the year before, will be the soloist at its third concert to be given in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, January 11. Elman has just returned to America and all of his early concerts are with the Boston Symphony, and it is certainly a noteworthy tribute not only to his station in his art, but to his popularity, that the Boston Orchestra is using him as soloist three consecutive years, thereby breaking all precedents. Elman here will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony, a work which, despite its name, is really a concerto and one of the most grateful pieces of its kind in the literature of the violin.

Appropriate to the holiday season, Mr. Fiedler begins his program with the prelude to Humperdinck's lovely fairy opera, "Hansel und Gretel," a prelude which contains some of the loveliest music in the music drama which follows, notably the dream music.

The symphony will be Dvorak's in E minor, No. 5, "From the New World." The final number on the program will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," a work which many regard as marking the highest point of Strauss' achievements.

n
ress EVENING SUN BALTIMORE, MD.
JAN 10 1911

THIRD CONCERT TOMORROW

Symphony Orchestra Will Be At Lyric, With Mischa Elman.

Tomorrow night brings the third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Lyric Theatre. It will begin promptly at 8.15 o'clock, and the soloist will be the famous Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. The program is as follows:

Prelude to "Hansel und Gretel," Humperdinck
Symphony in E Minor, No. 5, "From the New World".....Dvorak
Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra.....Lalo
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration".....Strauss

om COURANT
dress HARTFORD, CONN.
te JAN 10 1911

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second concert in the series of three will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Parsons Theater next Monday night. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the program Rachmaninoff's Second Symphony, a new work which has aroused great interest wherever performed and is certain to make a strong impression on local patrons of the famous Boston orchestra. It is a foregone conclusion that anything on one of Mr. Fiedler's programs is worthy of the organization and the audiences. The seat sale is at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
om COURANT
dress
te JAN 1 - 1911

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will play the following program at the Parsons Theatre Monday night:—

"Symphony in E minor," No. 2, Op. 27.....Rachmaninoff
I. Largo—Allegro moderato.
II. Allegro molto.
III. Adagio.
IV. Allegro vivace.
"Concerto in E minor for Violin," Op. 64.....Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo.
IV. Allegro molto vivace.
"Academic Festival Overture," Op. 80.....Brahms

Soloist—Mr. Anton Witek.

Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s.

Man's Meeting at Scenic Theater.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

n ....

ress PROVIDENCE R.I.

JAN 4 1911

Local Society

At Symphony Concert.

Infantry Hall held another large and brilliant audience at the third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the audience were Mrs. Edward Carrington, the Misses Sayles of Norwich, Conn., Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf. Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs, G. M. Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Mrs. Gertrude Child Barrows, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs Irving P. Irons, Mrs. William Von Gottschalk, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Auclaide Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Judge and Mrs. William H. Sweetland, Rev. and Mrs. Richard R. Graham, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Upham Pope, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mrs. Olney Arnold, Miss Linda Arnold, Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Fanny Alexander, Mrs. Frederick W. Allen, Mr. Richmond Allen, Prof. Lorenzo Sears, Miss Sophie Sears, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. Ernest C. Wilbur, Mr. G. A. Freeman, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mrs. James A. Coggeshall, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Roth, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Davis, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Helen Tyler Grant, Miss Edith Gyllenberg, Mr. and Mrs. Gene Ware.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

HARTFORD, CONN.

JAN 12 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Interest in the second Boston Symphony concert, which will be given at the Parsons Theater tomorrow night, centers in the appearance here as soloist of Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra. In securing Witek as successor to Willy Hess, the management seems to have shown its usual wisdom and to have had its usual good fortune, for, from all accounts Witek, to say the least, is as great a man as any who has occupied that very important post in the orchestra. For sixteen years he was concert-master and one of the principal soloists of the famous Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which post he left to come to this country last fall. He is a Bohemian, a graduate of the famous Conservatory of Prague and, despite his enormous experience, is still a young man, being on the right side of 40. Witek made a sensation when in his first appearance as soloist in Boston in October. Such enthusiasm is rarely seen in Symphony Hall as that which greeted his performances, both at the public rehearsal and the concert and it was freely said by men in the orchestra, the most exacting critics of all, that the Beethoven Concerto had never had a more perfect performance than that given it by the newcomer. He is remarkable for the purity and beauty of tone, his extraordinary intonation and his general musicianship, which takes the form of perfection in phrasing. Here he will play the Mendelssohn "Concerto" and a treat is looked forward to. Seats are on sale at Gallup & Co.'s music store.

m EVE. STAR

ress Washington, D. C.

e JAN 11 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It seemed as if all the music lovers of Washington were gathered under the roof of the National Theater yesterday afternoon for the third matinee of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And those who were there were well rewarded, for never has the orchestra presented a better program nor one more effectively rendered. The feature of the concert was the work of Mischa Elman, the soloist, as well as that of the orchestra, in the presentation of Lalo's beautiful Spanish symphony. But three movements were played—allegro non troppo, andante and rondo allegro—and the applause they evoked lasted for several minutes and ceased only with reluctance.

Handel's overture in D major, No. 1, was the opening number, followed by Beethoven's masterpiece of symphonies, the seventh. Humperdinck's "In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody," was the final number, and it was exquisitely played.

No organization of a musical character that comes to Washington stands higher in the appreciation of its music-loving public than Boston's famous symphony orchestra. The applause that greeted each movement of the numbers rendered yesterday afternoon was as unusual as it was well deserved.

From Courant Providence R.I.

Address

Date Jan 6 11

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AND MISCHA ELMAN

Together They Gave a Delightful Concert to an Enthusiastic Audience.

That the music-loving people of Providence are enthusiastic this season over the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts was very evident again last night when Infantry Hall was packed once more for the third of these events the present winter, despite the heavy rain and the bad walking. It was not only true that the weather had no effect in diminishing the size of the audience, but the number in attendance seemed even larger than at either of the preceding concerts. This was due undoubtedly to some extent to the fact that the soloist, was Mischa Elman, the celebrated violinist, but that it was primarily the orchestra itself that was the great attraction was evident by the close attention that was paid to its selections and the hearty applause that the musicians received for their work. Providence has shown unmistakably this year that it appreciates such music as is rendered by this orchestra and that it will brave the elements, however unpropitious they may be, to hear it.

Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, had arranged another well-balanced programme such as have marked all the concerts here this season. It opened with a beautiful prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel," passed to Dvorak's symphony, "From the New World," and closed with two selections by Jean Sibelius, a "Valse Triste," and "Finlandia." These numbers gave a variety that was agreeable and each was a gem. In some respects indeed this programme seemed more pleasing than any that has preceded it. There was not so much volume of sound, but a greater delicacy and fineness that was particularly enjoyable. The prelude is a piece of more modern music than is usually rendered at these concerts, but is considered one of the finest in recent operatic productions and as played by the orchestra last night was more than satisfying. The symphony, a Bohemian work, possesses a beauty of melody and a charm of composition that have made it one of the most popular in the whole field of symphonic literature, and it was rendered with rare delicacy and expression. The Finlandian selections that closed the programme were effectively contrasted, the valse being exquisite in its daintiness, while the "Finlandia," an expression of national spirit and life, is full of powerful appeal and strong patriotism.

Mr. Elman received an enthusiastic reception when he made his appearance on the platform and at the close of his number he was called out several times before the audience was satisfied with its expression of appreciation of his work. That he fully deserved all the applause that he received no one who has heard him will deny and it is sufficient to say that he was at his best last night. His selection, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," is admirably adapted to violin solo work and it was rendered with the brilliance of technique and the skill in winning from the instrument the beauty of tone of which it is capable that has given Mr. Elman the place he holds among violinists.

The fourth concert of the series will be given on the evening of Tuesday, Feb. 14.

The programme in detail follows:

Preludes to "Hansel und Gretel".....Humperdinck

Symphony No. 5, in E-minor, "From the New World," Op. 95.....Dvorak
I. Adagio: Allegro molto.
II. Largo.
III. Scherzo.
IV. Allegro con fuoco.

Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra. Op. 21.....Lalo
I. Allegro non troppo.
IV. Andante.
V. Rondo. Allegro.

(a) Valse triste, Op. 44.
(b) "Finlandia," Symphonic poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7.....Sibelius

om COURANT

dress

te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In several years no Boston performance by its famous symphony orchestra has aroused the genuine enthusiasm which greeted the first presentation of Rachmaninaff's "Second Symphony in E minor," opus 27, on October 14 of the present season. So great was its popularity that a repetition of the work was demanded two weeks later. Mr. Fiedler has therefore placed it on the program of the concert at the Parsons Theater, Monday evening, January 16, with the assurance that the Hartford public will be greatly impressed by this symphony which he terms "a wonderful work." The familiar and beautiful violin concerto by Mendelssohn will serve to introduce Anton Witek as solo violinist. His fitness to succeed Kneisel and Hess was demonstrated while concert-meister of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin under Arthur Nikisch, and his playing of Beethoven's violin concerto at a recent Boston concert established his place among great violinists in the esteem of the American musical public. The coming concert will doubtless prove a brilliant event. Seats are on sale at the music store of John M. Gallup & Co.

At Symphony Concert.

Infantry Hall held another large and brilliant audience at the third concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In the audience were Mrs. Edward Carrington, the Misses Sayles of Norwich, Conn., Mr. William B. Weeden, Mrs. Nathaniel Waite Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Metcalf. Col. and Mrs. H. Martin Brown, Col. and Mrs. Harvey A. Baker, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. G. M. Congdon, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, Mrs. Gertrude Child Barrows, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Mr. and Mrs. Seeber Edwards, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs Irving P. Irons, Mrs. William Von Gottschalk, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Auclaide Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Judge and Mrs. William H. Sweetland, Rev. and Mrs. Richard R. Graham, Mr. and Mrs. Otis Clapp, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Upham Pope, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mrs. Olney Arnold, Miss Linda Arnold, Miss Edith Kimball, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Fanny Alexander, Mrs. Frederick W. Allen, Mr. Richmond Allen, Prof. Lorenzo Sears, Miss Sophie Sears, Mrs. Oscar Lapham, Mr. Ernest C. Wilbur, Mr. G. A. Freeman, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Mr. and Mrs. Charles O. Read, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Mrs. James A. Coggeshall, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Henry W. Roth, Dr. W. Louis Chapman, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Davis, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Miss Helen Tyler Grant, Miss Edith Gyllenberg, Mr. and Mrs. Gene Ware.

n HERALD

ress Washington, D. C.

e JAN 11 1911

SCORES IN CONCERT

Mischa Elman Triumphs in Excellent Programme.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA A HIT

Third of Season's Series of Concerts by Boston Organization, with Noted Violinist as Soloist, Is Heard by an Audience that Taxes the Capacity of the Theater.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conducting, scored a triumph yesterday afternoon at its third concert of the season at the New National Theater. Mischa Elman, violinist. was the soloist. Hundreds of people were turned away from the doors, as the last bit of standing room was sold before the first number of the orchestra began.

The opening number was Handel's Overture in D major, a concert overture, the form of music in vogue in the eighteenth century, but not necessarily belonging to an opera. The second number was Beethoven's seventh symphony. This was given with a seriousness, artistic finish, and a depth of soulfulness which entirely satisfied the most exacting musician. The perfect balance of the orchestra and the deep appreciation of the master's thoughts and temperament were voiced throughout this work. The last two moments showed temperament and refinement, and the Boston Symphony never showed itself to better advantage than in this work.

Interest centered on the Beethoven Symphony, the violin solos, by Lalo, and the Humperdinck music, "In a Moorish Cafe," from a "Moorish Rhapsody."

Scores Personal Triumph.

Elman's work in the Lalo Spanish Symphony, for violin and orchestra, only added to laurels already won. His tone is wonderful, and he throws off double sixths and harmonics as though they were but waste efforts. There is as much color in his tone as though he were painting in oils instead of on violin strings, and he depicts the human sentiments.

No less praise may be given the orchestra in its wonderful accompaniments, which never dominated and never lagged. The Spanish Symphony is a most interesting work throughout, and there was a very perceptible smile of satisfaction among those familiar with the well-known "La Paloma" when suspiciously similar strains in the second part were exquisitely given.

It is not often that any soloist receives such an ovation as did Mischa Elman after the completion of this work, but there was no breaking of a Boston Symphony rule of no encores, and he returned several times to bow his acknowledgments.

Mr. Fiedler made more friends and admirers yesterday than he had before. No one, not even the most unreasonable of musicians, could accuse him of lack of temperament. This is a thing which is not acquired, but it does grow to greater proportions. If he seemed not to have it last year, it does not mean that it was missing from his make-up. He is in closer touch with his players, no doubt, this season than he was last, and has greater authority over them; in fact, he dominates them.

From POST

Address Washington, D. C.

Date JAN 11 1911

ENTHUSIASM FOR ELMAN.

Young Violinist Receives Great Demonstration at Boston Symphony.

Never before in Washington has the art of Mischa Elman, the 19-year old master violinist, of Russia, been so brilliantly demonstrated as at the season's third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the National Theater yesterday afternoon. The composition selected for the exposition of his wonderful technical skill and sympathetic interpretation was Edouard Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra. It was this work which Elman was to have played when he was in Washington with the Boston Orchestra last January, on which occasion the program was unexpectedly changed and Dvorak's concerto in A minor was given. Only three movements of the symphony were given yesterday—the first, fourth, and fifth, and it seemed for a while as if the orchestra would be forced to violate its rule against encores and allow the young musician to give the other two movements. It was fully five minutes before the enthusiastic audience would permit Director Fiedler to proceed with the program. The andante movement in which the solo instrument has the chief theme was especially beautiful. The full, rich tones of the violin touched the inner being of the auditors and the emotional appeal of the less florid strains was irresistible.

The symphony for the afternoon was one of the monumental works of that master of the symphony, Beethoven—the Seventh. The program, happily, did not give an ironclad interpretation of the meaning of the music, and the audience, therefore, was relieved of the customary self-imposed task of trying to read a picture in each theme. There was a complete surrender to the charm of the music as music sufficient unto itself. And what a delightful privilege it was to receive unfettered those wonderful harmonies—that rythmic dance of the wood winds in the first movement, that stately measure of the cellos and double basses in the second, and the great outburst of joy from the whole orchestra in the fourth.

Handel's overture in D major, No. 1, in two movements, was the opening number on the program, and a movement or scene from Humperdinck's "A Moorish Rhapsody" was the concluding selection. The latter was of especial interest owing to the prominence of the composer just at this time in connection with the successful production of his new opera, "Koenigskinder," at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, several weeks ago. The title of the scene so picturesquely interpretated yesterday is, "In a Moorish Cafe," in which the habitues from time to time throw off the lethal atmosphere of the place and cry out for their lost Seville and their conquered Granada—all graphically depicted by the music.

Director Fiedler is rapidly emerging from his academic and unimpassioned methods of last season. His readings yesterday were far more sympathetic and full of vigor than at any previous concert, a change which is fully appreciated by the patrons of the Boston Symphony. There was not a vacant seat in the theater yesterday and the standing room space was comfortably filled.

R. G.

TIMES

ess Washington, D. C.

JAN 11 1911

Symphony Concert Draws Large Attendance.

A large and fashionable audience attended the Boston Symphony concert at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon.

Mrs. Taft occupied the Presidential box and was accompanied by Mrs. Nagel, wife of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; Mrs. Charles W. Rae, the Misses Anderson, of Cincinnati, and Miss Helen Taft.

In the box directly opposite the one occupied by Mrs. Taft and her party, Mrs. C. A. Williams entertained a party, including Mrs. Sherman, wife of the Vice President; the Netherlands Minister and Mme. Loudon, and Miss Williams.

The British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce's niece, Miss Ashton, Mrs. Ballinger, wife of the Secretary of the Interior, Dr. and Mrs. Buckner Randolph, and Miss Dorothy Williams, occupied Mrs. Leiter's box.

The German Ambassador and Countess von Bernstorff, Representative and Mrs. Longworth, and Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge were the guests of Mrs. Gardner, wife of Representative A. P. Gardner.

With Mrs. McMillan in her box were her son-in-law and daughter, Sir John and Lady Harrington, and Mrs. Townsend.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Mandeville Carlisle and Miss Mary Carlisle accompanied Mrs. Calderon Carlisle.

Mr. and Mrs. A Lisner entertained a party in their box.

Among others in the audience were Mrs. Beekman Winthrop, wife of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy; Mrs. William F. Harlan, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Nelson Page, the Rev. Dr. and Mrs. McKim, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. Archibald Hopkins, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Dennis, Mrs. Charles Nelson Riker, Mrs. G. Bowie Chipman, Mrs. Walcott, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, and her house guests, the Rev. and Mrs. Booth Fisher, Mrs. Audenreid, Mrs. S. T. Davis, Miss Harlan, Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, Mrs. Hagner, Miss Yvonne Townsend, the Misses Lee, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Hinckley, Mrs. Hennen Jennings, Miss Jennings, Miss Katherine Jennings, Mr. and Mrs. Emmons, and William Bowie Clarke.

[140]

TIMES

Washington, D. C.

JAN 11 1911

ELMAN AS SOLOIST WARMLY WELCOMED

Violinist Appears at Concert of Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Even the brilliant virtuoso, Mischa Elman, must divide honors when he appears on the program with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and though that young violinist's coming probably accounted for a portion of the crowd that forced late comers to buy standing room at the National Theater yesterday afternoon, the playing of Beethoven's "Seventh Symphony" will be remembered long by music lovers who listened to its interpretation under the direction of Max Fiedler.

Elman has sometimes been accused of a leaning toward pyrotechnics at the expense of a thorough mastery of his instrument. He sounded all the possibilities of the violin demanded by Lalo's Spanish symphony. His facile technique was scarcely less noteworthy than the imagination he displayed in his interpretation of this number. The first, fourth, and fifth parts of the symphony were played, and the concluding Rondo made such an impression on the audience that it was nearly five minutes before the orchestra could proceed with the next selection.

No orchestra that visits Washington is better able to play Beethoven compositions than the Boston organization and the orchestra won added prestige by the rendition of that masterpiece of instrumental music, the Seventh Symphony. Despite his accustomed conservatism Max Fiedler defied a number of traditions in conducting this well-known composition, and the results were attested by an ovation as genuine if not quite so demonstrative as that accorded the young violinist.

The first movement again proved that no small part of the Fielder orchestra's success is attributable to capable woodwind artists. These instruments take up a slow dance theme which is developed into a swinging fantasia in which the melody is alternately repeated by the strings. None of the succeeding three parts exceeded in exquisite coloring and depth of imagination the passages of the early portion of the symphony.

In happy contrast were the opening and closing numbers of the program. Handel's overture in D major was given with as much feeling as this severely classical composition of an early musical school would allow. The eloquently descriptive "In a Moorish Cafe," of Humperdinck, brought the program to a

J. R. HILDEBRAND.

POST

Washington, D. C.

JAN - 8 1911

National—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony Concert, which will be given in the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, January 10, will bring as soloist the greatest of Russian violinists, Mischa Elman. This will be the third consecutive season in which this remarkable artist has appeared here with the Boston Symphony. Here, on Tuesday afternoon, he will play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." Mr. Fielder offers nothing new or startling in the orchestral selections. The concert will begin with an overture by Handel in D major. This is in two short movements, and emphasizes the fact that when Handel lived and flourished an overture did not necessarily mean what it does today, that is, a prelude to an opera or music drama. The symphony will be Beethoven's in A major No. 7, which Richard Wagner once called "the apotheosis of the dance."

The last number on the program will be by Engelbert Humperdinck, who is just now so much in the public eye, owing to the recent performance in New York, for the first time on any stage, of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder." A number of years ago, while he was a resident of Spain, he wrote a "Moorish Rhapsody," in which with extraordinary success he pictures the oriental colors of Morocco, where he spent considerable time. Mr. Fielder will play the second movement of this suite, which is entitled "Tangier—A Night in a Moorish Cafe."

HERALD

Washington, D. C

JAN - 8 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, January 10, will bring as soloist the greatest of Russian violinists, Mischa Elman. This will be the third consecutive season in which this remarkable artist has appeared here with the Boston Symphony. He will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony, one of the finest works written for solo violin and orchestra, and the peculiar qualities of Elman's playing, notably his extraordinarily rich and luscious tone, are displayed at their best in this work.

Mr. Fiedler offers nothing new nor startling in the orchestral selections. The concert will begin with an overture by Handel in D major. The symphony will be Beethoven's in A major, No. 7, which Richard Wagner once called "the apotheosis of the dance." This and its successor, the eighth, are the two works of Beethoven in which the great composer showed the genial side of his nature, although, curiously enough, the seventh was written during one of the most unhappy periods of his life. Mr. Fiedler is particularly fortunate in his reading of the symphony, which has attracted much attention wherever he has played it.

The last number on the programme will be by Engelbert Humperdinck, who is just now so much in the public eye, owing to the recent performance in New York for the first time on any stage of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder." A number of years ago, while he was a resident of Spain, he wrote a Moorish rhapsody, in which with extraordinary success he pictures the Oriental colors of Morocco, where he spent considerable time. Mr. Fiedler will play the second movement of this suite, which is entitled "Tangier—a night in a Moorish Cafe."

TIMES

Washington, D. C.

JAN - 8 191

MISCHA ELMAN TO PLAY IN CAPITAL

Great Russian Violinist Comes With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon, January 10, will bring as soloist the greatest of Russian violinists, Mischa Elman.

This will be the third consecutive season in which this remarkable artist has appeared here with the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Fiedler offers nothing new nor startling in the orchestral selections. The concert will begin with an overture by Handel in D major.

The symphony will be Beethoven's in A major, No. 7, which Richard Wagner once called "the apotheosis of the dance."

The last number on the program will be by Engelbert Humperdinck, who is just now so much in the public eye, owing to the recent performance in New York for the first time on any stage of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder." A number of years ago, while he was a resident of Spain, he wrote a "Moorish Rhapsody," in which with extraordinary success he pictures the oriental colors of Morocco, where he spent considerable time. Mr. Fiedler will play the second movement of this suite, which is entitled "Tangier—A Night in a Moorish Cafe."

The program in its proper order is as follows:

Handel—Overture in D Major, No. 1.
Beethoven—Symphony in A Major, No. 7, Op. 92.
Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra, Opus. 21.
Humperdinck—"In a Moorish Cafe," from "A Moorish Rhapsody."
Soloist—Mischa Elman.

EVE. STAR

Washington, D. C.

JAN - 8 191

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third Boston Symphony concert which will be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, January 10, will bring as soloist the Russian violinist, Mischa Elman. This will be the third consecutive season in which this remarkable artist has appeared here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Elman, when he first came to America two years ago, brought with him a great reputation as a young violinist, and one of the most notable things about him has been his constant growth as a musician. Tuesday afternoon he will play Lalo's Spanish Symphony. Though full recognition of his high talent as a composer never came to him during his life, Lalo is now placed among the really great men of France. The Spanish Symphony is one of the finest works written for solo violin and orchestra and the peculiar qualities of Elman's playing are displayed at their best in this work.

The concert will begin with an overture by Handel in D Major. This is in two short movements and emphasizes the fact that when Handel lived and flourished an overture did not necessarily mean what it does today, that is, a prelude to an opera or music drama.

The symphony will be Beethoven's in "A Major No. 7," which Richard Wagner once called "the apotheosis of the dance."

The last number of the program will be by Engelbert Humperdinck, who is just now so much in the public eye owing to the recent performance in New York for the first time on any stage of his new opera, "Die Koenigskinder." A number of years ago, while he was a resident of Spain, he wrote a "Moorish Rhapsody," in which with extraordinary success he pictures the oriental colors of Morocco, where he spent considerable time. Mr. Fiedler will play the second movement of this suite, which is entitled "Tangier: A Night in a Moorish Cafe."

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Concert

The Boston Symphony will give its January concert under the direction of the admirable Max Fiedler, in the Academy of Music, tomorrow evening. Mischa Elman, the young Russian violinist, will be the soloist. He will be heard in Edouard Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." The orchestra will play Haendel's overture in D major, No. 1, arranged by Franz Wuellner, the father of Dr. Ludwig Wuellner; the Strauss tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and the imperishable Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

This will be the program in full:

Handel.....Overture in D major, No. 1
Beethoven.....Symphony in A major, No. 7
Lalo.....Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra
Strauss
Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration"
Soloist, Mischa Elman

EVE. TELEGRAPH

Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the present season, at the Academy of Music last night, was an extraordinary event. Max Fiedler had arranged a programme magnificently balanced and proportioned, that passed through all possible moods of feeling, leading to a superb climax. The program included Handel's Overture in D major, Beethoven's Symphony in A major No. 7, the "Spanish" Symphony for violin and orchestra by Edouard Lalo, and the now famous tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," of Richard Strauss. Max Fiedler himself was at his best, and the band played with a rare perfection. It is altogether possible that no small part of this inspiration was due to Mischa Elman, whose incomparable performance met with an ovation. Greater technical skill than this genius of the violin possesses can scarce be imagined, while at the same time there was a revelation of feeling and maturity that was astounding. No violinist has appeared in this generation of more prodigious capacity, and during the performance of the symphony his audience was spellbound in admiration of the music of violin and orchestra alike, and in fascinated wonder at this wizard of one, of harmonies, of trills and of musical emotion. Ordinary language fails utterly to describe this most unusual phenomenon, as well as the reception that was accorded the young Russian.

The orchestra played the Handel selection with great breadth and dignity, and met all the demands of the Beethoven number with astonishing facility and felicity; the presto and the allegro movements that move along with Bacchic frenzy present enormous difficulties, but only to demonstrate the supreme superiority of this organization. The final number was an admirable selection that was in perfect accord, emotionally and intellectually, with the program that preceded, completing the mood of exaltation in the most serious of veins. Altogether the evening was a most notable one for performers and audience alike, one of historic importance for the old Academy, the scene of so many musical triumphs.

EVE. BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

The Boston Symphony Concert

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit to Philadelphia this season next Monday evening, when Mischa Elman, the violinist will be the soloist. Elman returned to America just before Christmas, and his only appearances thus far have been with the Boston orchestra, it being claimed that he has grown greatly in an artistic sense even in the short time that he has been away from this country, and it is doubtful if he has an equal to-day as a violinist. He will play next Monday evening, for the first time here, Lalo's Symphonie Espagnol, a work which is said to be most grateful to the soloist and to make great demands upon his technical equipment. The symphony that Mr. Fiedler has chosen is Beethoven's No. 7, in A major. The program will begin with Handel's Overture in D-major, No. 1, which has been arranged by Franz Wullner, the father of Dr. Wullner, the famous singer of songs. The overture is one of a series of concert compositions by Handel, and differs from the fixed overture of the day by having no closing minuet movement. In arranging it for modern use, Wullner did much in the way of filling out the bare places in Handel's original score, the gaps which Handel himself would have filled up with an improvised accompaniment on the harpsichord. The final number will be Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration."

RECORD

PHILADELPHIA PA

ELMAN GIVEN OVATION

Young Violinist Welcomed by Great Crowd of Music-Lovers.

The sensation caused in this country last season by the phenomenal violin playing of Mischa Elman, the young Russian, has by no means died. The scene in the Academy of Music, where two years ago he made his Philadelphia debut with the Boston Orchestra, and where last evening he was again heard with that musical body, closely paralelled the earlier occasion. The reappearance of Elman equaled in interest, if it did not surpass in emphasis, the welcome given this fascinating young artist at that time. Then he played Tschaikowsky's Concerto. Last night it was Lalo's "Spanish Symphony." These details apart, the same scene was enacted. The same rapt attention, the same wonderfully vital and expressive playing, and, sad to say, the same endless and fruitless applause, terminating in sensations of disappointment, sickening and discouraging, no less to those favored mortals who have ample opportunities of hearing Elman than to those less fortunate who stood from before 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon until the opening of the Academy of Music doors, were repeated. At 8 o'clock several hundred persons were turned away from the doors with the announcement that even then the capacity of the house had been overtaxed.

It is frequently said that Philadelphia is not a city appreciative of violinists, but when an Elman comes to town the statement no longer holds good. He, at least, has met with the keenest appreciation here. He was in fine form last night and he played with all the fire, poetry and exquisite finish which blend so happily and unusually in him. His advent on the platform caused a storm of applause, which was renewed after it had entirely subsided. Elman is singularly ill at ease while not playing, for although not awkwardly so, he is apparently unable to stand with equanimity the gaze of an audience. The instant he begins to play, however, he is an entirely different being. He makes no effort to conceal the fact that his music affects him fully as much as it does his listeners. He is a wonderfully temperamental player. This fact, with his great full rich tone, and his superb technical mastery of the instrument, could not fail to produce a combination irresistible and awe-inspiring.

The program of the orchestra was of exceptional interest. The Handel "Overture" with it's bright fugue and general air of the antique was beautifully played. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 7, in A major, at once the most ideally rhythmic, romantic and cheerful of all of the master's symphonies. Despite the efforts of modern annotators to read detailed meaning into the work it must remain absolute music in its purest form. Any symphonic writing which will admit of such opposite interpretations as those bestowed by Berlioz, who saw in it a rustic wedding; Marx, Moorish knighthood; Oulibichaff, a masked ball, and Wagner, the apotheosis of the dance, can safely be permitted to reach the public without any particular tag or brand of meaning. It is of never-failing interest and contains all the essentials of a true music that must make an everlasting appeal.

The program was concluded by an interpretation of Strauss' tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

PRESS

Philadelphia, Pa.

* * *

The third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia occurs to-morrow (Monday) evening, when, with Mischa Elman as its soloist, it gives its usual January concert in the Academy of Music. Elman, as already announced, is to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. As it is the first time he will have played this in Philadelphia his performance will be awaited with much interest, for the work is one that is most grateful to the soloist and makes great demands upon his technical equipment.

Elman returned to America just before Christmas and his only appearances so far have been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has a number of engagements. Those who heard him play in Providence the first of this month were astonished to see that this remarkable youth has grown greatly even in the short time that he has been away from the country. He has no superior to-day and it will not be long before he may safely be assured that he will have no rivals.

The symphony that Mr. Fiedler has chosen is Beethoven's No. 7, in A major. The program will begin with Handel's overture in D major, No. 1, which has been arranged by Franz Wullner, the father of Dr. Wullner, the celebrated singer of songs. Musical terms change with time as well as other things. The term overture, for instance, originally meant, as it does now, the musical introduction to an opera or drama, but in Handel's day it was also applied to the first movement in a suite or a partita, in general, to any instrumental composition in the then prelude-overture form. This overture is one of a series of concert compositions by Handel and differs from the fixed overture form of the day by having no closing minuet movement.

The final number will be Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." The program in order is as follows:—

Handel.....Overture in D Major No. 1
Beethoven.....Symphony in A Major No. 7
Lalo..Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra.
Strauss..Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

[141]

om EVE. BULLETIN
dress Philadelphia, Pa.
te

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Third Concert of Season, With Elman as Soloist

Mischa Elman and his violin were the real features of last night's Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, the third of the season. An audience which packed the Academy of Music "from pit to dome," greeted the young Russian soloist and gave him a welcome which indicated thoroughly how much bottled-up appreciation of his masterly work was awaiting him. Elman's performance gave those of his hearers who were inclined to be critical a decided sense of pleasure. He has improved greatly. There is a finer depth of feeling in his work, a keener appreciation of his score and a decision of tone that were not so apparent in his last performances here. The work he chose for his solo was Lalo's difficult "Symphony Espagnol." It was splendidly played. None of its technical intricacies was too great for the young violinist, nor were its tenderer passages deprived of any of their beauty. Taken by and large, Elman displayed an astonishing virtuosity. He is rapidly rising to the front rank of violin players.

The balance of the program was given in a truly Boston Symphony Orchestra style. The first number was a Handel overture—No. 1, in D Major. The work is rather thin compared with modern orchestral compositions, but what it lacks in volume it makes up in beauty and dignity.

The symphony of the evening was Beethoven's Seventh, a prime favorite with symphony lovers. Mr. Fiedler gave it his usual masterly reading, bringing forth all of its beauties of melody and harmony. The concert ended with Richard Strauss's love poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The work is so well-known that it needs no comment so far as it is concerned as a composition. Fiedler and his musicians got from its broken rhythms and insincere melody all that was to be gotten.

[illegible]AY, JANUA

INQUIRER
ss Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia occurs tomorrow evening, when, with Mischa Elman as its soloist, it gives its usual January concert in the Academy of Music. Elman, as already announced, is to play Lalo's Symphonic Espagnole. The program will begin with Handel's overture in D major, No. 1, which has been arranged by Franz Wullner, the father of Dr. Wullner, the celebrated singer of songs. Musical terms change with time as well as other things. The term overture, for instance, originally meant, as it does now, the musical introduction to an opera or drama, but in Handel's day it was also applied to the first movement in a suite or, in general, to any instrumental composition in the then prelude-overture form. In arranging this for modern use Wullner did much in the way of filling out the bare places in Handel's original score, according to the continuo—gaps which Handel himself would have filled up with an improvised accompaniment on the harpsichord. The final number will be Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration." The program in order is as follows:

Handel .....Overture in D-Major No. 1
Beethoven .....Symphony in A-Major No. 7
Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra.
Strauss—Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

[illegible] Society

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
m reas
e

The third concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia will be given tomorrow evening at the Academy of Music, with Mischa Elman as soloist. He will play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole for the first time here. Elman returned to America just before Christmas, and his only appearances thus far have been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has a number of engagements. The Symphony that Fiedler has chosen is Beethoven's No. 7, in A Major. The program will begin with Handel's overture in D Major, No. 1, which has been arranged by Franz Wuellner, the father of Dr. Wuellner, the celebrated Lieder singer. Musical terms change with time as well as other things. This overture is one of a series of concert compositions by Handel, and differs from the fixed overture form of the day by having no closing minuet movement. In arranging this for modern use Wuellner did much in the way of filling out the bare places in Handel's original score, according to the continuo—gaps which Handel himself would have filled up with an improvised accompaniment on the harpsichord. The final number will be Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

* * *

PRESS
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

THIRD BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Beethoven's Delightful A Major, No. 7, the Symphony.

MISCHA ELMAN THE SOLOIST

Program.

Handel.....Overture in D major, No. 1
Beethoven..Symphony in A major, No. 7. Op. 92.
Lalo..Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, Op. 21.
Richard Strauss..Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.
Soloist ..... Mischa Elman

The third of the Boston Symphony's orchestral concerts at the Academy of Music was given last evening, with Mischa Elman as soloist. The program was sufficiently varied to give the orchestra and Director Fiedler abundant opportunity to show their power to its very best advantage.

When Mr. Fiedler bowed his acknowledgment of the applause that greeted his entry, he found not a bit of space unoccupied in the large Academy. It was a tribute of appreciation, such as the conductor has experienced on previous occasions, but at no concert that he has directed in this city, was his efforts appreciated more heartily than last evening. This was especially shown after his fine reading of the Beethoven Symphony, but it was also evidenced after each of the three numbers in which the orchestra engaged alone. The soloist was given the usual Elman ovation, another evidence that the young violinist enjoys a reputation in this city second to no other concert artist who plays at the Academy.

The opening number of the program, Handel's Overture in D Major, No. 1, is almost a stranger to Philadelphia. It is a somber work, but expresses its solemn message with clarity, and although only too brief, considering its strong musical appeal, it is an especially fine and dignified number for the opening of a concert.

The Symphony was Beethoven's Seventh, one of the most lovable of the immortal nine. It is a great favorite in this city, and with each rehearing new beauties seem to develop. In this seventh the composer seems to have, unconsciously, no doubt, succeeded in veiling certain of its beauties which are only more apparent with a greater familiarity. It might seem unnecessary to speak thus of a work so well known, but Mr. Fiedler's masterly reading of the Symphony last evening added to its charm and gave it a newness that was thoroughly delightful. He brought out a something, at times, that even the close student of Beethoven must have realized that he had previously failed to appreciate.

Last evening was Elman's first appearance in Philadelphia this season. He has aged considerably in appearance from the boy violinist of only a short time ago, but his art shows an equal advance in maturity. Last evening he played Lalo's difficult "Symphony Espagnole" with the authority of a master, with graceful charm in the andante, and a brilliancy and dash in the finale. The young violinist lacked nothing that could have added to his performance. The little dapper oddities of the boy have been replaced with more sincerity and soul in his work. In tone quality his play was superb. He was perfection in harmony. In execution and in expression and shading his violin conveyed every particle of tone in the great work. It is doubtful if a more genuine expression of approval could be given an artist than Elman received at its finish.

The last number on the program was Strauss' Tone Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," which is one of the finest descriptive pieces in the long list of compositions of its character, and it was admirably given by the orchestra.

Elman will give a recital at the Academy on Wednesday afternoon, January 25, and the fourth Boston Symphony Concert will take place on Monday evening, February 20, with Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist, as soloist.

PUBLIC LEDGER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" will be the principal work on the fourth Boston Symphony programme which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 20th, at 8.15, under the leadership of Max Fiedler. The soloist in this work will be Heinrich Warnke, alternate principal 'cellist of the orchestra. The second half of the programme will be devoted entirely to Wagner, the Funeral Music from "The Dusk of the Gods," the "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

It is interesting to note that the first and third of the Wagner numbers mentioned are identical with the selections which Mr. Pohlig is to offer at the concerts of February 10 and 11.

* * *

NORTH AMERICAN
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

MISCHA ELMAN WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Boy Violinist Appears Here for First Time This Season

7TH SYMPHONY HEARD

By H. T. Craven

BEETHOVEN has no more eloquent body of interpreters in this country than the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the authoritative baton of Max Fiedler. This perfectly balanced organization gave its third concert of the season in the Academy of Music last evening, offering one of the supreme masterpieces of instrumental art, Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

The musical year seldom passes without the incorporation of this work on some orchestral program, but the Boston players have not until last night revealed its beauties for a considerable time.

Mr. Fiedler's conservative, yet virile, and when occasion demands, brilliantly assertive, methods were revealed at many points of an admirable impressive, even poetically imaginative, reading. The melodious allegretto, with its march-like theme, oddly suggestive of an anticipatory "Pilgrims' Chorus," was given an expression of singular and potent beauty. The dashing rendo of the fourth movement brought the work to a stirring conclusion.

The virtuosity of the orchestra was constantly in evidence, but in nothing more strikingly than in the eloquence of the wood winds, in which field the Boston organization is supplied with such consummate artists.

Mischa Elman, who has not been heard here yet this winter, was the soloist. Without sounding all the possibilities of his instrument, for this performer is yet a boy, Mr. Elman's violin playing is endowed with many charming graces. He has a fluent and supple technique. His tone is clear and true, his command of pyrotechnics has the comforting assurance of ease. His superficial excellence, it must be confessed, bears sometimes the stamp of the obviously sensational, a circumstance which has materially advanced his popularity.

His appeal to the concert-going public is exceedingly potent. It was emphasized once more last evening after his rendition of Lalo's melodious and well-written "Symphonie Espagnole," when he was rapturously applauded. The work is suitable to his attainments and quite within the range of his artistic horizon.

An effective musical antithesis was furnished by the opening and closing numbers of the program. Haendel's overture in D major, impregnated with the simplicity of eighteenth century music, came first, and modern polyphony was vividly represented by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," which was the closing selection.

EVE. TELEGRAPH
38 Philadelphia, Pa.

Club is set for Wednesday.

THE third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Philadelphia occurs Monday evening when it gives the usual January concert in the Academy of Music. Mischa Elman, the soloist, is to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. The work is one that is most grateful to the soloist and makes great demands upon his technical equipment. This will be the first time he has played it in Philadelphia. The symphony that Mr. Fiedler has chosen is Beethoven's No. 7, in A major. The program will begin with Handel's Overture in D major No. 1, which has been arranged by Franz Wullner, the father of Dr. Wullner, the celebrated singer of songs. Musical terms change with time as well as other things. The term overture, for instance, originally meant, as it does now, the musical introduction to an opera or drama, but in Handel's day it was also applied to the first movement in a suite or a partita, in general, to any instrumental composition in the then prelude-overture form. This overture is one of a series of concert compositions by Handel and differs from the fixed overture form of the day by having no closing minuet movement. In arranging this for modern use Wullner did much in the way of filling out the bare places in Handel's original score, according to the continuo—gaps which Handel himself would have filled up with an improvised accompaniment on the harpsichord. The final number will be Richard Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

EVE. BULLETIN
ss Philadelphia, Pa.
JAN 6 1911

ENCORES AT SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Mr. Pohlig, of the Philadelphia Orchestra, some time ago came to the conclusion that the rule forbidding extra numbers on the part of soloists who appear at the concerts under his direction, was not a wise one—or, at least, that the time for rigidly enforcing it is not yet at hand—and patrons of the local orchestra now are permitted to have their desire for an additional selection, when a popular soloist appears, gratified without undue applause to express their wishes.

At the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, however, the conductor, Mr. Fiedler, steadily refuses to make any concession in the way of "encores." At the first Boston Orchestra concert this season, when Madame Melba made her appearance after an absence of two years, and when she undoubtedly was the "magnet" that filled the Academy of Music and caused many people to be turned away, Mr. Fiedler refused to permit her, willing as she herself appeared to be, to sing one of the simpler songs, in addition to the two operatic selections that constituted her part of the program, for which the audience made a clamorous demand. The tumult was such that the "symmetry of the program," which the conductor wished to preserve, was much more seriously disturbed than it would have been had the very reasonable request of the audience been granted.

There was a similar demonstration at the second concert of the Boston musicians, when Josef Hofmann, the pianist, was the solo performer, but it was again without avail. There are times, to be sure, when the "encore fiends" so called, are too persistent and become obnoxious, but also there are occasions when they have their rights, and when the determination to down them results in a feeling that is not altogether pleasant.

Mr. Pohlig has found an agreeable way of solving the problem in a manner satisfying to them and at the same time duly mindful of the dignity of the orchestra.

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

The third visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia occurs tomorrow evening, when with Mischa Elman as its soloist it gives its usual January concert in the Academy of Music, the concert beginning at 8:15. Elman, as already announced, is to play Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole. As it is the first time he will have played this in Philadelphia his performance will be awaited with much interest, for the work is one that is most grateful to the soloist and makes great demands upon his technical equipment. Elman returned to America just before Christmas, and his only appearances so far have been with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has a number of engagements. Those who heard him play in Providence the first of this month were astonished to see that this remarkable youth has grown greatly even in the short time that he has been away from this country.

The symphony that Mr. Fiedler has chosen is Beethoven's No. 7,

The programme will begin with Handel's Overture in D Major, No. 1, which has been arranged by Franz Wullner, the father of Doctor Wullner, the celebrated lieder-singer. Musical terms change with time, as well as other things. The term overture, for instance, originally meant, as it does now, the musical introduction to an opera or drama, but in Handel's day it was also applied to the first movement in a suite or a partita, in general, to any instrumental composition in the then prelude-overture form. This overture is one of a series of concert compositions by Handel, and differs from the fixed overture form of the day by having no closing minuet movement. In arranging this work for modern use Wullner did much in the way of filling out the bare places in Handel's original score—gaps which Handel himself would have filled up with an improvised accompaniment on the harpsichord. The final number will be Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration." The programme in order is as follows:

Handel.....Overture in D major, No. 1
Beethoven.....Symphony in A. major, No. 7
Lalo, Symphonic Espagnole for violin and orchestra.
Strauss, Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
Soloist, Mischa Elman.

m INQUIRER
ress Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" will be the principal work on the fourth Boston Symphony program, which will be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 20. The soloist in this work will be Heinrich Warnke, alternate principal 'cellist of the orchestra. The second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner, the funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods," the "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Prelude to the Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

[142]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date JAN 15 1911

DOLLY DEAR:

If the first week of the year was given over to the young and giddy, the serious and the intellectuals had their inning on Monday night. Indeed, they had an embarras de richesse, being divided between the Symphony Concert and the Contemporary Club. The ranks of intellectuality must be rapidly increasing in this good old town, which once stood so pre-eminently for creature comfort, for both the Academy of Music and the Clover Club room at the Bellevue-Stratford were crowded to overflowing. The concert was superb. I know that it is no longer the fashion to rave over Beethoven, but to me he is still unsurpassed, and the Seventh Symphony, when done as it was on Monday last, holds me enthralled. It was a wonderful programme, of which Strauss's "Tod und Verklarung," with its fine harmonies descriptive of a hero's death and apotheosis, was by no means the least enjoyable number. And, then, the young Russian prodigy, Mischa Elman, outdid himself. He is growing with the years in power and grasp. It was a great concert, and the audience knew it, and, I am happy to say, demonstra-

Post
Hartford Conn
JAN 17 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Parsons' theater was filled to its doors last evening, as it always is nowadays whenever the Boston Symphony orchestra plays there. Time was when Hartford did not turn out in such goodly numbers ,but that was in the old days, before musical appreciation had attained its full bloom, and only a few of our people were really musical, and only a very few pretended to be. But all that is changed now and most of us have almost forgotten how persistently John Gallup went on year aftr year, bringing on this attraction and losing money on it every time, because he had the courage to believe that sooner or later we would wake up and see and appreciate what he was offering us. I may have mentioned this fact some time before, but I make no apology for repeating it, because the pleasure some thousand odd people had last night is as directly attributable to him as it is to Max Fiedler and his remarkable band, for without the perseverance of one we would not have enjoyed the perfection of the other. And perfection is, to my mind, the one adjective that best describes the work of the Boston Symphony orchestra. A more conscientious and musicianly band of players was never gathered together in America and a more distinct and definite advancement of musical taste was never accomplished in the world. For thirty years they have played themselves into the hearts and minds of musical America, each year advancing their progress along the line of classical composition till now they cater to a n audience as critical as it is numerous and as intelligent as it is appreciative. It is a great thing to have accomplished so much in so short a time comparatively, and last evening's program is as good an example of how it was done as any they have ever presented. Beginning with four movements of Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, which admirably illustrates the newest form of Russian musical development along the ultra line of modern thought impelling music. Then shifting to Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor for violin, which has been considered a masterpiece for sixty-six years, and concluding with the Festival Overture that Johannes Brahms wrote as an expression of his thanks to the university of Breslau for making him a director of philosophy. Thirty years ago when the Boston Symphony began, Brahms was a young man Rachmaninoff was a boy, and Mendelssohn was a master: so that proves conclusively that while the times have changed the orchestra has kept pace with it, and has advanced itself as well as its composers.

The symphony was perhaps the most interesting number of the evening, because novelty lent an added charm to its harmonious beauties, and the allegro molto was perhaps the most interesting member of that number. At all events, it called out the most spontaneous applause. Anton Witek's performance of the concerto was very workmanlike and musicianly. True it is, his tone producing faculty seemed confined to the right hand side of his fiddle and the tone itself was sweet and pure rather than vibrant and powerful. But he presented the work with a finished technique, an abundant intelligence and a graceful and facial facility. I don't remember of ever hearing the allegro vivace more deftly or nimbly played. As for the Brahms number it was redolent with the joyous spirit of student life and was like everything else he ever wrote, as charmingly characteristic as it was beautiful.

MAC HENRY.

Courant
Hartford Conn
JAN 17 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SECOND CONCERT.

HIGH PRAISE FOR NEW SYMPHONY.

Brilliant Work by Conductor and Musicians.

GREAT AUDIENCE KEENLY APPRECIATIVE.

The second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Parsons Theater last evening, the usual enormous audience being in evidence. A new symphony was played and a new soloist heard. Mr. Fiedler got a rousing welcome when he appeared and was recalled to the stage several times after the symphony and at the close of the concert. The applause for the symphony he insisted on sharing with the members of the orchestra and they surely deserved their part of the audience's appreciation. If the composer of the symphony had been present he would have had an ovation.

Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff, pianist, played here with the Boston orchestra last season in one of his own concertos and was heartily acclaimed, but the audience last evening heard a greater specimen of his work than that of last year in his Symphony in E minor, No. 2, which was given a magnificent reading by Mr. Fiedler and a not less wonderful rendition by the players of the orchestra. The symphony does not give itself up to the exploitation of a great idea in the world's scheme of existence, neither is it, in the slightest degree, "program music," but it is splendid work by a great tone-colorist who knows the possibilities and powers of the modern orchestra and uses them boldly in all their breadth and strength. There is a great building up of effects in the symphony and the brilliant first movement leads on through the beauties of melody and grace of the allegro and the charming weavings of tone in the adagio to a finale that, full of the color of Russian music and tingling with accents of tonal gorgeousness, ends in a climax that would force enthusiasm from the coldest and most critical of audiences. The whole work is brilliant and Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for giving Hartford opportunity to hear it so brilliantly played.

The quiet opening of the first movement is but the calm that precedes the storm for a climax of tone, showing the composer's skill in his use of the instruments of the orchestra, is soon forthcoming. A solo for violin, brief but charming, is played over a barbaric accompaniment and a little later the muted first violins are beautifully used in contrast with the open tones of all the other strings. There are heavy brass chords to which the woodwinds are added in fearsome sound and then there is a literal storm of strings followed by truly Wagnerian crashes — and chaos. And not only in this first movement is Wagner much more than suggested by the brilliant young Russian; time and again there come sweeping measures and splendid crashes of sound that carry their own merits home to the audience while they serve to recall the genius of the man who led the modern world of music into the knowledge of the thrilling effects possible in orchestral music.

The second movement of the symphony begins at tremendous speed and scintillates brilliantly; then a broad and finely melodic passage; then more oddities of rapid motion and a dashing fugue. Dance measures whirl along and the crashing brass is heard at the end of the brilliant movement. In the adagio there is splendid beauty in the songs of the woodwinds shining through the fabric of melody woven by the strings and there is a no less splendid marshaling of tone in the climax. The leading up to the use of all the power of the orchestra with brass omitted, is very fine and the glories of strings and woodwinds are made apparent—and then the brass comes, too, bringing another and still more effective climax of tone. The end of the movement is beautiful and the playing of the closely drawn tones dying away into silence was superb.

The finale is Wagnerian in many measures; it thrums and thrills with lilt of an Oriental march, it sparkles in brilliance of tempo, it weaves a spell of typically Russian music as it passes, it is wonderfully effective in measures of rapidly diminishing tone; and a burst of Orientalism of splendid tonal gorgeousness leads up to a climax that is an entirely worthy ending to a symphony that, played as it was played last evening, is a work of fine effectiveness throughout.

Mr. Fiedler was applauded after every movement of the symphony and as has been mentioned, he stood with his players to receive the applause at the close of the work. The tribute received was well earned, for it seemed as if every possibility of the orchestra's effectiveness had been taken advantage of in the playing of the symphony. There was full sympathy between conductor and players as to phrasing and shading and the tone quality was of particular fineness in almost every measure of the work. And the same may well be said of the playing of the Brahms "Academic Festival Overture" that closed the evening's program; here beauty of tone was the rule and the rollicking measures of the composer whose work usually stands for the utmost in seriousness were splendidly pronounced—the familiar and sonorous "Gaudeamus igitur" being used in the finale with strong effect.

Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra, was the soloist of the evening. He played the ever-lovely Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor and showed to the full his command of beautiful tone and his admirable technique. The charms of the first movement were finely displayed, there was beautiful singing of the song of the andante, and in the final movement the brilliance of the playing, though ever-present, was not allowed to distract attention from the beauties of the melodies played. Mr. Witek was recalled to the stage several times and was applauded by his fellow-artists as well as by the audience.

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for Monday evening, February 27, with Ferrucio Busoni named as soloist. If the concert ranks with the two that have been given this season (and there is not the slightest reason to doubt that it will) the 1910-11 series of concerts will be one that will be long remembered.

WORLD
ss New York City
FEB - 5 1911

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 23, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, No. 3, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote," while on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's, in C major.

From TIMES
Address New York City.
Date FEB - 5 1911

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 23, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, No. 3, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote," while on Saturday afternoon the Symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

STANDARD UNION,
ress BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 4 1911

The fourth Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music is scheduled for the evening of Feb. 24.

The Saturday Matinee Young Peo-

Newspaper Clipping
From TOWN TOPICS
Address New York City
Date JAN 19 1911

Wagner held large sway also in the concert field last week, and programs devoted exclusively to his works were plentiful. Walter Damrosch and Gustav Mahler read no new meanings into the Wagner orchestral excerpts, while Madam Gadski sang some of his arias and the significant Wesendonck songs with her customary beauty of tone and fervid musical imagination. Mischa Elman, of St. Petersburg, was the Boston Symphony soloist in the Mendelssohn concerto and the halo "Symphonie Espagnole," and succeeded in making the Mendelssohn music sound Spanish and the Spanish music sound Russian. It was a daring feat and the audience applauded it warmly. The Hub's orchestra is as wonderful as ever and in Humperdinck's "Tangier," Sibelins' long-winded and bombastic second symphony and Beethoven's imperishable seventh, exhibited its customary skill, finish and impeccable tonal virtues. Arnold Volpe is entitled to an explanation of the notice which appeared in this column last week. The usually punctilious printer of TOWN TOPICS made me say: "The Volpe Orchestra gave no spirited and finished readings of Mendelssohn," etc. I wrote: "The Volpe Orchestra gave us spirited and finished readings," etc. Verzeihung, Herr Volpe.

The Pied Piper.

From EVENING JOURNAL
Address ALBANY, N. Y.
Date JAN 21 1911

sale opens Monday ... o'clock.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Second only in importance to the recent production of grand opera in Albany by the Metropolitan Opera company, under the management of Ben Franklin, will be the concert to be given at the Hall Monday night, Feb. 6, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the event also being under the personal management of Mr. Franklin. The organization will number between 70 and 90 men, the conductor will be Max Fiedler, and the soloist will be the brilliant pianist, Mme. Yolande Mero, who is now so much in the public eye on account of her great work at the keyboard. The event in every way will be a rare treat and a great social as well as musical occasion. It will also mark the only appearance of the orchestra in this section this season.

It is not necessary to dwell upon the importance of the occasion as knowing ones will understand it from the above mention. Special attention is called however to the subscribers' seat sale that is now in progress, although the regular sale does not open until one week from Tuesday at the Hall. To take advantage of this it is only necessary to write to Mr. Franklin, in care of the Hall, state where seats are desired and these or others as near them as possible will be selected and if order is accompanied by remittance tickets will be mailed, otherwise held at the box office.

Max Fiedler, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Hall.

MORN. TELEGRAPH
dress New York City.
te

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both concerts the soloists will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's Concerto in C Minor, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote" and on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C Major.

om
dress
te

Ferruccio Busoni, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Feb. 24. He will play Liszt's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in E flat. The symphony will be Schubert's, in C major.

PUBLIC LEDGER
om.....
Philadelphia, Pa.
dress.....
ate.....

DOLLY DEAR:

If the first week of the year was given over to the young and giddy, the serious and the intellectuals had their inning on Monday night. Indeed, they had an embarras de richesse, being divided between the Symphony Concert and the Contemporary Club. The ranks of intellectuality must be rapidly increasing in this good old town, which once stood so pre-eminently for creature comfort, for both the Academy of Music and the Clover Club room at the Bellevue-Stratford were crowded to overflowing. The concert was superb. I know that it is no longer the fashion to rave over Beethoven, but to me he is still unsurpassed, and the Seventh Symphony, when done as it was on Monday last, holds me enthralled. It was a wonderful programme, of which Strauss's "Tod und Verklarung," with its fine harmonies descriptive of a hero's death and apotheosis, was by no means the least enjoyable number. And, then, the young Russian prodigy, Mischa Elman, outdid himself. He is growing with the years in power and grasp. It was a great concert, and the audience knew it, and, I am happy to say, demonstrated the fact.

Courant
Hartford
JAN 17 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Parsons' theater was filled to its doors last evening, as it always is nowadays whenever the Boston Symphony orchestra plays there. Time was when Hartford did not turn out in such goodly numbers ,but that was in the old days, before musical appreciation had attained its full bloom, and only a few of our people were really musical, and only a very few pretended to be. But all that is changed now and most of us have almost forgotten how persistently John Gallup went on year aftr year, bringing on this attraction and losing money on it every time, because he had the courage to believe that sooner or later we would wake up and see and appreciate what he was offering us. I may have mentioned this fact some time before, but I make no apology for repeating it, because the pleasure some thousand odd people had last night is as directly attributable to him as it is to Max Fiedler and his remarkable band, for without the perseverance of one we would not have enjoyed the perfection of the other. And perfection is, to my mind, the one adjective that best describes the work of the Boston Symphony orchestra. A more conscientious and musicianly band of players was never gathered together in America and a more distinct and definite advancement of musical taste was never accomplished in the world. For thirty years they have played themselves into the hearts and minds of musical America, each year advancing their progress along the line of classical composition till now they cater to a n audience as critical as it is numerous and as intelligent as it is appreciative. It is a great thing to have accomplished so much in so short a time comparatively, and last evening's program is as good an example of how it was done as any they have ever presented. Beginning with four movements of Rachmaninoff's symphony in E minor, which admirably illustrates the newest form of Russian musical development along the ultra line of modern thought impelling music. Then shifting to Mendelssohn's concerto in E minor for violin, which has been considered a masterpiece for sixty-six years, and concluding with the Festival Overture that Johannes Brahms wrote as an expression of his thanks to the university of Breslau for making him a director of philosophy. Thirty years ago when the Boston Symphony began, Brahms was a young man Rachmaninoff was a boy, and Mendelssohn was a master, so that proves conclusively that while the times have changed the orchestra has kept pace with it, and has advanced itself as well as its composers.

The symphony was perhaps the most interesting number of the evening, because novelty lent an added charm to its harmonious beauties, and the allegro molto was perhaps the most interesting member of that number. At all events, it called out the most spontaneous applause. Anton Witek's performance of the concerto was very workmanlike and musicianly. True it is, his tone producing faculty seemed confined to the right hand side of his fiddle and the tone itself was sweet and pure rather than vibrant and powerful. But he presented the work with a finished technique, an abundant intelligence and a graceful and facial facility. I don't remember of ever hearing the allegro vivace more deftly or nimbly played. As for the Brahms number it was redolent with the joyous spirit of student life, and was like everything else he ever wrote, as charmingly characteristic as it was beautiful.

MAC HENRY.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN SECOND CONCERT.

HIGH PRAISE FOR NEW SYMPHONY.

Brilliant Work by Conductor and Musicians.

GREAT AUDIENCE KEENLY APPRECIATIVE.

The second of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Parsons Theater last evening, the usual enormous audience being in evidence. A new symphony was played and a new soloist heard. Mr. Fiedler got a rousing welcome when he appeared and was recalled to the stage several times after the symphony and at the close of the concert. The applause for the symphony he insisted on sharing with the members of the orchestra and they surely deserved their part of the audience's appreciation. If the composer of the symphony had been present he would have had an ovation.

Sergei Vassilievich Rachmaninoff, pianist, played here with the Boston orchestra last season in one of his own concertos and was heartily acclaimed, but the audience last evening heard a greater specimen of his work than that of last year in his Symphony in E minor, No. 2, which was given a magnificent reading by Mr. Fiedler and a not less wonderful rendition by the players of the orchestra. The symphony does not give itself up to the exploitation of a great idea in the world's scheme of existence, neither is it, in the slightest degree, "program music," but it is splendid work by a great tone-colorist who knows the possibilities and powers of the modern orchestra and uses them boldly in all their breadth and strength. There is a great building up of effects in the symphony and the brilliant first movement leads on through the beauties of melody and grace of the allegro and the charming weavings of tone in the adagio to a finale that, full of the color of Russian music and tingling with accents of tonal gorgeousness, ends in a climax that would force enthusiasm from the coldest and most critical of audiences. The whole work is brilliant and Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for giving Hartford opportunity to hear it so brilliantly played.

The quiet opening of the first movement is but the calm that precedes the storm for a climax of tone, showing the composer's skill in his use of the instruments of the orchestra, is soon forthcoming. A solo for violin, brief but charming, is played over a barbaric accompaniment and a little later the muted first violins are beautifully used in contrast with the open tones of all the other strings. There are heavy brass chords to which the woodwinds are added in fearsome sound and then there is a literal storm of strings followed by truly Wagnerian crashes — and chaos. And not only in this first movement is Wagner much more than suggested by the brilliant young Russian; time and again there come sweeping measures and splendid crashes of sound that carry their own merits home to the audience while they serve to recall the genius of the man who led the modern world of music into the knowledge of the thrilling effects possible in orchestral music.

The second movement of the symphony begins at tremendous speed and scintillates brilliantly; then a broad and finely melodic passage; then more oddities of rapid motion and a dashing fugue. Dance measures whirl along and the crashing brass is heard at the end of the brilliant movement. In the adagio there is splendid beauty in the songs of the woodwinds shining through the fabric of melody woven by the strings and there is a no less splendid marshaling of tone in the climax. The leading up to the use of all the power of the orchestra with brass omitted, is very fine and the glories of strings and woodwinds are made apparent—and then the brass comes, too, bringing another and still more effective climax of tone. The end of the movement is beautiful and the playing of the closely drawn tones dying away into silence was superb.

The finale is Wagnerian in many measures; it thrums and thrills with lilt of an Oriental march, it sparkles in brilliance of tempo, it weaves a spell of typically Russian music as it passes, it is wonderfully effective in measures of rapidly diminishing tone; and a burst of Orientalism of splendid tonal gorgeousness leads up to a climax that is an entirely worthy ending to a symphony that, played as it was played last evening, is a work of fine effectiveness throughout.

Mr. Fiedler was applauded after every movement of the symphony and, as has been mentioned, he stood with his players to receive the applause at the close of the work. The tribute received was well earned, for it seemed as if every possibility of the orchestra's effectiveness had been taken advantage of in the playing of the symphony. There was full sympathy between conductor and players as to phrasing and shading and the tone quality was of particular fineness in almost every measure of the work. And the same may well be said of the playing of the Brahms "Academic Festival Overture" that closed the evening's program; here beauty of tone was the rule and the rollicking measures of the composer whose work usually stands for the utmost in seriousness were splendidly pronounced—the familiar and sonorous "Gaudeamus igitur" being used in the finale with strong effect.

Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra, was the soloist of the evening. He played the ever-lovely Mendelssohn Concerto in E-minor and showed to the full his command of beautiful tone and his admirable technique. The charms of the first movement were finely displayed, there was beautiful singing of the song of the andante, and in the final movement the brilliance of the playing, though ever-present, was not allowed to distract attention from the beauties of the melodies played. Mr. Witek was recalled to the stage several times and was applauded by his fellow-artists as well as by the audience.

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is announced for Monday evening, February 27, with Ferrucio Busoni named as soloist. If the concert ranks with the two that have been given this season (and there is not the slightest reason to doubt that it will) the 1910-11 series of concerts will be one that will be long remembered.

WORLD
ss New York City

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 23, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, No. 3, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote," while on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's, in C major.

From TIMES
Address New York City.
Date
5 1911

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 23, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, No. 3, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote," while on Saturday afternoon the Symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

STANDARD UNION,
ress BROOKLYN, N. Y.
FEB 4 1911

The fourth Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music is scheduled for the evening of Feb. 24.

The Saturday Matinee Young Peo-

From Evening
Address ALBANY, N. Y.
Date JAN 21 1911

sale opens Monday ... o'clock.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Second only in importance to the recent production of grand opera in Albany by the Metropolitan Opera company, under the management of Ben Franklin, will be the concert to be given at the Hall Monday night, Feb. 6, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the event also being under the personal management of Mr. Franklin. The organization will number between 70 and 80 men, the conductor will be Max Fiedler, and the soloist will be the brilliant pianist, Mme. Yolande Mero, who is now so much in the public eye on account of her great work at the keyboard. The event in every way will be a rare treat and a great social as well as musical occasion. It will also mark the only appearance of the orchestra in this section this season.

Max Fiedler, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Hall.

It is not necessary to dwell upon the importance of the occasion as knowing ones will understand it from the above mention. Special attention is called however to the subscribers' seat sale that is now in progress, although the regular sale does not open until one week from Tuesday at the Hall. To take advantage of this it is only necessary to write to Mr. Franklin, in care of the Hall, state where seats are desired and these or others as near them as possible will be selected and if order is accompanied by remittance tickets will be mailed, otherwise held at the box office.

MORN. TELEGRAPH
dress New York City.
te

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both concerts the soloists will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's Concerto in C Minor, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Quixote" and on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C Major.

om
dress
te

Ferruccio Busoni, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, in the Academy of Music, on Friday evening, Feb. 24. He will play Liszt's Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in E flat. The symphony will be Schubert's, in C major.

Newspaper Clipping
From TOWN TOPICS
Address
Date

Wagner held large sway also in the concert field last week, and programs devoted exclusively to his works were plentiful. Walter Damrosch and Gustav Mahler read no new meanings into the Wagner orchestral excerpts, while Madam Gadski sang some of his arias and the significant Wesendonck songs with her customary beauty of tone and fervid musical imagination. Mischa Elman, of St. Petersburg, was the Boston Symphony soloist in the Mendelssohn concerto and the halo "Symphonie Espagnole," and succeeded in making the Mendelssohn music sound Spanish and the Spanish music sound Russian. It was a daring feat and the audience applauded it warmly. The Hub's orchestra is as wonderful as ever and in Humperdinck's "Tangier," Sibelins' long-winded and bombastic second symphony and Beethoven's imperishable seventh, exhibited its customary skill, finish and impeccable tonal virtues. Arnold Volpe is entitled to an explanation of the notice which appeared in this column last week. The usually punctilious printer of TOWN TOPICS made me say: "The Volpe Orchestra gave no spirited and finished readings of Mendelssohn," etc. I wrote: "The Volpe Orchestra gave us spirited and finished readings," etc. Verzeihung, Herr Volpe.

The Pied Piper.

143

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
AMERICAN MUSICIAN
From
Address New York City
Date JAN 14 1911

FINANCING A SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BY OSCAR HATCH HAWLEY.

The fact that the orchestras now in existence have guarantee funds back of them is generally known, but the purpose of the guarantee fund does not seem to be understood. The general impression prevails that a guarantee fund is like the capital stock of a corporation—money used in the conduct of the business. There is no symphony orchestra in the United States that takes in enough money during the season to pay expenses, and most of them do not get even half enough. In speaking of symphony orchestras the writer has reference, of course, to those organized bodies of musicians in constant rehearsal under competent conductors.

If one will take a piece of paper and a pencil, sit down quietly and make a few figures, the financial side of the proposition can be approximated so as to give a general idea of the basis upon which the orchestras are organized. Conductors receive from $6,000 to $30,000 annually, concertmasters from $2,000 to $10,000, heads of the different string sections, including second concertmaster, from $1,000 to $4,000 a year. The string players get from $15 to $100 a week salary, depending on their ability and reputation. In the woodwinds and brasses every man must be a soloist, and the salaries range higher, say from $40 to $100 or even $150 a week.

Besides this, there is the business side of the organization. First there is the business manager, then the assistant business manager, the working secretary (having charge of the sale of tickets), the stenographer, the librarian and sometimes even others. These people do not work for the love of it, nor are their offices furnished free of charge. It is a matter of dollars and cents. The business manager is at work twelve months in the year. Rarely does he have a day's or a night's release from the cares of his office. He must be continually in negotiation with managers of artists who desire to appear with his orchestra. No sooner does he have his schedule of concerts completed for one season that he has to begin work on the programs for the next year.

Perhaps exception will be taken to the statement made above that every symphony orchestra in the United States is a losing proposition. Perhaps there are those people who believe that, notwithstanding everything said to the contrary, the orchestras (some of them) do make money. In order to set at rest any doubts on the subject the writer will here quote from the financial statements of twelve of the orchestras of this country.

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Founded in 1881. Gives twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals every season. Makes five trips to the South as well as trips to nearby cities every year. The annual deficit has been as high as $52,000, and all deficits are paid by Henry Higginson, founder of the orchestra. One hundred players.

Theodore Thomas Orchestra—Organized in 1891. Gives twenty-eight concerts and twenty-eight public rehearsals every season; ten tours of the Middle West. Had a deficit of $153,000 beyond the guarantee in three years and then got it down to $16,000. (This in excess of the guarantee, which was for $50,000 a year for five years.) Now has endowment fund of $650,000 and their own building. Ninety men.

Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1900. Has a guarantee fund of $40,000 a year. Twenty-two sets of afternoon and evening concerts, besides giving people's concerts in the factory part of the city at nominal prices. There were deficits in excess of the guarantee fund the first four years. Now about ninety-five per cent. of the guarantee fund is used every year. Seventy-two players.

New York Philharmonic Orchestra—Organized in 1842. One hundred players. Lost $90,000 last season.

Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1895. Gives twenty pairs of concerts every year, besides tours of Middle West and Canada. Total expenses have ranged from $73,000 to $115,000 annually. The amount over the receipts is met by forty guarantors pledging $1,000 each. All of this amount was not called for during the last years of the orchestra, which disbanded with the end of the season this year. Seventy-five men.

Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1903. Gives twelve symphony and twenty-four popular concerts during the season. Tours West and Middle West in the spring. Has a guarantee fund of $50,000 a year for five years and spends all of it. Eighty men.

St. Paul Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1905. Gives ten symphony and twenty popular concerts during the year. Has a guarantee fund of $30,000 a year for five years and uses it all. (But this $30,000 guarantee is equal to $45,000, as the guarantors have to purchase their tickets in addition to their pledged subscription.) Eighty men. Will probably tour this year.

Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1894. Gives ten concerts and ten public rehearsals annually, besides tours in Indiana and Kentucky. Has a guarantee fund of $50,000 a year and uses all of it. Seventy-five men.

St. Louis Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1879. Gives eight symphony concerts and eight public rehearsals besides twenty popular concerts and tours of Missouri and Kansas annually. Deficit runs about $10,000 annually, made up by fifty guarantors. Sixty-five men.

Seattle Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1905. Gives eight symphony concerts every season and is planning greater things for the future. So far the deficits have been about $15,000 annually, which have been met by the guarantors. It is understood that a much larger guarantee fund will be made up in the future and that the orchestra of sixty men will be increased in size.

The foregoing list does not take into account the surprisingly good orchestras in Memphis, Los Angeles, Louisville and Cleveland, every one of which is a losing proposition, but on a very much smaller scale than those enumerated above. Besides these there are now in process of organization orchestras for Denver (guarantee fund of $25,000 annually for three years), Kansas City ($50,000 a year for three years) and San Francisco.

So here is presented the exact financial statement of the leading orchestras of the country, and it is found that every one of them is run at an enormous loss.

There is seldom an attempt to retrench—that has always proven a poor move—but there is usually a desire to improve the orchestra, and this always means more expense without any more income.

The question has often been asked: "How does an orchestra come into being? Is it a spontaneous movement on the part of the people? Or do the musicians of a community get so hungry for music that at last they compel the organizaton of an orchestra?

Both conjectures are wrong, yet those ideas seem to be the ones generally held by the people. All the orchestras of the United States have come into being in just one way and they are all maintained in just one way, and that way is the one Henry Higginson utilized when he started the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In his case he did the organizing, paid all the deficits and took all the hard work on himself. But in other cities, while one man has been the underlying factor in the organization of the orchestra, he has usually been a big enough gun so that he could get many of his associates to help him defray the expenses. So there is the secret of symphony orchestra organization—it is always a one man idea. And usually it remains a one man idea to the end of the chapter. He may have his board of directors and his list of guarantors, but they don't want to be bothered with business detail. They leave that matter all with the one man, and in a way he becomes the board of directors (because he has the financial policy to supervise), the business manager (because he usually superintends the engaging of artists), and the conductor (because, as the power behind the throne, he can request any favorite number for a program, knowing that it will be given).

Another side to the orchestra proposition is that of society. If it were not for society the orchestras would be doomed to failure. The general impression prevails that it is the musicians who patronize orchestra concerts to the exclusion of all other peoples. As a matter of fact, the smallest part of the orchestra patronage comes from professional musicians. The largest part comes from what is termed "society." The next largest body are the "climbers." Following them come the amateurs—lovers of music. And last of all, members of the profession.

SUN

ress New York City.

FEB 4

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, No. 3, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Quixote," while on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

EVE. GLOBE

ss New York City.

FEB - 4 1911

Miss Cecile Behrens, pianist, announced for a recital Friday evening, Feb. 10, at Mendelssohn Hall.

The fourth pair of New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Feb. 23, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 25. At both concerts the soloist will be the famous pianist Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, and on Saturday Liszt's "Dance of Death." The principal orchestral number of the first concert will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Quixote." Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

TRIBUNE

ess New York City.

FEB - 5 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, No. 3, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Quixote," while on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

[144]

BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1911

ORCHESTRA PLAYS SYMPHONIC POEMS

Franck's "The Wild Huntsman" Given at the Thirteenth Public Rehearsal.

TWO PIECES BY SAINT-SAENS

Danse Macabre and "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" Pleasing Part of Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 7.....Schubert
"The Wild Huntsman".....Franck
"Omphale's Spinning Wheel".....Saint-Saens
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saens

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem illustrative of Buerger's ballad has been played here at least three times and was last heard at a symphony concert seven years ago. The other compositions were more familiar to the audience, although the Danse Macabre has not been performed at a symphony concert for many years. Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for including it in his program, nor was the dignity of the concert impaired by his action. This danse is an admirable work, picturesque, imaginative, conceived in a truly ironical and Macabre spirit. When it was played in London 30 years ago, at a concert given by the composer, the critic of the Daily News described it as "horrible, hidious, and disgusting—," and added: "The piece is one of many signs of the intense and coarse realism that is entering into much of the musical composition (so-called) of the day." It is a good thing to look over the criticisms written when compositions now classic and admired were heard for the first time. Future generations will have an opportunity of thus smiling, at the expense of solemn judges of 1911.

Saint-Saens writing his four symphonic poems had this advantage over many that have followed him: he took his art seriously, but did not insist on his success in translating line by line into tones an argument or printed text. Note the irony of his preface to "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." He frankly admits that the spinning wheel was chosen only as a pretext for rhythm and the general form and character of the piece. "Those who are interested in examining details" can hear in one section Hercules groaning and endeavoring to break his bonds, and in another section Omphale mocking his efforts. The composer did not prescribe to himself preposterously. It was as though he said to the audience: "My dear friends, here is a piece and I have given a title to it. Find in it what you please, but remember it is, first of all, music."

I doubt if in the catalogue of symphonic poems of this genre there is a finer, more exquisitely worked composition than this tribute to Omphale's power of fascination. It has the traditional characteristics of French music: grace, rhythm, and, above all, clarity. There were brave men before Debussy in France, and some might say that Debussy is not an Agamemnon; yet, the composer of "Pelleas and Melisande" has the instinct for delicate and significant instrumentation; he secures charming results by apparently simple means. The better French composers, knowing the resources of the orchestra, unlike the inferior French and too many Germans, do not use all the instruments because they are at hand. To the unintelligent student a page of Saint-Saens's scores looks thin; but to the ear each instrument outside the quartet has significance; when it is used it is effective.

Franck's "Wild Huntsman" is not one of his great works. The opening is impressive, and there are a few dramatic moments up to the judgment pronounced by a voice from heaven against the sacrilegious count and his crew; but the description of the Infernal Hunt is only labor, vexation. Franck was a mystic, a man dreaming of divine pity and beneficence. He could not understand the demoniacal, and when he attempted to express it in music, as in this ride and in the music of Satan and other evil spirits in "The Beatitudes" he failed dismally, writing in a Meyerbeerish manner.

The pieces by Saint-Saens were played according to the best traditions of the orchestra. Mr. Longy was especially fortunate in his expression of Omphale's mockery and Mr. Witek gave out Death's dance tune with the appropriate mordancy. The wood-wind and the strings vied with each other in the performance of Schubert's symphony, that vast storehouse of ravishing melody. All in all the concert was one of the pleasantest of the season and the audience showed lively appreciation.

The program of the concerts next week will include these pieces: Gernsheim, tone poem "To a Drama" (first time); Reger, variation and fugue on a merry tune by J. A. Hiller; Saint-Saens, concerto for 'cello, A minor (Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist); Wagner, overture to "Tannhaeuser."

AMERICAN MUSICIAN
The Most Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ..... New York City
Address .....
Date ..... JAN 14 1911

FINANCING A SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

BY OSCAR HATCH HAWLEY

The fact that the orchestras now in existence have guarantee funds back of them is generally known, but the purpose of the guarantee fund does not seem to be understood. The general impression prevails that a guarantee fund is like the capital stock of a corporation—money used in the conduct of the business. There is no symphony orchestra in the United States that takes in enough money during the season to pay expenses, and most of them do not get even half enough. In speaking of symphony orchestras the writer has reference, of course, to those organized bodies of musicians in constant rehearsal under competent conductors.

If one will take a piece of paper and a pencil, sit down quietly and make a few figures, the financial side of the proposition can be approximated so as to give a general idea of the basis upon which the orchestras are organized. Conductors receive from $6,000 to $30,000 annually, concertmasters from $2,000 to $10,000, heads of the different string sections, including second concertmaster, from $1,000 to $4,000 a year. The string players get from $15 to $100 a week salary, depending on their ability and reputation. In the woodwinds and brasses every man must be a soloist, and the salaries range higher, say from $40 to $100 or even $150 a week.

Besides this, there is the business side of the organization. First there is the business manager, then the assistant business manager, the working secretary (having charge of the sale of tickets), the stenographer, the librarian and sometimes even others. These people do not work for the love of it, nor are their offices furnished free of charge. It is a matter of dollars and cents. The business manager is at work twelve months in the year. Rarely does he have a day's or a night's release from the cares of his office. He must be continually in negotiation with managers of artists who desire to appear with his orchestra. No sooner does he have his schedule of concerts completed for one season that he has to begin work on the programs for the next year.

Perhaps exception will be taken to the statement made above that every symphony orchestra in the United States is a losing proposition. Perhaps there are those people who believe that, notwithstanding everything said to the contrary, the orchestras (some of them) do make money. In order to set at rest any doubts on the subject the writer will here quote from the financial statements of twelve of the orchestras of this country.

Boston Symphony Orchestra—Founded in 1881. Gives twenty-four concerts and twenty-four public rehearsals every season. Makes five trips to the South as well as trips to nearby cities every year. The annual deficit has been as high as $52,000, and all deficits are paid by Henry Higginson, founder of the orchestra. One hundred players.

Theodore Thomas Orchestra—Organized in 1891. Gives twenty-eight concerts and twenty-eight public rehearsals every season; ten tours of the Middle West. Had a deficit of $153,000 beyond the guarantee in three years and then got it down to $16,000. (This in excess of the guarantee, which was for $50,000 a year for five years.) Now has endowment fund of $650,000 and their own building. Ninety men.

Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1900. Has a guarantee fund of $40,000 a year. Twenty-two sets of afternoon and evening concerts, besides giving people's concerts in the factory part of the city at nominal prices. There were deficits in excess of the guarantee fund the first four years. Now about ninety-five per cent. of the guarantee fund is used every year. Seventy-two players.

New York Philharmonic Orchestra—Organized in 1842. One hundred players. Lost $90,000 last season.

Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1895. Gives twenty pairs of concerts every year, besides tours of Middle West and Canada. Total expenses have ranged from $73,000 to $115,000 annually. The amount over the receipts is met by forty guarantors pledging $1,000 each. All of this amount was not called for during the last years of the orchestra, which disbanded with the end of the season this year. Seventy-five men.

Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1903. Gives twelve symphony and twenty-four popular concerts during the season. Tours West and Middle West in the spring. Has a guarantee fund of $50,000 a year for five years and spends all of it. Eighty men.

St. Paul Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1905. Gives ten symphony and twenty popular concerts during the year. Has a guarantee fund of $30,000 a year for five years and uses it all. (But this $30,000 guarantee is equal to $45,000, as the guarantors have to purchase their tickets in addition to their pledged subscription.) Eighty men. Will probably tour this year.

Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1894. Gives ten concerts and ten public rehearsals annually, besides tours in Indiana and Kentucky. Has a guarantee fund of $50,000 a year and uses all of it. Seventy-five men.

St. Louis Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1879. Gives eight symphony concerts and eight public rehearsals besides twenty popular concerts and tours of Missouri and Kansas annually. Deficit runs about $10,000 annually, made up by fifty guarantors. Sixty-five men.

Seattle Symphony Orchestra—Organized in 1905. Gives eight symphony concerts every season and is planning greater things for the future. So far the deficits have been about $15,000 annually, which have been met by the guarantors. It is understood that a much larger guarantee fund will be made up in the future and that the orchestra of sixty men will be increased in size.

The foregoing list does not take into account the surprisingly good orchestras in Memphis, Los Angeles, Louisville and Cleveland, every one of which is a losing proposition, but on a very much smaller scale than those enumerated above. Besides these there are now in process of organization orchestras for Denver (guarantee fund of $25,000 annually for three years), Kansas City ($50,000 a year for three years) and San Francisco.

So here is presented the exact financial statement of the leading orchestras of the country, and it is found that every one of them is run at an enormous loss.

There is seldom an attempt to retrench—that has always proven a poor move—but there is usually a desire to improve the orchestra, and this always means more expense without any more income.

The question has often been asked: "How does an orchestra come into being? Is it a spontaneous movement on the part of the people? Or do the musicians of a community get so hungry for music that at last they compel the organizaton of an orchestra?

Both conjectures are wrong, yet those ideas seem to be the ones generally held by the people. All the orchestras of the United States have come into being in just one way and they are all maintained in just one way, and that way is the one Henry Higginson utilized when he started the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In his case he did the organizing, paid all the deficits and took all the hard work on himself. But in other cities, while one man has been the underlying factor in the organization of the orchestra, he has usually been a big enough gun so that he could get many of his associates to help him defray the expenses. So there is the secret of symphony orchestra organization—it is always a one man idea. And usually it remains a one man idea to the end of the chapter. He may have his board of directors and his list of guarantors, but they don't want to be bothered with business detail. They leave that matter all with the one man, and in a way he becomes the board of directors (because he has the financial policy to supervise), the business manager (because he usually superintends the engaging of artists), and the conductor (because, as the power behind the throne, he can request any favorite number for a program, knowing that it will be given).

Another side to the orchestra proposition is that of society. If it were not for society the orchestras would be doomed to failure. The general impression prevails that it is the musicians who patronize orchestra concerts to the exclusion of all other peoples. As a matter of fact, the smallest part of the orchestra patronage comes from professional musicians. The largest part comes from what is termed "society." The next largest body are the "climbers." Following them come the amateurs—lovers of music. And last of all, members of the profession.

ORCHESTRA PLAYS SYMPHONIC POEMS

Franck's "The Wild Huntsman" Given at the Thirteenth Public Rehearsal.

TWO PIECES BY SAINT-SAENS

Danse Macabre and "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" Pleasing Part of Program.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 13th Public Rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Symphony in C major, No. 7.....Schubert
"The Wild Huntsman".....Franck
"Omphale's Spinning Wheel".....Saint-Saens
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saens

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem illustrative of Buerger's ballad has been played here at least three times and was last heard at a symphony concert seven years ago. The other compositions were more familiar to the audience, although the Danse Macabre has not been performed at a symphony concert for many years. Mr. Fiedler is to be thanked for including it in his program, nor was the dignity of the concert impaired by his action. This danse is an admirable work, picturesque, imaginative, conceived in a truly ironical and Macabre spirit. When it was played in London 30 years ago, at a concert given by the composer, the critic of the Daily News described it as "horrible, hidious, and disgusting—," and added: "The piece is one of many signs of the intense and coarse realism that is entering into much of the musical composition (so-called) of the day." It is a good thing to look over the criticisms written when compositions now classic and admired were heard for the first time. Future generations will have an opportunity of thus smiling, at the expense of solemn judges of 1911.

Saint-Saens writing his four symphonic poems had this advantage over many that have followed him: he took his art seriously, but did not insist on his success in translating line by line into tones an argument or printed text. Note the irony of his preface to "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." He frankly admits that the spinning wheel was chosen only as a pretext for rhythm and the general form and character of the piece. "Those who are interested in examining details" can hear in one section Hercules groaning and endeavoring to break his bonds, and in another section Omphale mocking his efforts. The composer did not prescribe to himself preposterously. It was as though he said to the audience: "My dear friends, here is a piece and I have given a title to it. Find in it what you please, but remember it is, first of all, music."

I doubt if in the catalogue of symphonic poems of this genre there is a finer, more exquisitely worked composition than this tribute to Omphale's power of fascination. It has the traditional characteristics of French music: grace, rhythm, and, above all, clarity. There were brave men before Debussy in France, and some might say that Debussy is not an Agamemnon; yet, the composer of "Pelleas and Melisande" has the instinct for delicate and significant instrumentation; he secures charming results by apparently simple means. The better French composers, knowing the resources of the orchestra, unlike the inferior French and too many Germans, do not use all the instruments because they are at hand. To the unintelligent student a page of Saint-Saens's scores looks thin; but to the ear each instrument outside the quartet has significance; when it is used it is effective.

Franck's "Wild Huntsman" is not one of his great works. The opening is impressive, and there are a few dramatic moments up to the judgment pronounced by a voice from heaven against the sacrilegious count and his crew; but the description of the Infernal Hunt is only labor, vexation. Franck was a mystic, a man dreaming of divine pity and beneficence. He could not understand the demoniacal, and when he attempted to express it in music, as in this ride and in the music of Satan and other evil spirits in "The Beatitudes" he failed dismally, writing in a Meyerbeerish manner.

The pieces by Saint-Saens were played according to the best traditions of the orchestra. Mr. Longy was especially fortunate in his expression of Omphale's mockery and Mr. Witek gave out Death's dance tune with the appropriate mordancy. The wood-wind and the strings vied with each other in the performance of Schubert's symphony, that vast storehouse of ravishing melody. All in all the concert was one of the pleasantest of the season and the audience showed lively appreciation.

The program of the concerts next week will include these pieces: Gernsheim, tone poem "To a Drama" (first time); Reger, variation and fugue on a merry tune by J. A. Hiller; Saint-Saens, concerto for 'cello, A minor (Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist); Wagner, overture to "Tannhaeuser."

SUN
Press ..... New York City.

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, No. 3, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Quixote," while on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

EVE. GLOBE
Press ..... New York City.
JAN - 4 1911

Miss Cecile Behrens, pianist, is announced for a recital Friday evening, Feb. 10, at Mendelssohn Hall.

The fourth pair of New York concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Feb. 23, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 25. At both concerts the soloist will be the famous pianist Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, and on Saturday Liszt's "Dance of Death." The principal orchestral number of the first concert will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Quixote." Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

TRIBUNE
Press ..... New York City.
FEB - 5 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, No. 3, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Quixote," while on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

[144]

MUSIC IN BOSTON

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The power to hold the attention of listeners is a possession of artists—of sham artists sometimes, and always of real ones. You have heard speakers who had it, you used to hear them in the good old days when there were speakers; you have heard singers who had it, both in the good old days and in the good present days.

And wherein does the secret of it lie? That is a question you have pondered ever since you were in school. You have always sought to explain, but never quite could, the ability of your Latin teacher to make Troy a Klondike and his Vergil class an eager camp of gold diggers. You have always counted those persons your greatest benefactors who could attract your thought to some object having intellectual, emotional or other significant content and could keep it fixed there until it became refreshed, energized, expanded.

Max Fiedler is at the conductor's desk of the Symphony orchestra; he motions his violinists, his wood players and his brass players to their attitudes. Any one with a quick eye for discerning orchestral motions will see that the French horns are to sound the opening theme. What magic has the conductor exerted, that the audience is alert to hear the first note, as alert, indeed, to hear as the musicians of faultless lip and breath control are to execute?

The Sophomore knows how it comes about. He has been talking with his professor. "The concert enthusiasts," he explains, "read in their program books that there is a preliminary announcement from the horns. They at once find themselves in the tone realm in the quality of travelers; they enter the portals of the symphony in C, guide book in hand, as though they were visiting Lincoln cathedral." This is the Sophomore's way of restating his instructor, who lately told him that the educating and illuminating influence of the annotated programs had, he was sure, much to do with the success of the Symphony concert institution.

Let us suppose that many of the listeners at the Friday rehearsal were of the kind that hold the program book open at the first page all through the performance of the music and read the annotations after they go home. Let us suppose that they do not force the companionship of analysis upon appreciation; let us suppose them insisting that Schubert make his work clear by its innate vigor and logic, make its structure organize itself to their intelligence through its own persuasion of melody, rhythm and color.

If what the books say about the C-major Symphony is to be relied on, the composer needs only straightforward reading to make his message have its force. And here is a conductor giving us such a reading. He himself is standing aside, as it were, that Schubert may speak for himself, reminding us of the self-effacing pedagogue who used to make the pages of the Latin poet so lustrous. Our expert in Bruckner interpretation, the man whom we should have expected to give us a stirring mid-season of orchestral novelties, the man whom we thought a little unsafe as a receiver of classical symphonies, is back in the days of valveless horns, back in the epoch when the trombone was considered by some to be an instrument of panic, and he proves to have as much command of a subdued, captivating style as he has had heretofore of a style broad and thrilling. When we listened to the second movement of the C major symphony and heard its rhythms and harmonies as though the very voice of Schubert were speaking to us, did we think once that Mr. Fieldler's orchestra become modernized in execution and tone beyond the possibility of reaching the appeal of a classic work? No, nor in the second half of the program did we think that the orchestra had become so Teutonic that it could not render sympathetically the thoughts of French composers.

The program of the thirteenth concert, rehearsed on Friday afternoon in Symphony hall, was as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Franck, Symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman"; Saint-Saens, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," symphonic poem No. 1, op. 31; Danse Macabre, symphonic poem No. 3, op. 40.

Heinrich Warnke, first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist of the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon, Jan. 27, and Saturday evening, Jan. 28. He will play the Saint Saens concerto in A minor, op. 33.

A new tone poem, by Friedrich Gernsheim, a Berlin composer, will be given its first Boston performance at this pair of concerts, and Max Reger's variations on a Mevry theme by J. A. Hiller and Wagner's overture to Tannhauser will be played.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY
JANUARY 21, 1911.

TONE PICTURE IS SYMPHONY FEATURE

Brilliant Performance of Schumann's Work Delights Large Audience.

Schumann's wonderful tone picture of old Vienna—in which Schumann fancied he saw the gay capital on the banks of the beautiful blue Danube "more clearly mirrored than ever"—is the feature of this week's Symphony program. This is the lyrical Viennese composer's seventh symphony, the one in C major, which Boston has been hearing off and on, and with ever-increasing pleasure, for wellnigh half a century.

It was one of Mr. Fiedler's successful presentations two years ago this month, and the performance yesterday afternoon was equally successful—sympathetic, brilliant and so enthusiastic that the audience gave one of those unusual demonstrations of delight that end in the hundred members of the virtuoso orchestra standing up to receive the applause.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," which has not been played here since 1904, and two Saint-Saens pieces, the long popular "Omphale's Spinning-Wheel" and the "Danse Macabre," back again after a long absence from Symphony programs, complete one of the most attractive concerts of the season.

HERALD, BOSTON,
JANUARY 22, 1911.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Heinrich Warnke, the admired first 'cellist of the orchestra, will be the soloist at next week's concerts on Friday, the 27th, and Saturday, the 28th. He will play Saint-Saens' concerto for 'cello in A minor, which is generally considered, by all odds, the best and most popular concerto for this instrument.

The novelty will be a tone poem, entitled "To a Drama." It is by Friedrich Gernsheim. Gernsheim is now 71 years old. His second symphony, opus 46, was played here at a Symphony concert as long ago as 1882. "To a Drama" was published in 1910, and brought out by Mr. Nikisch in Berlin last October. Gernsheim is a member of the Senate of the Berlin Academy of Fine Arts.

One of the great successes of Dr. Muck's second season here was Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller. Each season since it was played here requests have come for a repetition.

The program will end with the "Tannhaeuser" overture. The order will be as follows: Gernsheim, tone poem, "To a Drama" (first time in Boston); Reger, "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller," op. 100; Saint-Saens, concerto for 'cello and orchestra in A minor; Wagner, overture to "Tannhaeuser."

SUNDAY GLOBE—
JANUARY 22, 1911.

Gernsheim's Tone Poem the Symphony Novelty.

Mr Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist of the Symphony orchestra, will be the soloist at this week's concerts. He will play Saint-Saens' concerto for 'cello in A-minor, opus 33, which, generally considered, is the most popular concerto of its kind.

Mr Fiedler places a novelty on the program, a tone poem, entitled "To a Drama." The composer is Friedrich Gernsheim and despite the fact that he is now a man of 70 and his second symphony, opus 46, was played at a Symphony concert as long ago as 1882, this work is comparatively fresh from his pen. It will be played in Boston for the first time and probably for the first time in America.

One of the successes of Dr Muck's second season here was Max Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller." Each season since it was played here requests have come for its repetition, and Mr Fiedler places it on the program which will be brought to an end with the "Tannhauser" overture.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,
JANUARY 21, 1911

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

TWO OLD-FASHIONED TONE POEMS AND ONE GENUINE

Saint-Saens's "Danse Macabre" and "Rouet d' Omphale" in Their Contrast to Cesar Franck's "Le Chausseur Maudit"—Saint-Saens's Elegant Parlor Magic and Franck's Sincere Romanticism—Schubert's Symphony in C Major, with Its Enjoyable Detail

However one may regard the length of Schubert's Symphony in C major, all are agreed that it is long. As it was played yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall its length was less than usual a subject of controversy. In general, its structure is lucid enough; the Scherzo is, of course, always unqualifiedly a delight; the andante con moto would be interesting if for no other occupation than watching for the workmanship that is unmistakably Schubertian—a certain wooing of minor phrases in the wood wind, or the frank melody which recurs for the second violins. The first and last movements are monumental. And they were played yesterday afternoon by Mr. Fiedler and his men in a style that made clear their architectural pattern. That pattern is Gothic in the sense of its charm inhering chiefly in its detail. As with the minister front, so with this imposingly patterned work of Schubert. The spectator (or the auditor) sees the mass and the large elements of the design—the towers, the buttresses, the transepts, the apse; yet the parts which arrest and gladden attention are the smaller items of delicate craftsmanship—finial, mullion, tracery, ornate niche, capital, and sculptured fruit and foliage. The Symphony in C major abounds in such beauties, and though they do not dim the grander proportions of the work, or belittle it with finical detail, they make it, after all, the greater pleasure to the listener not to watch the spinning-out of musical thoughts, and to wait for the growth of orchestral climaxes, but to follow the music measure by measure, enjoying this bit and that bit, living, as we say, in a hand-to-mouth fashion, unphilosophically, to be sure, and most pleasantly. For a hundred voices of melody are singing through the first movement in the figurations of accompanying violins; arpeggii rock across the four strings in sparkling song, as sunlight glints off unquiet water; puffs of a wood wind instrument on a single note glide out from a tonal mass into solitary notes, leading into adroit transitional material; or in the andante the strings answer a repeated horn note which soliloquizes pensively: rasping strings work up to a frenzy to fall on blank silence, picked up by the plucked strings of violoncellos to trail off into a legato close. This last sequence has been used over and over by other composers, whether consciously or not does not matter. Schubert designed it, and few have improved on the design.

In the Scherzo the sense of form is inescapable, but it is also filled with admirable and rewarding detail. The clambering tunes for the violins, and the phrase which causes the 'cellos to scramble are a joy. The Finale gets up into the epic scale. It is a masterpiece in its union of melody and rhythm. Here is no experimentation with strange instrumental timbres; here is no searching out of queer devices for effect. It is rich melody finely expressed and borne on in its development by a succession of rhythms the cumulative force of which is irresistible. The spinning triplets in the accompaniment; the repetitions of the big octave shouts of all the strings; the impetuosity of the tempo; in fine, the movement of the thing finally seizes one bodily. We are, by the end of the symphony, as though caught up and borne away across the saddle of a galloping horse. All these are the excitements of the Symphony in C Major, yet it is music of largeness and serenity, too; with all its beauty of detail it still has the simplicity of directness. Schubert was sure of his means and was using them with no unsteady hand. For the Finale, at least, he was guiding the whirlwind and directing the storm.

There is no special reason why Saint-Saëns's "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and "Danse Macabre" should not stand on a programme of the Symphony Orchestra, and there is no special reason why they should. It must be a long time since the "Danse Macabre" has occupied such a position, yet curiosity concerning it was very quickly satisfied and not much even of this emotion would survive a repetition of this slab-sided old "Tone Poem." Its deviltry is very polished. One might, without too great a stretch of terms, call it French. Mr. Witek's violin performed a few solo phrases of fetching characterization with the huskiness, even the hint of rasping harshness which he gave to the tuning of Death's fiddle; the xylophone rattled its bones, the strings and wind began the grotesque measures of the dance. All was decorous. All was polished elegance. It was parlor magic; diablerie in evening dress; very, very tame. It may be possible to play the "Danse Macabre so as to start shudders. It may not be possible. It was not done yesterday and the probabilities are strongly against its being done without an orchestra concealed in dead of night under the tombs of a churchyard lighted by beams of a struggling moon from behind tempest-driven clouds. That might do.

"Omphale's Spinning Wheel" was another case in point. The finish of this work is exquisite. Not only is the theme, as we are informed by the programme note, "conspicuous by its elegance"; it is set off against an interchange of whirring phrases tossed here and there among the stringed instruments with precisely the same effect on the hearing as the blurr of whirling spokes on the eye-sight. A more exact psychological parallel in descriptive music would be a long quest. And when the violoncellos and basses begin mightily but impotently to heave under this spinning music, the effect is that of a powerful body netted and snared in a strong web of silken strands again just the mental image to be suggested. All this is beautifully done, and yet . . . well, for one thing, the tapering end, mounting to a high note for the violins, might be that of a violin solo composed for use in Sunday evening church services whilst the collection plates go round. Both the "Danse Macabre" and this irreproachable "Rouet d'Omphale" are most damnably "the correct thing." And that is all that ails them.

They had their rebuke, not from any reviewing ink (and certainly not from any weariness caused by vain repetitions), but from another, and genuine Tone Poem also by a French composer which stood on the same programme. César Franck may be known by greater works than "Le Chasseur Maudit." It contains passages which are beautiful and daring; it also contains measures and phrases as to which surprise is felt that they should have been allowed, by such a careful craftsman, to remain where they are. The splendid curse intoned by the bass tuba ends, each time, on a note that is disappointing if not commonplace and in anti-climax. Yet the piece as a whole stimulates, and not only so, but satisfies. Its opening measures cause the eye to conjure up broad meadows cooking under the kindly glare of a summer sun at noonday, Sabbath calm, and the mystery of remote horn calls. Bells chime richly over an attuned orchestra. The hunt spurs across this quiet, abrupt and impetuous. Horror and doom sound in the wood winds and basses at the pronunciation of the curse. Then begins the infernal chase with all the wealth of orchestral imagery that the graphic imagination of César Frank can conjure. Wild shouts sound among the strings; sudden gusts; twists, turns, the rout, the full career; always an irresistible onward movement, headlong and blind. We are caught up and whirled away like the lost souls which Dante saw urged on by the furious blasts of hell. Saint-Saëns's diablerie is to this as a boy's false face is to the countenance of a tragedian.

What is the meaning of this difference? Both these composers are Frenchmen. Their styles have many traits in common. Both have the elegance, the fluency and the finish of the Gallic artist. Yet they are as unlike as suavity and earnestness. Their lives may partly explain: Saint-Saëns, prosperous, gladdened by the quick recognition of his talents, with swift rewards for facile work; Franck, obscure, toiling patiently to guide the stumbling fingers of pupils, rising at dawn to snatch the early hours for the composition into which he put the passion of his heart. The minds of the two men still further explain. Saint-Saëns never falls beneath a certain level of competence; and he never rises above a certain altitude of inspiration. The list of his works is long. They are all excellent. They are hardly any of them inspired. The list of César Franck's works is short. And there is hardly one of them that is not inspired. And the shortness of the list is both a perpetual regret for the fee which the world must pay for imposing too laborious a life on this artist, and a prizing of those which we have for a richness and a concentration which might not have been theirs had not the vision of this seer and mystic been forced to turn inward for the idealism which it sought. Saint-Saëns is the Tennyson of composers, César Franck is the Matthew Arnold.

L. P.

SUNDAY POST,
JANUARY 22, 1911

At the Symphony concerts of the 27th and 28th Heinrich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, will play the Saint-Saens concerto in A minor. The novelty of the programme will be Friedrich Gernsheim's tone poem, "To a Drama." Gernsheim is now in his 70th year. A symphony of his was played at the Symphony concerts as far back as 1882. The tone-poem is comparatively fresh from his pen and it will be played in Boston, and for the first time in Boston, and probably in America. Gernsheim is a member of the Senate of the Berlin Academy of Fine Arts. The other big work on the programme will be Max Reger's remarkable variations upon a Merry Theme by J. A. Hiller. Each season since this piece was first played in Boston under Dr. Muck requests have been received at Symphony Hall for its repetition. The "Tannhauser" overture will bring the concert to an end.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY,
JANUARY 22, 1911.

Symphony Program

The program of this week's Symphony concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday night will be as follows:

Tone poem, "To a Drama".....Gernsheim
(First time in Boston).
Variations and fugue on "A Merry Theme," by J. A. Hiller (1770) opus 100.....Max Reger
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra in A-minor, opus 33.....Saint-Saens Overture to the opera "Tannhauser" ..... Wagner
Soloist, Heinrich Warnke.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING. JANUARY 21

SYMPHONY CONCERT WITH NO SOLOIST

SPLENDID ENTERTAINMENT, BOTH CLASSICAL AND GAY

Works of Schubert, Cesar Franck and St. Saens Presented in Manner Above Criticism.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.
Schubert. Symphony in C major.
Franck. "Le Chasseur Maudit."
St. Saens. "Rouet d'Omphale."
St. Saens. Danse Macabre.

It was throughout a splendid concert and presented an orchestral programme that was classical in its beginning and sensational in its ending, but which was without any unsolvable mysteries and which made no extreme demands upon the grey matter in the brains of the auditors. Schubert's symphony was shorn of a little of its "divine length" by avoiding some repetitions and it gained by the process, but it is still rather too reiterative for the modern auditor.

In the work one can trace the influence of Beethoven upon the composer. The use of the trombones, in the coda of the first movement, is one case in point, and the four accented notes which play so important a part in the finale, is another. The four-noted figure is wonderfully close to the same idea in Beethoven's violin concerto. The trombones, however, are in advance of anything written for them by Beethoven; only Mozart had used these instruments so effectively before Schubert's time. They have practically an "obbligato" and for the first time in musical history.

The Hungarian influence upon Schubert is also traceable in the chief theme of the slow movement. Let it be remembered that if Beethoven had died at the same age as Schubert the latter would have been reckoned the greater symphonist of the two. This last symphony of Schubert is one of the greatest "ifs" of musical history. If Schubert had lived, it seems to say, he would have become the greatest of the symphonists.

The performance was of a high order, of course. Technically criticism has long since become mute regarding the Boston Symphony Concerts. One can only speak, here and there, of points of reading, of "tempi" or "nuances."

But the performance was a remarkable one even for our orchestra. In the first movement Mr. Fiedler disregarded the "ma non troppo" attached to the "allegro," and took it at a desperate speed. The trombones at the Coda played nobly. It is like the clash of swords, the alternation of tenor and bass trombone, in this ending.

The slow movement was finely read throughout, and shaded most delicately. The oboe here deserves especial praise, although all the wood-wind deserve encomium.

The third movement was again whipped up to a furious pace, but the figures were clear nevertheless. The great speed of the finale is called for by Schubert himself. It makes the violin triplets of the chief theme almost unplayable, but the artists of our first violin department almost achieved the impossible here, and Mr. Fiedler brought out the figure of four accents grandly. As a consequence this melodious old work received an absolute ovation. Mr. Fiedler was recalled twice, the orchestra was obliged to rise in response, and it was evident that the whole modern school has not obliterated Schubert. No symphony this year has received such applause.

The "Rouet d' Omphale" was very delicately shaded. In listening to the attractive whirling figure one could exclaim with Ophelia: "Oh, how the wheel becomes it!" It ended with a pianissimo that passed the inaudible point, on solo violin.

Cesar Franck is not a Berlioz. His accursed huntsman is what the Germans call a "Sonntagsjaeger", and is under a ban because of his breaking the Sabbath. We may imagine him somewhat like the German hunter in the English drawing-room, after the fox-hunt, when an Englishman just from the African jungle complained that there could be no sport without the element of danger. "Ach so?" spoke up the other, "you vant daincher in hunting. Come hunt with me. Only last week I shot my brodder-in-law in the stummok!" The hunting of the "Chasseur Maudit" was equally dangerous, yet Franck has managed to give the picture without too much spice. He is not such a colorist as St. Saens, and it was very interesting to contrast the two Frenchmen in somewhat similar veins of supernatural music.

The picture of this "Franck tireur" was gloriously played, from the hunting-calls of the beginning to the spice of the ending. It made the best impression of all of the three modern symphonic poems. Of course the music pointed a moral, which may be stated as follows—

Let huntsmen all remember, Sunday
Is not quite fitting for a gun day.
It is a most disgusting habit
On Sunday e'en to shoot a rabbit.
He who on that day hunting goes
Will soon be chased by piccolos
And fierce trombones and basses-double
Will give him every kind of trouble.

The piccolo was finely played, in this; the muted horn gave its dismal and baleful tones; the trombones were mighty in denunciatory phrases; in short it was a reading in which every point was well brought out and Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra may be proud of it.

St. Saens' "Danse Macabre" is always a good specimen of modern orchestral tone-coloring. To mention only a few of the points, there is the bell tolling midnight, upon the harp; there is Death tuning up his violin, with the upper string E-flat instead of E, to make a sinister dissonance; there is the despised xylophone, the instrument of wooden sticks, which pictures the knocking together of the bones of the dancing skeletons better than anything else could do; and there is the crowing of the cock, squeakily imitated upon the oboe. All good points and, at the time of their invention, practically new.

Aside from the tone-coloring there is some very effective counterpoint in the number, showing that polyphony extends even beyond the tomb, or at least into it. Not a point was lost in the interpretation. Mr. Witek played the violin obbligato with much breadth, and the xylophone rang out with surety.

It was just the kind of a programme in which the various tone-colors ought to be allowed to stand forth without any repression, and the virility of the interpretations gave the chief charm to the most enjoyable orchestral concert we have heard for many a month. At the close Mr. Fiedler was again recalled enthusiastically.

RECORD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1911

SYMPHONY WITH NO SOLOIST

From Louis C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser

PROGRAMME.
Schubert. Symphony in C major.
Franck. "Le Chasseur Maudit."
St. Saens. "Rouet d'Omphale."
St. Saens. Danse Macabre.

It was throughout a splendid concert and presented an orchestral programme that was classical in its beginning and sensational in its ending, but which was without any unsolvable mysteries and which made no extreme demands upon the grey matter in the brains of the auditors. Schubert's symphony was shorn of a little of its "divine length" by avoiding some repetitions and it gained by the process, but it is still rather too reiterative for the modern auditor.

In the work one can trace the influence of Beethoven upon the composer. The use of the trombones, in the coda of the first movement, is one case in point, and the four accented notes which play so important a part in the finale, is another. The four-noted figure is wonderfully close to the same idea in Beethoven's violin concerto. The trombones, however, are in advance of anything written for them by Beethoven; only Mozart had used these instruments so effectively before Schubert's time. They have practically an "obbligato" and for the first time in musical history.

The Hungarian influence upon Schubert is also traceable in the chief theme of the slow movement. Let it be remembered that if Beethoven had died at the same age as Schubert the latter would have been reckoned the greater symphonist of the two. This last symphony of Schubert is one of the greatest "ifs" of musical history. If Schubert had lived, it seems to say, he would have become the greatest of the symphonists.

The performance was of a high order, of course. Technically criticism has long since become mute regarding the Boston Symphony Concerts. One can only speak, here and there, of points of reading, of "tempi" or "nuances."

Cesar Franck is not a Berlioz. His accursed huntsman is what the Germans call a "Sonntagsjaeger", and is under a ban because of his breaking the Sabbath. We may imagine him somewhat like the German hunter in the English drawing-room, after the fox-hunt, when an Englishman just from the African jungle complained that there could be no sport without the element of danger. "Ach so?" spoke up the other, "you vant daincher in hunting. Come hunt with me. Only last week I shot my brodder-in-law in the stummok!" The hunting of the "Chasseur Maudit" was equally dangerous, yet Franck has managed to give the picture without too much spice. He is not such a colorist as St. Saens, and it was very interesting to contrast the two Frenchmen in somewhat similar veins of supernatural music.

The picture of this "Franck tireur" was gloriously played, from the hunting-calls of the beginning to the spice of the ending. It made the best impression of all of the three modern symphonic poems. Of course the music pointed a moral, which may be stated as follows—

Let huntsmen all remember, Sunday
Is not quite fitting for a gun day.
It is a most disgusting habit
On Sunday e'en to shoot a rabbit.
He who on that day hunting goes
Will soon be chased by piccolos
And fierce trombones and basses-double
Will give him every kind of trouble.

Heinrich Warnke, the first 'cellist of the orchestra, will be the soloist at next week's symphony concerts. He will play Saint-Saens Concerto for violoncello in A-minor, Op. 33, which generally considered is by all odds the most popular concerto of its kind and the concerto most grateful to the instrument.

POST, SATURDAY, JANUARY 21, 1911

SYMPHONY MEN WIN LAURELS

Performance of Schubert's Great Work Appreciated

Schubert's big C major symphony was the most exciting thing that occurred at the public rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon. It was played with a finish, a precision and a nice adjustment of details that is rare even for the Boston Orchestra, and the audience showed clearly that it appreciated the fact. Three of the most vivid of the modern French symphonic poems formed the second section of the programme.

The C major symphony is Schubert's one titanic effort. In it the nightingale is turned eagle; the over youthful romanticist is become master of classic forms on a huge scale. The symphony is famous as having been refused performances in Schubert's lifetime on account of its extreme difficulty, and even today, with our orchestras trained to the demands of Strauss and Rachmaninoff it remains a test. It is Schubert's most considerable achievement in the old forms, barring perhaps, a few of the quartets.

For Virtuoso Orchestra

The C major gains something of the heroic inspiration of Beethoven, and looks forward to Brahms in its fusing of hot romantic fervor with the old classic restraint and control. But all this cannot be shown in its true proportions except by an orchestra of the very first order, such as Bostonians never tire of proclaiming is maintained in only one city in America, and by a conductor whose care and patience have no limit. We are in the habit of making all our comments on the Boston Orchestra in the superlative degree, but the performance of yesterday seemed to out-Herod Herod. The faultless blending and shading of the difficult wood-wind parts, in the first movement; the final nicety in the "keying" of the andante, which is ruined if its tempo is a shade too fast or too slow; the ravishing sensuousness of the trio of the scherzo; the full-blooded virility of the final movement, as though Hercules were scaling Olympus; all these Mr. Fiedler emphasized with a balanced sympathy and a perfection of control over his band that the audience was not slow to appreciate. Both he and the orchestra were obliged to rise in response to its applause.

The three symphonic poems were Cesar Franck's "Le Chausseur Maudit," and Saint-Saens' "Le Rouet d'Omphale" and "Danse Macabre." Franck, the past master of absolute music and the apostle of Bach among the vagaries of the Republican French, is in a queer role, depicting in programme music a weird German spook ballad. The result is what might be expected. In the earlier part, which is static scene painting, he is the exalted, masterful artist that has left so deep an impress on the modern French school; in the latter part, in which the wild huntsman is pursued and captured by the fiends of hell, he is a little lacking in inventive resource, a little too overpowered by the sense of obligation adequately to describe the affair. But the music is masterly in orchestral sonority and finesse, and, like all the work of the great French teacher, contains not one insincere note.

Grotesqueness Lacking

The Saint-Saens familiar poems showed again the peculiar deftness and finish which seems to be the French contribution to all art. The spinning wheel of Omphale was imitated by Mr. Fiedler's men with delightful delicacy. The skeleton dance was hardly so satisfactory; Mr. Fiedler seemed unwilling to give it that unrestrained accentuation of rhythm and contrast that undoubtedly cheapens it, but still comes nearer expressing the composer's idea of grotesque caricature.

The programme was one of those "ordinary" ones which do not extend the rush line to Gainsborough street, but do make the judicious think a second time and bless their luck.

TRAVELER, TUESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1911

CECILIA CONCERT

The Cecilia Society gave a concert last evening at Jordan Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. Mme. Melis of the Boston Opera Company was the soloist for the operatic numbers on the programme. The following numbers were rendered by the Cecilia: "150th Psalm," Franck; "Love-Waltzes," Bhahms; "Wings of a Dove," Brockway; "The Wild Brier," Lang; "The Jumblies," Foote; "Salamaleikum," Cornelius. Mme. Melis sang the following: "Barcarolla," Meyerbeer; "Vissi d'Arte," Puccini; "Un bel di vedremo," from "Madama Butterfly," and some Neapolitan boat songs. Mr. Anton Witek, concert-master of the Boston Symphony, played the following numbers: "La Folia," Corelli; Romance in E Major, Sinding; Minuetto, Raff; Three Hungarian Dances, Brahms-Joachim.

Mme. Melis was easily the star attraction of the evening, her rendering of the Neapolitan boat songs being a concert hit very much out of the ordinary; the sweep of them and the mystic beauty, the rhythm and color, all Mme. Melis brought out with charming effect. Her grand opera arias were sung with her characteristic dramatic power, which makes her one of the greatest dramatic sopranos on the opera stage today.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN SUNDAY, JANUARY 22, 1911.

SYMPHONY COMPLETE WITHOUT SOLOIST

No Place for Small Fiddler or Long-Haired Pianist, Says Johns.

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

There was no soloist at the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday, but the program was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable of the season. After all a Symphony concert is no place for a little man with a fiddle or a long haired piano player.

The soloist breaks up the concert by his presence, and in nine cases out of ten performs a concerto which is more distinguished for technical obstacles than beauty.

The orchestra composers have had the entertainment, pleasure and instruction of their hearers nearest their hearts, and a concert of purely orchestral music is always a feast of musical loveliness.

Yesterday's concert was no exception. There is no more entrancing, wholly charming work than that master composition of Schubert, the Symphony in C, known as the Seventh.

Three short tone poems, "The Wild Huntsman" of Franck, and "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre" by Saint Saens made up the second part. The Franck number is pretty music, but as description is not particularly accurate or effective.

"Omphale's Spinning Wheel" is a charming picture of the entwining of Hercules in the soft meshes of Omphale's wiles.

The "Danse Macabre," sometimes called "The Dance of Death," is descriptive of an orgy of skeletons and spirits. The clicking of the bones of the skeletons mingle with the wild strains of the dance, which continues until oboe the crows like a rooster to announce the coming of dawn. It was played with a wild abandon that is wierdly impressive.

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY, JANUARY 27, 1911

The Symphony Orchestra departs on Sunday for a week of concerts at Pittsburg, Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Syracuse and Albany. The band has not played in Pittsburg for seventeen years; the other cities it has visited oftener. For several of the concerts, Mr. Fiedler has chosen Rachmaninoff's second symphony which is wholly new to the Middle West and in which conductor and orchestra shine. Mr. Witek and Mr. Schroeder will be the "soloists" of the expedition.

BOSTON SUNDAY GLOBE JANUARY 29, 1911

Symphony Orchestra Tour.

There will be no symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will be away on its annual trip to the middle west. There will be nearly 100 in the party, and the first concert will be given tomorrow evening in Memorial hall, Pittsburg.

Tuesday evening the concert will be given in Gray's armory, Cleveland; Wednesday, in Valentine theatre, Toledo; Thursday, in the light guard armory, Detroit; Friday, in Convention hall, Buffalo; Saturday, in the Wieting opera house, Syracuse, and Monday, in Harmanus Bleecker hall, Albany.

Mr Anton Witek will be the soloist in Pittsburg, Toledo, Buffalo, Detroit and Syracuse; Mr Schroeder in Cleveland, and Mme Yolande Mero, the pianist, in Albany. The orchestra will return Tuesday morning, Feb 7.

Cecilia and Boston Symphony.

Thursday evening, Feb 16, is the date set for the second concert by the Cecilia society and the Boston symphony orchestra under the leadership of Max Fiedler. The work to be given then will be Gabriel Pierne's musical legend, "The Children's Crusade," which the Cecilia has given twice in recent years with much success.

In addition to the chorus of the Cecilia society there will be a chorus of 100 children and the entire Symphony orchestra will be employed.

Edmond Clement, the distinguished French tenor, will make his first appearance in concert in Boston on that occasion. The other soloists will be Mme Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mrs Edith Chapman Goold and Claude Cunningham.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, JANUARY 29, 1911

There will be no Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will be away on its annual trip to the Middle West. In a special train composed of four Pullmans, a baggage car and a diner, the orchestra leaves Boston this (Sunday) afternoon at 3 o'clock for Pittsburg. There will be nearly 100 in the party. The first concert will be given tomorrow evening in Memorial Hall, Pittsburg; Tuesday evening the concert will be given in Gray's Armory, Cleveland; Wednesday, in Valentine Theatre, Toledo; Thursday in the Light Guard Armory, Detroit; Friday in Convention Hall, Buffalo; Saturday in the Wieting Opera House, Syracuse, and Monday in Harmanus Bleecker Hall, Albany.

Mr. Anton Witek will be the soloist in Pittsburg, Toledo, Buffalo, Detroit and Syracuse; Mr. Schroeder in Cleveland, and Mme. Yolande Mero, the pianist, in Albany. The orchestra will be back in Boston early Tuesday morning, Feb. 7. There will then be two concerts, when the orchestra goes away on its fourth Southern trip.

BOSTON GLOBE
JANUARY 21, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Schubert's C Major Symphony and Three Modern French Symphonic Poems Make Up the Program.

The program of the 13th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon included a symphony by Schubert, No. 7, in C major, and three symphonic poems. They were Cesar Franck's "The Wild Huntsman" and "Onphale's Spinning Wheel," and the "Danse Macabre" by Saint-Saens.

Rarely this year has a purely orchestral number elicited such general and prolonged applause as did this symphony of Schubert's yesterday afternoon. It pleads eloquently for simplicity, for clarity and for true euphony in music. There is within it a wellspring of sweet waters. There are streams of melody, fresh, spontaneous and gracious. It is a font of vernal song.

There is also to be heard the note of personal victory. This symphony is sometimes called No. 10. One annotater calls it No. 9. It was Schubert's last. He began it in March and in November he died.

Previously the symphonic form had baffled him. It was too sustained and long-breathed for the span of his inspiration. His was the genius for the short song, the sudden flash of imagination, that could dash off, surrounded by merry-making friends at a table in a tavern, a lyric of imperishable beauty, as the "Hark! Hark! the Lark."

Had he been content to produce songs fluently, even as a master, he would have been a lesser artist. He persevered and this symphony, one of the treasures of all romantic literature, was the result, although he did not live to hear it performed.

With what directness and spontaneity he makes his points of contrast, of emphasis, of quiet emotion, ravishing cantilena, or of dramatic exultation!

Into the precise and formal elegance of classical forms he infused the ardor, the imaginative and enkindling glow of the young romanticism. It is essentially lyric and perchance therein lies the basis of its distinction, although the definitions of the "romantic" school are legion, even to contending that its music causes surprise.

Schubert made the orchestra sing as a pulsating, vibrant human instrument. He asks even the trombones to intone an independent, well-defined melody in the second division of the first movement. Thus began the progress of these stately instruments up to the scores of Strauss, where they are bidden to play with the agility of a piccolo.

It is this lyric impulse from within, to sing of nature, of the hearts' emotions, of simple joys, of sorrow, even of gentle melancholy, that betokened the rising romanticists, Wordsworth, Coleridge and Byron in literature, as Schubert, Schumann and Weber in music.

Therefore every note of this symphony is to be sung. The orchestra often had to supply its own impetus yesterday in this belcanto, what scope for infinite graduations of nuance in the slow movement. As it was, the euphony of the instruments as they sang together was rare and wondrous—the finesse with which Mr Longy played the exquisite opening phrase, and with which Mr Grigsz repeated it.

Here is truly symphonic music. The themes have distinction and nobility of profile. There is fecundity and resourcefulness of invention. There is a clear and emotional sense of orchestral color and contrast, and Schubert was a pioneer in the offsetting parts of his wood choir one against another.

Cesar Franck, the mystic, the man of religious fervor, was not such a one as should take deep joy in the desecration of the Sabbath by the wild huntsman of legend, nor even to write graphically of the curse upon him, or of the demons' pursuit of him. The music portraying the hallowed peace of the countryside is true to nature. The diabolical music has been better done by Berlioz in his "Damnation of Faust," and by Bossi in the "Hell" of his "Paradise Lost."

It is said that Hercules, returning to Thebes, spent with toil, fell into a sickness then raging, and attempted the murder of his friend, Iphitus, or as some say, attempted to steal the sacred tripod from Apollo's temple at Delphi, for the which he was condemned to slavery for three years.

He entered the service of Omphale, queen of Lydia, and learned to spin wool with her hand maidens, while she wore his lion skin and carried his club. Who shall not say she is the prototype of the English suffragette?

Instead of making her a coquette in the smooth-tongued oboe, had Saint-Saens made her a dauntless, fearsome and terrible person, who would even storm the house of lords or a London squadron of police, his symphonic poem might have been at least imposing. It was brilliantly played, as was the familiar "Danse Macabre."

Boston American
Feb 24 1910.

ORCHESTRA AWAY.

No Symphony Concert in Boston This Week.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra will be away on its annual trip to the Middle West. In a special train composed of four Pullmans, a baggage car and a diner, the orchestra leaves Boston this afternoon at three o'clock for Pittsburg. There will be nearly one hundred in the party. The first concert will be given to-morrow evening in Memorial Hall, Pittsburg; Tuesday evening, the concert will be given in Gray's Armory, Cleveland; Wednesday in Valentine Theatre, Toledo; Thursday in the Light Guard Armory, Detroit; Friday in Convention Hall, Buffalo. Saturday in the Wieting Opera House, Syracuse, and Monday in Harmanus Bleecker Hall, Albany.

GLOBE—TUESDAY.
JANUARY 24, 1911.

WITH MELIS AND WITEK.

Cecilia Society and Soloists Give Curiously Varied Program to Large Audience at Jordan Hall.

A rich program, curiously various, was given last night in Jordan hall by the Cecilia society to a large audience, which was so enthusiastic as sometimes to seem to lack discrimination.

Mr Fiedler conducted, and the club had the assistance of Anton Witek, the violinist, with Mrs Witek playing his accompaniments superbly, and Mme Carmen Melis, the prima donna from the opera house.

The chorus sang the wonderful setting of the 150th Psalm by C. Cesar Franck, with its misty organ accompaniment, trying major and minor variations of simple chords until the grave volume of men's voices breaks forth in solemn hallelujahs that mount to heaven itself in the piling harmony. The little work is a gem of ray unusually serene for a modern French composer, and it was read with immense breadth.

Next came the richly colored but somewhat heavy "Love-Waltzes" by Brahms, nine of them, and hardly a sway or swing in a single one. To be sure, two of them are very pretty and one is actually uplifting, but one listens to a good deal of purple chaff to get these grains of sustenance.

The second part of the program contained the old favorite "Wings of a Dove," by Howard Brockway, which has not been sung now for some time; Margaret Ruthven Lang's effective "Wild-Brier" for women's chorus, Arthur Foote's whimsical fugue of Edward Lear's nonsense verse about "The Jumblies," whose heads are green and whose hands are blue, and who insisted on going to sea in a sieve, and finally —oldest favorite of all—the "Salamaleikum" from "The Barber of Bagdad." Earl Cartwright, with a beautiful voice in splendid condition, sang the solo part. He was magnificent and somehow, with his fine, big, round tones, his quiet, suave manner, and his unctuousness, made the whole scene appear visible by his singing. It was a most satisfying ending to a curiously mixed evening.

Mr Witek began with "La Follia," by Corelli, a most uninteresting series of variations; his playing awoke admiration, but the thing was more a stunt than a musical composition. His next group of pieces, while calling for as much virtuoso playing, was far more enjoyable.

With utmost delicacy he played the singing "Romance in E major," and in a tone as fine and as keen as a stiletto he uttered the delicious phrases of a Raff minuet. The group concluded with three Hungarian dances by Brahms, arranged by Joachim. Mrs Witek's playing of the piano accompaniments was in itself a sheer treat; one wishes she played much more in public in this city.

Mme Melis sang twice, her rich voice showing sometimes a little scratchy trace of the hard usage it gets in opera singing, but retaining a freshness and flexibility that is as amazing as it is delicious. In the demi-voix passages, she fairly won her hearers, singing a tone so pure and without a trace of breathiness that it actually thrilled people.

Her first group of songs included a Meyerbeer barcarolle and the "Vissi d'arte" from "Tosca"; the second "Un bel di vedreme" from "Madam Butterfly" and a lovely Neapolitan folk-song. She came back each time for an encore, singing for her last song in most delicious French "Vous aurez beau faire."

MONITOR, BOSTON
JANUARY 24, 1911

CECILIA CONCERT.

The Cecilia's part-song concert at Jordan hall last night left the impression of one of the most brilliant musical occasions of the winter. Only 100 seats were put on sale, the rest being used for the guests of the society.

Mme. Carmen Melis, soprano, and Anton Witek, violin, were the assisting artists. Mr. Fiedler conducted, with Malcolm Lang and Miss Ingraham at the piano and John P. Marshall at the organ.

The chief feature of the program were the Brahms waltzes, sung delightfully, with the echoing phrases tossed lightly and fleetly and securely from the men's voices to the women's and back.

Miss Lang's charming new part song for women's voices, "Wild Brier," was sung with the interwoven lines unusually clear and free—perhaps because this new work reaches so pure a region of musical excellence. It is a work of the Cecilia to give native composers a hearing, and Howard Brockway's "Wings of a Dove" and Mr. Foote's "Jumblies" made with Miss Lang's song a group of more than compatriotic interest. Miss Lang's work seems however to have the most individual character.

Earl Cartwright sang the Salamaleikum solo splendidly, and the assisting artists were so warmly appreciated that they had to answer to encores, Mme. Melis' Neapolitan songs being especially applauded.

The society was never in better voice, and Mr. Fiedler is plainly securing from them tonal effects to give that luster and sparkle which unaccompanied singing sometimes lacks. He proves that the voices can blend even as instruments do, without losing all individual quality.

TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY.
JANUARY 24, 1911

Jordan Hall: The Cecilia

THE officers of the Cecilia and the subscribers to its concerts entertained the chorus, that is the chief pleasure of them, at Jordan Hall last evening. They invited the choristers to hear Mr. Witek the concert master of the Symphony Orchestra, in violin pieces, and Mme. Melis of the Opera House in fragments of "Tosca" and "Madama Butterfly" and in more pleasurable Italian songs. The choristers had tickets, without money and without price for their friends, whom they may not, under the new dispensation, ask to the concerts in Symphony Hall. The chorus, in return, sang four or five pieces out of its repertory of previous years that could not have a place in the concerts of the society on the scale on which they are now conducted. The occasion was, in short, a family affair, to which the public was only an accessory, and the reviewer, if he happened to stray inadvertently into Jordan Hall, a superfluity—the tertium quid that really had no place between hosts and guests.

Of course, the mistaken fellow tried to make polite amends for his inadvertence and the concert gave him fortunate occasion for them. If Mme. Melis's upper tones are not altogether to be admired in the concert-room, as in the opera house, because they are often a little shrill, pinched and dry, her middle voice, unforced in the easy spaces of Jordan Hall, has unusual charm of texture. In the opera house she must make her large effects. In the concert-room she could sing French and Italian songs with unexpected grace of phrase. Often on the stage Mme. Melis seems to be trying to do a little more than she can accomplish. Last night she was at her ease and she measured justly the relative reticence of the concert-room beside the opera house. Again, if Mr. Witek was only dryly accurate in his playing of Corelli's "La Follia" —the composer believed the music "mad" variations and Mr. Witek made them rectitude conscious of its own technical perfections—the warmth of tone and the rhythmic elasticity that he brought to Brahms's dances showed that after all he can feel as well as expound, and not always crush a little piece under the weight of his talents. As for the chorus, heard in Franck's setting of a joyful Psalm, in some of Brahms's waltzes that waltz only studiously, and in part-songs by Brockway, Foote and Miss Lang, it is walking faithfully in the new ways of Mr. Fiedler. He seeks largeness of tone, vigor of enunciation, clear emphases, sharp contrasts. His scale is large and the singing of the Cecilia is expanding to it. The quality of the new tone is another thing. The old fineness, the old transparency, the old delicate variations of volume and emphasis—the old beauty and the old suggestion in short—returned in the singing of Miss Lang's little piece. The voices were as luminous or as shadowed as the music.

sung in Boston, and his Faust used to be a Faust of romance.

Minor items of news from the Symphony Orchestra are that the deferred concert for the Pension Fund is now set for the evening of Sunday, March 12; and that Mr. Scharwenka, the pianist and composer whom American audiences knew in the nineties and who has now returned again from Berlin, will play one of his own concertos in the Symphony Concerts of next month.

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY
JANUARY 24, 1911

CECILIA SOCIETY CONCERT.

The Cecilia Society, Mr. Max Fiedler conductor, was last night heard at Jordan hall in one of the most interesting concerts of the season. We reiterate, that in all America, there exists no better organization of this type than our own Cecilia Society. The spontaneity and wholesomeness of the voices in this body, is a thing unheard of; while the unity, the "oneness," with which they sing is remarkable. This chorus has improved much under Mr. Fiedler's baton, and especially in that vital, and to most choruses, intangible quality—attack. It was impossible to detect ragged edges anywhere in the performance, last night.

The first part of the programme included Cesar Franck's "One Hundred and Fiftieth Psalm," and the Brahms "Love Waltzes." We took the keenest delight in seeing Brahms removed from his usual pedestal of complexity and depth, and we found him in his happiest mood. Little cared we that his love-making was more intellectual than emotional, and deliberative rather than passionate.

The second part of the programme was given over to American composers, Howard Brockway, Margaret Lang, and Arthur Foote. Especially to be commended is Mr. Foote's musical setting to Edward Lear's nonsense rhyme, "The Jumblies"—a master work of its kind.

The assisting artists last night were Mme. Carmen Melis, dramatic soprano, and Mr. Anton Witek, violinist.

One cannot but admire the ease and precision with which Mr. Witek plays anything and everything. At times, however, his repose is maddening. We often prayed that some irresistible force might arrive on the scene to upset him. He played best the Hungarian Dances, Brahms-Joachim, and these he interpreted with marvellous abandon and splendid artistry, letting rampant the wild passions of the Slavs as none but the greatest artists can loose them.

It was indeed a pleasure to hear Mme. Carmen-Melis off the operatic stage. She sang an aria from "Tosca," a Barcarolla of Meyerbeer and the famous aria from Madama Butterfly, "Un bel di vendrema." Although in poor condition to sing in concert, where defects are always glaringly exposed, yet she sang—especially the last aria—with great dramatic ability. A large audience recalled both singer and violinist many times. Mme. Witek was an admirable accompanist for her husband.

We look forward with keen anticipation to the coming joint concert of the Cecilia society and the Symphony orchestra, when Pierne's "Children's Crusade" will be presented, with soloists and a children's choir added to the regular chorus.

BOSTON HERALD, TUES
JANUARY 24, 1911.

CECILIA SOCIETY CONCERT.

Work of Two Soloists Attracts Interest of Audience.

The Cecilia Society, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, gave a concert last night in Jordan Hall. The program was as follows: 150th Psalm, Franck; Love-Waltzes, Brahams; "Wings of a Dove," Brockway; "The Wild Brier," Lang; "The Jumblies," Foote; "Salamaleikum," Cornelius. Mr. Witek, violinist, played these pieces: "La Follia," Corelli; Romance in E Major, Sinding; Minuetto, Raff; Three Hungarian Dances, Brahms-Joachim; Mme. Carmen-Melis sang these songs: "Barcarolla," Meyerbeer; "Vissi d'Arte," Puccini; "Un bel di vedremo," from "Madama Butterfly," Puccini, and a Neapolitan song.

The program was thoroughly enjoyable. A large audience was present. The appearance of two soloists of ability did not emphasize Hermann Klein's assertion that concert-goers are "star" worshippers. The interest of the audience in the work of the society was not lessened by the appearance of the soloists. The judicious balance of parts, the blending of the voices and a general excellence made the work of the society especially noteworthy in the "Psalm" by Franck and in the "Wings of a Dove" by Brockway. The former was given with breadth and fervor, the latter with fine finish.

Cornelius was a follower of Liszt and a champion of Wagner. His "Barber of Bagdad" was a failure when produced in Weimar. It was later a success in Dresden and other European cities. The Salamaleikum, with Mr. Cartwright's solo, was an interesting number. The excerpt, however, points to cantata rather than operatic part-writing.

Mr. Witek played with the judgment and musicianly feeling of one who summons music in reverence. This high seriousness is as compelling as it is artistic. Mr. Witek presupposes excellency of phrasing, technic and tone. In Sinding's Romance he played with feeling; the Brahms dances were alive with imagination. Filigree and cadenza work do not tempt him. He is always the reverent apostle, and by this token his playing is the more masterful. Mrs. Witek accompanied him.

The calibre, breadth and power of her voice mark Mme. Melis as an opera singer. Last evening she displayed these qualities. The selections from "Tosca" and "Madama Butterfly" were sung with her usual tragic impressiveness. Meyerbeer's Barcarolle became operatic. The whole being of the woman was alive with histrionic force, but this and musicianship are two different things.

RECORD, SATURDAY,
JANUARY 28, 1911

WARNKE A GREAT CELLIST

(From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser.)

Boston might almost be called "Violoncelloville," for our city has always had eminent players upon this instrument within its walls. In paleolithic times there was Wulf Fries; in later days we had Fritz Giese, who at one time was probably the best violoncellist in the world; Lee Schulz, Carl Barth, Alwyn Schroeder, form a list of which any city may be proud. Mr. Heinrich Warnke need not fear his juxta-position with the other great ones. He is an artist to the finger tips. Just a trifle too classic to be fully recognized by the mob, always too reserved to play at the galleries. Boston, nevertheless, recognizes in him a worthy equal to the great ones who have exploited the instrument here. This was shown by the welcome he received when he came out for his solo.

He at once set himself to earning this greeting. Excellent bowing, commendable breadth, especially in C string passages, an expressive and sympathetic tone, absolute surety of intonation, good attention to ensemble, steadiness in high position work, these were some of the points to commend. The work itself is not the greatest of violoncello compositions although it is melodic and well-contrasted. In spite of its unexciting character, Mr Warnke was called out three times after he had completed it.

There is nothing to say at this late day about the "Tannhauser" overture. It remains as gigantic a work as when we first heard it in Harvard Symphony days. It was grandly performed. We were comfortably satisfied to hear Virtue on the trombones triumph over Vice on the piccolo; we enjoyed again that Pilgrim's theme of brasses caught in a violin rainstorm without an umbrella. The orchestra gave the ending in a manner which enabled the residents of Chelsea and Roslindale to get a good idea of the work without leaving home. Altogether this was the most "fortissimo" concert that we have recently heard, but as the loud effects were all in place we may end by singing—a la Schumann—"Ich grolle nicht."

The second joint concert of the Cecilia Society and the Symphony, Max Fiedler conductor, will be given in Symphony Hall Feb. 16. The work to be performed will be Pierne's "The Children's Crusade," one of the most delightful choral works that has come out in many years.

[147]

TIGHT BINDING

MONITOR, BOSTON, JANUARY 28, 1911.

MPHONY CONCERT.

There was a time when the Symphony chestra, in playing Wagner's overture "Tannhauser," exerted what everydy supposed to be the full strength its choir of brasses. When Herr ericke consented to let the obnoxious ombone speak the Pilgrim theme with nrestrained voice, there was apprehenion in conservative quarters for the rchestra's good name. Here is a quesion wherewith to bring our musical emory to a pose: Was the Gericke prouncement of the principal melody in he closing portion of the overture maestically sonorous, as we used to think, was it loud merely by comparison ith the ordinary trombone utterances the orchestra?

As Mr. Fiedler conducted this music on riday afternoon, the great brass chorus as impressive enough, indeed; but it ade nobody think that the players on he right hand side of the Symphony atform were being urged to remarkable xertions. The "Tannhauser" overture as given at the close of a program call-ng for only everyday service on the part of the brass players. If it had been heard on the same platform with a Bruckner symphony, there would be good eason for its tone volume seeming comaratively small. But in association ith Reger's Hiller Variations and with concert overture by a German conervative, it should at least have sounded agnerian. But it did not. It only unded Schumannesque, or something of at sort. It was uplifting, thrilling, of urse; but it was decidedly old fashned, too.

And what of the Hiller Variations, ter their three years' rest on the Symony library shelf? They remain just hat they proved themselves to be on e day when Dr. Muck first presented em, the only piece in the Symphony pertory which a listener can follow by e notes in the pink covered book with-t going astray. They are a triumph program music, or they would be if ly they were program music. They e, in truth, a delightful little group of pers written in the best essay style. ey start to deal with an artificial and cient subject as essays often do, for ey must have their foundations in the own and accepted; and they associate is quaint subject with all sorts of modn fancies, to the great intellectual reeshment of the reader.

The new piece by Gernsheim assures us that there exists a generation of musical theorists in Germany. Would that there were also music censors, and would that composers were obliged to submit all their scores to them before publication! If during the last 20 years Richard Strauss had been made to clarify his instrumentation according to the methods of Gernsheim, we should find much less to quarrel with in his tone poems than we do; and probably no ideas worth preserving to posterity would have been lost in the process either.

Attention, all dancers who are looking for classic music to interpret with your steps, gestures and attitudes! Go and ask Heinrich Warnke to play for you the section of ballet music in the first Saint-Saens 'cello concerto; ask him, of course to bring good assistants to play the orchestral part, for there is where the rhythmic inspiration lies. Saint-Saens based his music of this concerto on his every day experiences. If while planning it he had lived in close touch with out of doors, we should hear echoes of forest or sea, or what not in it; but he lived close to the stage of the Paris opera and therefore we principally hear the tip-toe tread of the ballerina as she crosses from rear stage right to front stage center, and geometrically retires to rear stage left, there to let herself down from her "points" and become a plantigrade like the rest of us.

Friedrich Gernsheim, tone-poem, "To a Drama" (first time in Boston); Max Reger, variations and fugue on a merry theme by J. A. Hiller (1770), op. 100; Saint-Saens, concerto No. 1, for violoncello and orchestra in A minor, op. 33; Wagner, overture to the opera "Tannhauser." Soloist, Heinrich Warnke.

NOTES.

The Cecilia Society, Max Fiedler conductor, gives its second concert, with the Boston Symphony orchestra assisting, Thursday evening, Feb. 16, in Symphony hall. The society will perform Gabriel Pierne's "The Children's Crusade." The soloists include Edmond Clement, the French tenor, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York, who sings the narrative portions of the legend; Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who sings the part of Alain; Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, who sings the lines of Allys, and Claude Cunningham, who represents the Sailor. There will be a chorus of 175 Cecilia singers and an auxiliary choir of 100 young voices from Mr. Hadley's Somerville school classes.

* * *

The Boston Symphony orchestra appears in Pittsburg Monday evening, Jan. 30, for the first time since 1893. It plays in Cleveland Tuesday, in Toledo Wednesday, in Detroit Thursday, in Buffalo Friday, in Syracuse Saturday, and in Albany Monday, Feb. 6. The soloists of the western trip are Anton Witek, Alwyn Schroeder and Mme. Yolanda Mero. The next pair of Boston concerts is on Friday afternoon, Feb. 10, and Saturday evening, Feb. 11, when Xaver Scharwenka will be the soloist.

The fifth Cambridge symphony concert will be given in Sanders theater, Thursday evening, Feb. 9. The soloist will be Edmond Clement.

HERALD, BOSTON, JANUARY 29, 1911

RCHESTRA'S WESTERN TRIP

here will be no Symphony concerts week, as the orchestra will be away its annual trip to the middle West. orchestra leaves in a special train afternoon at 3 o'clock for Pittsburg. re will be nearly 100 in the party. first concert will be given tomorrow ning in Memorial Hall, Pittsburg. nday evening the concert will be n in Gray's Armory, Cleveland; dnesday evening in Valentine Thea- Toledo; Thursday in the Light rd Armory, Detroit; Friday in Conion Hall, Buffalo; Saturday in the ting Opera House, Syracuse, and nday in Harmanus Bleecker Hall, Al-. Mr. Witek will be the soloist in burg, Toledo, Buffalo, Detroit and cuse; Mr. Schroeder in Cleveland, Mme. Yolande Mero, the pianist, in any. The orchestra wil be back in on early Tuesday morning, Feb. 7. e will then be two concerts, when orchestra goes away on its fourth hern trip.

SECOND CECILIA CONCERT.

hursday evening, Feb. 16, is the date for the second concert by the Cecia Society and the Boston Symphony hestra, under the leadership of Mr. dler. The work will be Gabriel rne's musical legend, "The Chilen's Crusade," which the Cecilia has en twice in recent years with much cess. In addition to the chorus of Cecilia Society there will be a chof 100 children, and, of course, the ire Symphony orchestra will be emoyed.

dmond Clement, the distinguished nch tenor, will make his first appearance in concert in Boston on this occasion. The other soloists will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold and Claude Cunningham. Tickets are now selling at Symphony Hall.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY JANUARY 28, 1911.

WARNKE SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY

Young 'Cellist Heard to Advantage in Saint-Saens Concerto.

There was a home soloist at the Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon and the warm, romantic tone of Heinrich Warnke, the orchestra's young 'cello leader, was heard to rare advantage in the Saint-Saens concerto first brought to the Symphony programs a dozen years ago by Mr. Warnke's desk mate, Alwin Schroeder. The piece favors Mr. Warnke's beautiful lyric style better than any other which he has played here since he made his debut with the Volkmann concerto four years ago. He was rather nervous, but the audience greatly enjoyed both his tone and his technic. He shyly took several recalls.

There was a novelty on the program, a tone poem by Frederich Gernsheim, entitled "To a Drama," which on this occasion probably had its first American performance. It made a fair impression. Some of the themes are expressive and melodious.

So far as the orchestra is concerned the features of this week's performance are the splendid fugue in the Reger variations on a theme from Hiller's operetta, "The Harvest Wreath," and the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser." Here the orchestra played yesterday in its most brilliant manner. There was an ovation for Conductor Fiedler and his men after the Reger number. The orchestra finally had to take the applause standing.

MR. WARNKE SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY

SHOWED HIMSELF ARTIST OF THE FIRST RANK

Tone Poem by Gernsheim and Variations by Max Reger Works of Breadth and Power.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Friedrich Gernsheim. Tone-poem "To a Drama."
Max Reger. Variations and Fugue to a Merry Theme.
Saint-Saens. Concerto for violoncello and orchestra, in A minor.
Soloist, Mr. Heinrich Warnke.
Wagner. "Tannhauser" overture.

A concert that was thoroughly symphonic and dignified in its character from first to last. Gernsheim has been composing for a long time (he is over seventy), but this latest work seems to show that "age cannot wither" his symphonic powers. This work has been hailed in Germany as the most successful that has yet been produced by the veteran. It is naturally not in the wild modern school, but it is sufficiently free and it is instrumentated in a manner that shows that the composer has not neglected to study the advanced scores. The tone-poem contains good material, well developed and never incoherently presented. It is in a legitimate style, a proper compromise between the old classical and the modern intense vein. It is at first intentionally fragmentary, but as it unfolds it shows itself a work of long breath. Some of its furious climaxes and sharp interruptions seem to indicate a tragedy or at least a drama after the old Greek method, but we are glad that the music proved to be neither "Much Ado About Nothing" nor "Love's Labor Lost." There were pauses big with fate, tuba and trombone staccato gasps, pathetic melodies bitten off brusquely, but the impression was not mere blood-and-thunder, but noble and earnest. Such a work may be a model in these days when we more frequently hear musical strainings than strains of music.

Max Reger's orchestral variations are something quite different from the crabbed and ascetic exhibitions of learning that he sometimes puts forth. But there is learning here that is stupendous nevertheless. This set of variations resembled a hornet, since its greatest power was in its end. We wish that Browning could have heard this fugue. He would certainly have revised his "Master Hughes of Saxe-Gotha." Too many imagine that the Fugue is a lemon that has been squeezed thoroughly dry at least a century ago, yet here is a modern who builds a fugal movement that is new, powerful, and sufficiently according to rule to satisfy even the martinets. It seems therefore that not the fugue, but the fugal writers, have given out.

The fugue is the very flower of counterpoint. Every device that skill has invented in tone may be employed in it. Repetition of any device, that refuge of the helpless, is forbidden in its measures. But, because of its intricacy, it generally appeals only to the chosen few who can understand the complicated pattern. But this fugue seems to be a neutral ground on which pedagogue and neophyte can meet; it appeals to the public as well as to the "cognoscenti." Its final organ-point is tremendously powerful and makes a climax that might almost wake the dead.

But there were other things besides this overwhelming climax in this remarkable composition. There was occasionally geniality even amidst the sapient skill constantly displayed. Too often Reger deliberately takes figures of unheard-of ugliness, seemingly quite impracticable for good music, and forces them to become correct tonal works, as if to say—"Nobody else could have done this!" But in this composition there is no such deliberate freakishness. It is too long, however, and at times it seemed as if one were playing the old game of "Button" turned into—"Theme, theme, what instrument's got the theme?" If old Hiller could have heard what was done to his innocent tune he would have demanded his melody back from its tormentor, but it was such exciting music at the close that the conductor was twice recalled and the orchestra obliged to stand up. It was gloriously performed.

Boston might almost be called "Violoncelloville," for our city has always had eminent players upon this instrument within its walls. In paleolithic times there was Wulf Fries; in later days we had Fritz Giese, who at one time was probably the best violoncellist in the world; Lee Schulz, Carl Barth, Alwyn Schroeder, form a list of which any city may be proud. Mr. Heinrich Warnke need not fear his juxta-position with the other great ones. He is an artist to the finger tips. Just a trifle too classic to be fully recognized by the mob, always too reserved to play at the galleries. Boston, nevertheless, recognizes in him a worthy equal to the great ones who have exploited the instrument here. This was shown by the welcome he received when he came out for his solo.

He at once set himself to earning this greeting. Excellent bowing, commendable breadth, especially in C string passages, an expressive and sympathetic tone, absolute surety of intonation, good attention to ensemble, steadiness in high position work, these were some of the points to commend. The work itself is not the greatest of violoncello compositions although it is melodic and well-contrasted. In spite of its unexciting character, Mr Warnke was called out three times after he had completed it.

There is nothing to say at this late day about the "Tannhauser" overture. It remains as gigantic a work as when we first heard it in Harvard Symphony days. It was grandly performed. We were comfortably satisfied to hear Virtue on the trombones triumph over Vice on the piccolo; we enjoyed again that Pilgrim's theme of brasses caught in a violin rainstorm without an umbrella. The orchestra gave the ending in a manner which enabled the residents of Chelsea and Roslindale to get a good idea of the work without leaving home. Altogether this was the most "fortissimo" concert that we have recently heard, but as the loud effects were all in place we may end by singing—a la Schumann—"Ich grolle nicht."

HERALD, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1911.

NEW MASTERPIECE HEARD IN BOSTON

Tone Poem by Gernsheim Played for First Time in America by Symphony Orchestra.

THEMES CLEARLY DEFINED

Harmonization Is Neither Too Old Fashioned Nor Is It Too New Fangled.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 14th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

"To a Drama," tone poem, op. 82...Gernsheim
Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller.....Reger
Concerto for 'cello No. 1.....Saint-Saens
Overture to "Tannhaeuser".....Wagner

The tone-poem by Gernsheim, who is now in his 72d year, was brought out in Berlin last October by Mr. Nikisch at a philharmonic concert. The performance yesterday was the first in Boston, and probably in the United States. A symphony, piano concerto and violin concerto by Gernsheim have been played in Boston, but the composer is best known here by his "Salamis," which has been sung several times by the Apollo Club. He is a thoroughly equipped musician, who has played the piano, taught, conducted and composed, always in a highly respectable manner. He has his reward, for he has been named Professor and sits as a member of the Senate of the Royal Academy of Arts in Berlin. "My darling, what wouldst thou have more?"

And this new composition is highly respectable, professorial, senatorial. The themes are clearly defined and contrasted, now vigorous, now suave. The harmonization is not too old-fashioned and not too new-fangled. The thematic development shows sound technical knowledge. The instrumentation is solid, varied, free from extravagance. Everything is as it should be in the best of works by a highly respectable and respected professor. The ears of the hearers are at times soothed, at times roused, never annoyed or stabbed by unaccustomed sounds. The sitter in the seat of the scornful must admit that "To a Drama" is the work of a worthy composer; but he has no curiosity to know whether Prof. Gernsheim had any particular drama in mind, and if a drama did suggest the music he has no curiosity to see it. For there is no inspiration in this music. It is carefully made, neatly put in a package, tied so that it will not become undone and handed to the customer with a smile and a bow. And yet this music is not unpleasant to hear, and in the midst of Reger's variations there was a kindly, yes, appreciative thought of Prof. Gernsheim, senator in Berlin.

For the variations of Max Reger on a little inoffensive 18th century theme of J. A. Hiller are the abomination of desolation. I know of no music, modern or ancient, that is more exasperating and more tiring. In all of Reger's works for the orchestra there is something pretentious, something bumptious that is madding. There is no disputing his contrapuntal skill. Would that he had little or none at all. For what use does he put it to in these orchestral compositions? There is neither beauty nor grandeur; there is no emotional appeal; there is nothing to inspire a mood, enjoying which the hearer might possibly forget Reger until some peculiarly ugly or dull page would arouse him from his reverie. The fugue yesterday with its speed and din and roar of organ provoked hearty applause. It should be remembered that this fugue came after a long and sandy stretch of variations, and if it had not been half so impressive it would still have been a relief.

The variations and the other orchestral works by Reger recall a dream of De Quincey after the Malay amongst English mountains knocked at his door. The hearer might exclaim with the Opium Eater: "I was buried, for a thousand years, in stone coffins, with mummies and sphynxes, in narrow chambers at the heart of eternal pyramids * * * and laid, confounded with all unutterable slimy things, amongst reeds and Nilotic mud."

Even a 'cello concerto brought balm. Saint-Saens's is not only the most endurable of these concertos; it contains charming things: as the second theme, as the exquisitely dainty minuet with a Watteau flavor. Mr. Warnke displayed beautiful tone, fine phrasing, and the facility that is expected of a 'cellist of his high reputation. Nor playing measures of sustained melody did he lapse into sentimentalism so dear to players and lovers of the instrument.

There will be no concerts next week. The program for Feb. 10-11 will be as follows: Handel, overture in D major; Haydn, symphony in E-flat major (B. & H. No. 1); Scharwenka, Concerto in F minor, No. 4 (first time in Boston); Smetana, symphonic poem "The Moldare." Xaver Scharwenka will be the pianist.

[148]

In Defence of the Violoncello

Patches for the Tattered Repertory of That Unhappy Instrument

CONSIDER the plight of the violoncello. It is this unhappy instrument over which terrified amateurs, particularly women, protest. "Yes, the 'cello (pronounced 'shello') is my favorite instrument. Don't you think it has a beautiful tone?" This belongs to the class of perfectly safe remarks about music, as "I am no judge of pictures, but I know what I like." The formula concludes, "I could listen to a 'cello all night."

First, it is perfectly true that the violoncello has generally a beautiful tone, if given half a chance. Second, as to listening, it is with reluctance that truth bids it be reported of these too much protesting ladies that they have been seen by these eyes half way through a violoncello recital to rise and depart with every visible symptom of relief. By listening attentively half a minute, it will be possible to hear the remark that the violoncello is not properly a solo instrument. This may properly be true, but to keep insisting on it is to remark that a public library is not properly a place to read or that a music drama is not properly an art-form. The stubborn fact is that through some error in the concert management of the spheres we have beeen accidentally let in for solos on the violoncello and we must learn to get along with them. What ails the instrument? M. Jean Gerardy has ceased to love us, or we to love him, which comes to the same thing, for he visits us no more. Mr. Bruno Steindl hugs Chicago shores. Europe has a few heroic violoncellists, yet in Europe they mostly remain. And our own best virtuosi (and we have several within a short radius of Symphony Hall) find anchorage with a string quartet or an orchestra. Is the popularity of the instrument on the wane? The demand for young women 'cellists in restaurants keeps up and when, a few years since, Miss Elsa Rueger taught an adoring world that a woman can play on the violoncello not ungracefully, did we not, for a season, every time we boarded a street car, bang our shins against the tail-piece of this Falstaffian instrument attached to the person of a sweet young thing who awfully scowled?

On the programme of the Symphony Orchestra this week stands Saint-Saëns's concerto for the violoncello in A minor. It is a grateful concert piece and graceful music especially as played by the deft Mr. Warnke, yet that admirable artist would hardly contend that this concerto preserves the merit of novelty. Indeed, he might even admit that the concerto was pretty well played out. But is this not true of the whole violoncello repertory? Next week Mr. Boris Hambourg will play, at his first recital in this city, a set of compositions which, while they startle, do not particularly waylay. But he is, at least, one soloist who has declared his independence of the old repertory.

A recital programme for the violoncello under the old orthodox manner was a slight variation on a single original theme. First, of course, a sonata of Bach for the violoncello alone. Second, preferably with a distinguished pianist assisting, one of Beethoven's sonatas, thus establishing what for whatever it may have meant, reviewers used to call "sound musicianship." At this point it is proper to inquire why, in the sacred name of monotony, Beethoven omitted to write a concerto for the violoncello. The answer is: no one knows. Or, if this fails to satisfy, one can be chosen from the following: (1) Because Beethoven did not consider it worth whole. (2) Because it did not occur to him. (3) Because Bernhard Romberg hated him. (4) Because no one ever commissioned him to compose such a piece.

Third, the concerto. For this, select Schumann if you would fly high. That the public loathes all but the slow movement need not cause anxiety. By this time the public will probably be numb, anyhow. If cautious, and bent on maintaining interest, try Lalo's. No one will understand its grace and elegance, but you will have the pleasure of playing it, which is something. When in doubt, choose Saint-Saëns's. The group of short pieces which inevitably follow should include one blossom each from the following nosegays: (1) Popper's "Witches Dance," Davidoff's "Am Springbrunnen," Van Goens's Scherzo; (2) a song of Schubert's, transcribed by anybody, preferably oneself; a short piece by Schumann, the "Prize Song" from Wagner's "Meistersinger," and something short of Boccherini—no matter what. It lends scholarship. If, after this, it seems likely that the audience will stand more, add a show piece, one of Cossmann's fantasias, or even Servais's old burlesque on the "Carnival of Venice." If averse to taking any chances at all, stick to David Popper—the Tarantellas, a Spanish Dance, one of the tattered gavottes or mazurkas, and polish off with a sonata of Rubinstein.

This programme, slightly varied from year to year, will serve all ordinary purposes of the solo violoncellist, usually lasting a life-time. It has its advantages. The repertory may be acquired by a youth of twenty-one, and the rest of his life can be devoted to polishing.

It has also its disadvantages. If the violoncellist proposes to play with orchestras, complications follow:

"What concerto, dear sir, shall we announce you as prepared to play?"

"Volkmann's, I think."

"Oh, but my dear Herr von Daumenaufsatz, M. d'Appogiatura played that most gloriously year before last. Another."

"H'm. Dvorák's."

"Eh? Alas! three years ago, and again earlier this year."

The artist is, by this time, slightly English, as even artists sometimes are:

"Then Lalo's and be ——"

"It is with grief, sir, we are obliged to remind ourselves of three recitals in which Lalo's concerto has already been played here this winter. Would you be so patient as to try once more?"

"Schumann's," with grinding teeth.

"My dear, dear sir, this is really too painful. Yet I must permit myself to say that only on centennial occasions should a management feel justified in asking a well-disposed public to follow the devious ways of Schumann's matchless (I speak advisedly) violoncello concerto."

At this point the artist snaps a string inside his brain and begins to rave wildly of—finally reaching Romberg, composer of the great original ten which do the heavy teaming around conservatories. At the name of Raff the management grows momentarily attentive. A look of reminiscence, almost of pleasure, even assent, flits across the countenance. Memory of the out-moded Raff sternly banishes the sign of relenting. Romberg's name brings a shudder; Goltermann's, a blush. Next a ray of joy lights the managerial gloom; with delicate tact he suggests Boëlmann's symphonic variations. It is agreed, and the artist goes home to oil his bow with molasses against the syrupy sweetness of Boëlmann's big, broad tune.

Molique, Lindner, Grützmacher, Raff, Servais, Goltermann and Charles Davidoff.

The width of territory covered by traveling violoncellists and the meagreness of the repertory would give value to a geographic chart from which the artist could tell at a glance what composers would be tolerated within certain regions. Thus, in most southern cities, straight Popper might go; Raff's concerto is known to have been treated kindly in the Mississippi Valley; smaller towns of the Middle West will swallow any quantity of Goetermann if washed down with show-pieces and soupy transcriptions of Grieg. Women's clubs will sit docilely through a concerto of Romberg if assured beforehand this is the correct thing. On the Pacific shores, adhere to the big bow-wow strain. They mostly won't understand what the row is all about, but will be placid under a sense of getting the worth of their money in the player's hard work.

Considering, therefore, the scarcity of workable concertos for the violoncellist's repertory, let a few simple rules be formulated for hesitating composers, by the guidance of which they may be reasonably sure of writing a concert piece which both can and will be played. Saint-Saëns and Raff, to the contrary, notwithstanding, the solo part should not begin immediately. It is a great mistake to take your soloist's attention from the screw of his bow and the bite of his peg in the floor before the front rows have had time to take him in properly. A sounding prelude, using trumpets, kettle-drums and squealing strings will prepare the mind for the first theme. The first movement should begin on the sonorous lower strings of the instrument with a sudden leap into the treble. In passage work, kindly remain below the upper C of the A string and be rewarded by the popularity of the work. Young women 'cellists, especially, do not like to go about with an ugly callous on their left thumbs. In general, passage work should be in triplets: it is hard to say why, except that they seem to flow off the strings smoothly and are ordinarily used, (Again, consult Saint-Saëns). Hold in gingerly until near the end of the first movement, at which point contrive a flourish of double notes which, without actually requiring a very awkward stretch, shall give the appearance of prodigious difficulty. Conclude with a few whipping chords.

For the slow movement concentrate the mind on the following: Sweet chocolate, moonlight on the lake, taffy, the poems of Heine, adoring womankind, Münchener beer, and Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words—and begin to compose. It will thus be impossible to miss the vein.

Most exacting of all is the Finale. It must be grandiose yet playable. A first theme on the order of airy, fairy, Lilian, therefore, with frequent hops into harmonics, and a scramble or two up to the top of the finger-board. Let the second theme, again of triplets, be agreeably jiggy. It will be forgiven in the 'cello as "of the instrument," and listeners will tell one another that it is essentially a violoncello melody. Intersperse with booming excursions into the deeper strings—do not omit a passage of four-string arpeggii; add a "brilliant coda," and serve.

While it is freely admitted that this process may not, indeed, is not likely to bring forth an immortal concerto for the violoncello, it will easily approximate any except the half-dozen war-horses of the repertory. If any embarrassment is encountered in the invention of solo figuration, see Romberg. Nobody but players will detect the borrowing, and they will have the good sense, one hopes, to hold their tongues. Any deficiencies in the musical quality of a work mixed according to this recipe may be squeezed into the orchestral interludes which it will be well to make as long and as frequent as possible. For it is these orchestral interruptions where the solo stops, which are, as the young lady remarked, wearily lowering her violin, the most enjoyable parts of the work, besides being those in which she was heard to best advantage.

These suggestions are thrown out for whatever worth they may contain, which is certainly not much, in which lies their strong resemblance to the average composition for the violoncello. For it has long seemed as if the composers had been unfair to the bull-calf of the string choir, leaving unwritten those things which they ought to have written and writing those things which they ought not to have written. Violoncello concertos are mainly of two origins—either a distinguished composer wrote them for a distinguished virtuoso, in which case (provided they can be played at all) they are generally good; or a distinguished virtuoso wrote them for himself, in which case (though they can be learned if life lasts long enough), they are generaly bad. There is, of course, always the sporting chance that someone will add one more to the few genuinely inspired concertos for the violoncello. All expectantly await that glad morn. L. P.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

GERNSHEIM REDISCOVERED; REGER HEARD AGAIN

A Tone-Poem, "To a Drama," in the Musical Fashions of the Hour—Reger's Ingenious Variations and Puissant Fugue—Music That Irritates and Music That Sways—Mr. Warnke Plays Saint-Saens's Concerto—Otherwise, a Day of Sonorities

MR. Fiedler rediscovered Gernsheim at the Symphony Concert; the audience rediscovered the Reger of the Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme; Mr. Warnke played the most elegant of concertos for violoncello, Saint-Saëns's, and every one stayed and took their joy of the sonorities with which the conductor and the band clothed the overture to "Tannhäuser." Altogether, it was a day of the sonorities and the intensities in which Mr. Fiedler so honestly delights. Gernsheim's tone-poem by way of prelude to an imaginary or an undeclared melodrama is richly scored; the music has its intensities of struggle and longing, its sonorities of apotheosis. For three years it has been easy to recall the mighty and sweeping voices of Reger's fugue and some of his variations do not lack his acrid melodic intensities. As for the overture to "Tannhäuser," Mr. Fiedler flung himself whole-heartedly upon it. The Pilgrim's chorus at the beginning was a song of a host; the revels of the Venusberg shrilled and Mr. Fiedler would have no mere dalliance in that excited cavern; while in the finale the spirit not only routed the flesh but overwhelmed and consumed it. Even the trombones "brought out" those few measures toward the end that are the crux of conductors and connoisseurs. The rest hardly heard them in the whole effect; but there they were yesterday and plainly audible. With them Mr. Fiedler had his little triumph as a virtuoso conductor; but the appeal of the "Tannhäuser" overture to an audience that at the end of a long concert heard it rapt, depends upon larger things than trombone passages. One of the French reviewers wrote the other day that public taste in Paris seemed to be turning toward music that "signified" more than imaginative play with instrumental timbres and bizarre harmonies. The overture to "Tannhäuser" so "signifies" to the dullest of understandings. The most "superior" of us do rise to it. The music is melody made emotion and picture; the orchestral voices are the voices of a concentrated drama. It will outlive much of Wagner's other music; for time is beginning to sift even him.

The play that moved Gernsheim to write his tone-poem "To a Drama" was certainly not "The Taming of the Shrew." If there was any play at all, except in Gernsheim's imagination, it was a grave, impassioned, poetic piece. Yet out of Shakspeare's farce comes the "motto" for it. "You bid me make it orderly and well according to the fashion of the time," the tailor tells Petruchio of the rejected garment. So Gernsheim has made his tone-poem and neither Mr. Nikisch, in Berlin last October, or Mr. Fiedler here and now in Boston, has rejected it. Gernsheim has turned his seventieth year; he has been writing music for thirty; on occasion at the Symphony Concerts and elsewhere this town has heard some of it. Gernsheim's music is not "troubling," as the French say, and it is hardly individual enough to be long remembered. Perhaps, even, he wrote the tone-poem to show that he, at seventy, and long labelled "academic," can "keep up with the times." The course of these imaginary dramas that inspire to tone-poems and symphonic prologues is already a convention. The music bears the heroic protagonist upon the stage and compasses him with heroic atmosphere; he battles mightily; he longs and loves; he expires in orchestral stress; there is lament and apotheosis. The middle way lies open to the composer. He does not need to particularize as Strauss does with his heroes, and so irritate the lovers of the old ways in music. Yet he may please the new since he is willing to write tone-poems—and most of all he may satisfy those that cherish the happy mean even as does he. Behold, then, Gernsheim's tone-poem. Nobody, with any pretence to an imaginative ear can miss the sequence of the drama. The hero is more gentle than forbidding. He longs and loves with a suave ardor. He does not battle blatantly, he is not glorified stridently. The music springs fluently from itself; the "ideas" are easily recognizable, easily followed; there are happy contrasting passages; the orchestra is agreeably sonorous, the instrumentation is rich and warm. It neither disdains nor courts the new in harmony and instrumental coloring. Gernsheim has made his tone-poem "orderly and well according to the fashion and the time." No more than conductors will audiences reject it. Only the cynics will call it "ultra-modern" music made easy.

Reger's variations are not "ultra-modern" or any other sort of music made easy. He spares not himself; he spares not his hearers; and he writes according to none of the contemporary codes, but by his own lights and no other. Strauss "derives" plainly enough from Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner. The sources of the more individual Debussy have been found, they say, in Russian and certain old French streams. Reger, the apostolic Riemann avers, expresses his own individuality in a language that comes from a deep study of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. By this the learned doctor probably signifies that Reger prefers to write "absolute music," that his contrapuntal skill and imagination are endlessly fertile and sometimes imaginative and that he chooses to put his new wine into the stout bottles of old forms. Even to edit Bach is not to think musically as Bach thought. It might be hard to specify the details of Reger's kinship with Beethoven, and the restless and irritable voice of his music is far from the sober and contained voice of Brahms. The truth is that Reger is Reger, and therefore are there Regerites and anti-Regerites, neither of whom may express themselves temperately. Perhaps, indeed, the Variations and the Fugue will serve very well as a reflection of the man.

The orchestra plays over the theme. There is no mistaking it; the measures are innocently pretty, innocently tuneful; in the conventional phrase, they have a "certain charm." The listener may even wonder how Reger happened to pitch upon them in the forgotten pages of Hiller's operetta, written a hundred and forty years ago. Reger, however, is a burrowing soul; as Hiller's little melody did not escape him no more shall aught that he can draw from it elude him. Could Hiller hear these variations and the overwhelming fugue that ends them, he must marvel at the offspring that Reger has ushered into the world from them. To the work, then, and to the hard and strenuous work, for Reger does not take his orchestral or any other writing easily. He composes by an effort that, fortunately for his prolific bent is tirelesa. There are eleven variations in all, and they are sedulously diversified. Two, at least, are largely conceived, sonorous of voice, tumultuous of movement, full of Gargantuan counterpoint and not without a rude power over the chosen material. Others run swiftly, almost lightly, as of counterpoint and rhythm at play with itself. Others still run gently and musingly, as though Reger were smoothing and softening his voice. The rest are songful, seeking even the accents of passionate feeling. They gain them in Regerian fashion. Try as he may, his songful music lacks sensuous beauty. It wants warmth and glow. There is a sharpness in it that suggests a mood willed, almost commanded, a touch of bitterness as of a mood that cannot express itself. In spite of himself or because he is himself, Reger makes such music a little acidly. After all a composer may not sing by ingenuity. The hearer is stirred, but harshly. He feels the Reger in whose spirit is always imitation. Yet the variations are seldom mere contrapuntal and academic ingenuity. A stringent, a strident, a hard imagination has fashioned them; but it is also an imagination that disdains mere instrumental coloring for its own sensuous sake. Reger is too austere, severe and self-centred for such pleasings. He prefers, as the painters say, to work in line, in black and white, in counterpoint and fugue.

The Fugue releases the composer, releases his audience, sets Reger free for the power that is in him, sways his hearers to it. The sweep of the music is magnificent; the elasticity of it is nearly superhuman; the contrasting, the contesting, voices spring out of it; rise, subside, gather themselves, upleap again with new power, new intensity, new amplitude. Reger is as disdainful of mere sequences as he is of sensuous instrumental coloring. His Fugue thrusts and smites its way along as though it were hewing out its course with each swing of the composer's arm; the climax surges and bursts in a tumult of sonorities. Even the organ must swell them. Ingenuity may have fashioned this music; complexity may often weave it; but imagination holds the reins and fiery energy whips it forward. They say that one of the aims of the music of our time is a new power. The old forms, in Reger's faith and practice may speed it, swell it, intensify it. Every man who would express himself in any art has the moments and the tasks in which the spirit drives; when he writes, for example, because he must, when the creative rhapsody, as the old poets would have it, is upon him. So Reger's fugues—and this is the masterpiece of them—sound. Perhaps, even, he was born for them.

Another sort of ingenuity fashioned and fills Saint-Saëns's concerto for violoncello that Mr. Warnke played after the intermission. Astutely, he has considered the limitations of the instrument. Saint-Saëns is no man to fight it, no man to force it and the virtuoso to do his will. He knows a better way—in the way of suave persuasion, of smiling disguise. It is the singing voice of the violoncello that pleases those who hear, when the voice is not forced, and the composer keeps it singing smoothly, elegantly. The 'cello has its orchestral voice, deep-toned, mournful, ominous, poignant and shadowy; but Saint-Saëns's 'cello is singing for the drawing-room in tempered, caressing voice. Of course the 'cellist is a virtuoso, with right to the display of his virtuosity. But display is too rude a word for Saint-Saëns's design. He sets him the tasks of finesse—refinements of accent, delicacies of rhythm, subtleties of contrast, light play with fugues, not caperings, but charm. And the orchestra is the companion, and not the adversary, of the solo instrument. They link arms, they chatter suavely; they have even their little dance together. It is the 'cello gone a-courting. The concerto is music for Mr. Warnke, and again, as many times before, he was the violoncellist of the fine, clear, edgeless, supple, unforced tone, of the technique that persuades and does not worry his instrument, of the feeling that smoothes and caresses its voice. The Symphony Orchestra likes to be "different"; and the big tone and the big effect are very much out of fashion with its virtuosi. Mr. Witek, Mr. Noack and now Mr. Warnke would have none of them. H. T. P.

GLOBE—SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1911

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Warnke Plays Saint-Saens 'Cello Concerto.

Gernsheim's Tone-Poem Performed For First Time in Boston.

The program of the 14th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: "To a Drama," tone-poem, op 82, by Friedrich Gernsheim (first time here); Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of Hiller," op 100; concerto for 'cello and orchestra by Saint-Saens, played by Heinrich Warnke; the overture to "Tannhauser."

Pieces by Gernsheim have been appearing in Boston for some time at the rate of one a decade, or such a matter. As long ago as 1871 Ernst Perabo performed a concerto for piano and orchestra with the Harvard musical association. The present tone-poem does not exhibit any very searching vitality in the choice of themes or the development of them. The composer has given a tolerable sonority to undistinguished musical ideas by means of much blowing of brass and beating of drums. Hollow fury rather than the semblance of terror is his reward.

There is a grateful adagio, serene and immune from the profanation of violence and of instruments of percussion. Here there is songful melody and a warmth and richness of coloring.

Ceaseless Volubility.

Hiller's modest and diminutive theme is a humble text for the formidable discourse which Reger expounds upon it in the Variations. The theme itself, both from the natural significance of its own naive melody and from that of the context of the operetta from which it is taken, would apparently suggest playfulness or a light and pretty fancy. Saint-Saens, the colorist, would have kept the "merry theme" for a time at least in its childhood. Even the ultra-sophisticated Debussy would have embellished it with some exquisite conceit or fairy-like imagery.

Reger loads it down with the bombastic display of his own colossal invention and his ceaseless volubility. Like a child grown old before his time, this innocent little tune is beaten into a handful of shapes and sent clamoring with merciless insistence through the orchestra. When the tune ceases to inspire a new variant the composer manufactures one.

There are moments of peace and of modest retiring speech to which Reger does not frequently commit himself. The second variation has the suggestion of delicacy and the fifth reminds at times of the melodic graces of Puccini.

By the time the appalling fugue is reached, the "merry theme" has probably attained its majority. The intricacy and elaboration of the contrafuntal plan are amazing, and the sheer immensity of the climax to which it ascends is breath-taking. Hiller would doubtless experience the shock of mild surprise to observe what marvel is here unfolded from his gentle tune.

The orchestral performance was an exceedingly brilliant one, and this piece is no task to undertake lightly, or without first partaking of food and drink. The applause was vociferous, and Mr Fiedler properly shared it with the members of the orchestra standing.

Saint-Saens' Concerto.

Saint-Saens' concerto for 'cello is typical of much of his writing for orchestra. There is a disparagement in the value of ideas which he cleverly conceals by the ingenuity and brilliance of his orchestral dress and the suave appeal of his style.

There are the melodies of broad and luscious curve in this concerto which are beloved of 'cellists, melodies with rhythmical as well as melodic identity. But with them are passages purporting to show the technic of the solo instrument that are frankly contrived and inconsequential music.

Mr Warnke played the songful passages with tonal beauty and with musical taste. His performance of florid pages had fluency. There were several deserved recalls.

There was sincere enjoyment of the "Tannhauser" overture, nor is it unworthy of a place on serious programs because it is played at the "Pops," and is blended in the consciousness with the injunction to eat, drink, smoke and be merry. It is a model pattern of the dramatic overture. It portrays the triumph of a regenerated knight, as does opera.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1911.

CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The second Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be next Thursday evening, Feb. 9.

CECILIA SOCIETY.

The Cecelia Society, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, give their second concert Thursday evening, Feb. 16, in Symphony Hall. They will present Pierne's "The Children's Crusade," assisted by a chorus of 100 children. The soloists are: Allys, the girl, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold; Alain, the boy, Mme. Corinne-Rider Kelsey; the Narrator, Edmond Clement; The Old Sailor, Claude Cunningham; A Mother, Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown. "Voices on High" will be sung by Earl Cartwright and the Four Women are Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura A. Eaton, Mrs. Betha Cushing Child and Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1911

FIEDLER LEADS TRIBUTE TO MEN

Applauds Players at Symphony Rehearsal

BY OLIN DOWNES

A superb performance of Reger's "Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme," was the distinguishing feature of the 14th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The variations themselves amply merit the German adjective of "kolossal," and they were played with astonishing virtuosity. No wonder that Mr. Fiedler himself applauded his men, as they rose with him to acknowledge the ovation of the audience.

These variations are deservedly the most popular of the works of Reger known in this city. The subject is the song of Lieschen from the second act of Hiller's operetta, "Der Aerndtekranz," a theme which furnishes the composer ample oportunity for varied and lengthy treatment. In these variations Reger is often positively winning by reason of the grace and lyric freshness of some of his music. In the final pages he twists his melody into a subject for a fugue, a lengthy subject, which might well become unwieldy in weaker hands, and this fugue is simply a marvel of tone-building, of technical achievement, glorified by constructive talent of the highest order.

The climax of the fugue, built over the pedal point which has already become famous, is one of the wonders of modern music. True, it is probably the result of beer, of a vision of all-conquering sound that comes in an alcoholically inspired moment, and fortunately captured. But the sheer glory of that sound is worth a concert of listening. As if Alladin had rubbed his lamp, behold a mighty palace of tone rear itself before one's very eyes! Only a German, we feel persuaded, a German with magnificent Munich beer, could have penned that stupendous, "kolossal" page. The performance was one of the best given by Mr. Fiedler and his men since the arrival of the conductor in this city. The applause spoke more eloquently than any words of the appreciation of the listeners.

Frederick Gernsheim's tone-poem, "To a Drama," was heard for the first time here. The composer, aged 70, is now living in Berlin. His E-flat symphony was played at a Symphony concert in 1882. He studied with Moscheles, Hauptmann. Richter and other men of that generation. Hence, taking into account its origin, the composition heard yesterday is creditably modern, albeit with a classical contour which stands it in good stead, and a measure of formality more suggestive of something purely symphonic than a tone-poem in free form.

Mr. Warnke, the second concertmeister of the 'cellos of the orchestra, played Saint-Saens' 'cello concerto in A minor; played the bravura passages rather roughly, sang the graceful melodies with much warmth and feeling and treated the work in a musicianly manner. The concert came to an end with the "Tannhauser" overture which was rapturously received.

MONITOR, BOSTON, FEBRUARY 4, 1911.

Xaver Scharwenka, the soloist at the fifte[illegible] will be of concerts by the Symphony orchestra Friday afternoon, Feb. 10, and Saturday evening, Feb. 11. Mr. Scharwenka will give the first Boston performance of his own, concerto for piano in F minor No. 4.

The orchestra will present Handel's overture in D major, Haydn's symphony in E flat and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

The fifth concert of the Symphony orchestra in Sanders theater, Cambridge, will be given Thursday evening, Feb. 9, with Edmond Clement, the French tenor, as soloist. Mr. Clement's Cambridge engagement precedes his first appearance in Boston by just a week. His part in the Sanders theater program includes the "Aubade" from Lalo's "Le Roi d'Y's," an air from Massenet's "Le Mage," the "Dream Song" from "Manon," and songs with piano, as follows: Reynaldo Hahn's "Mai," Diemer's "Le Cavalier," and Weckerlin's "Bergere Legere." The orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony in E minor, the prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel und Gretel" and Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY FEBRUARY 4, 1911

Xaver Scharwenka, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the 15th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

There is a gratifying amount of interest being shown in the coming production of Gabriel Pierne's musical legend, "The Children's Crusade," which is to be given Thursday, Feb. 16, by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler as conductor.

[150]

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1911

AT THE SYMPHONY

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The Symphony programme yesterday was one of varied effects, opening with a tone poem, "To a Drama," by Gernsheim, which was played for the first time in Boston, followed by Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Merry Theme of J. A. Hiller; Saint-Saens' Concerto for Violoncello, and the Tannhauser Overture.

The tone poem, "To a Drama," with its succession of themes, is a series of lyric stanzas, with here and there an epic touch, but lyrism prevails throughout. It is an ode of appreciation of the drama, but with nothing of drama itself in it. The wood-winds softly announce the theme of this dramatic panegyric and the strings lightly echo it. The theme is elaborated and emphasized, and then the appreciation takes an intimate, almost caressing mood, as if itself wooing the Muse of Drama. This, growing in emotional intensity, works up to a climax—distinctly not a dramatic climax, however—which provides an entrance to a motive in C minor. This is decidedly the best bit of music in the tone poem, the most expressive. The somewhat lengthy Adagio following has some of the same beauty, but there are touches of the ordinary in it; it almost makes light of the "drama" in saccharine music that ismere flattery. At its close the tone poem gathers new themes and develops the original ones. The final Adagio leading up to the orchestral ensemble and the ensemble itself are full, free poetic expression. As a tone poem its lyric beauty commends it; but it is not rich in substance.

The Reger Variations and the Fugue proved altogether the most interesting number on the programme. The Variations themselves, although individuaiiy possessing much intrinsic beauty, are somewhat fragmentary, and each change is announced with almost a tiresome frankness. But the Fugue, with its remarkable finale, is nothing less than a wonderful orchestral achievement. In the place of the customary clash and clamor of the forzando finale is a peal of music like the sound of many pipe organs played with the bass stops thrown wide open in a diapa[illegible] of wondrous beauty. The audience was quick to respond to this unusual effect and cheered long and loudly, till Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra bowed their acknowledgment of the applause. The variations themselves are 11 in number, and based on a slight operetta theme, taken from the second act of J. A. Hiller's "Der Aerndtekranz," "The Harvest Wreath," sung by Lieschen. It is basen on eighth notes and extremely light in character. Hence, were it but for the introduction of other themes and the marvelous power of elaboration possessed by Reger himself the entire piece would be rather futile. Some of the variations are exceedingly graceful, notably part of the first Andante and the following Allegretto, the oboes and clarinets carrying a pretty motive in the latter. The bassoons and double basses carry the theme with some distinction in the fourth variation, while the divilson of the orchestra into groups in the fifth variation, with some of them playing on muted strings, gives the theme a double entendre. The Tarantella rhythm, in which the seventh variation is written, is best of all suited to the somewhat jerky Hiller theme. The following intermezzo variation moves with smoothness and affords the transitional passage leading up to the final three movements. But in none of the variations do we find much real Reger music; for we associate him with large chords, odd progressions and even startling dissonances. In the Fugue, however, we get something like a full expression of the marvelous powers of the composer, and it was given thorough justice at yesterday's concert.

The Saint-Saens' Concerto, played by Mr. Heinrich Warncke, second 'cellist of the orchestra, is distinctly not written in the best vein of this favorite composer. He himself confessed to having felt the restrictions of the instrument for which he was writing, but even then it would seem that he allowed himself to be unduly restricted. He has his solo instrument at once announce the theme with the orchestra, which is far less pleasing than the customary orchestra prelude or introductory passages of most concertos, and the two themes which he gives his solo instrument to elaborate are not real Saint-Saens melody. The waltz and the minuet movements are pretty in themselves and were well handled by Mr. Warncke. In the bravura and passage work he was a trifle less fortunate, a slightly false tonality marring it at times. But Mr. Warncke for the most part produced a full, rich tone on his instrument and gives it the thinking, speaking quality.

The closing Tannhauser Overture, the favorite opera overture and the one of all overtures that requires a full orchestra of Symphony proportions to bring out anything like ful satisfaction, won its audience yesterday. This overture seems always to go straight to the heart of its public, and yesterday was no exception. The full tonality of the brases in the Pilgrim's chorus and the song of Venus sung by the clarinets were direct and impressive, while the strings made the whirring of the mad bacchanalia both exotic and seductive.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

There will be no Symphony concert next week. The orchestra starts Sunday for its western tour. The first concert is in Pittsburg on Monday night. The route includes Cleveland, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo, Syracuse and Albany. Mr. Witek will be the soloist in Pittsburg, Toledo, Detroit, Buffalo and Syracuse; Mr. Schroeder in Cleveland, and Yolande Mero in Albany.

CECILIA SOCIETY.

The second joint concert of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor, will be given in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 16. The work to be performed is Gabriel Pierne's "The Children's Crusade." It has already been given twice by the Cecilia, and its repetition will be welcomed. The entire Symphony orchestra, Cecilia Society and a chorus of 100 children will be employed in giving this work. The tenor role will be taken by Edmond Clement, a distinguished French artist. The other soloists will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold and Claude Cunningham.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1911

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Mr. Scharwenka, the Pianist, to Reappear with the Symphony Orchestra—Mr. McCormack, the Tenor, in a Concert of His Own—More Sonatas and a New Trio

THE regular concerts of the Symphony Orchestra, which returns on Tuesday from its Western journey; a concert on Sunday evening in Symphony Hall by John McCormack, the operatic tenor; and two chamber concerts—one by the newly organized Weber Trio and one by Miss Beebe and Mr. Dethier will divide the week. Mr. Scharwenka, the pianist, who has not appeared in Boston, or for that matter in America, these many years, will play in his own concerto at the Symphony Concerts; Mr. McCormack's programme is plentiful in Irish folk-songs and in the ballads in which London first liked him; while to vary Mr. Dethier's and Miss Beebe's usual sonatas for pianoforte and violin is a suite by Reger.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

MR. Scharwenka's return to play his new concerto for pianoforte and orchestra will be the incident of the next pair of Symphony Concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday night. In the nineties he lived and worked in New York as composer, pianist, teacher and conductor. Then he settled in Berlin, and until this winter he has not revisited America. Many who have read his name often on the little piano pieces that they play have forgotten that he is also a composer in the larger forms and that he is still a practising pianist. The new concerto in F-minor is his fourth; it shuns the ways of ultra-modern music; and it has been praised for its melodious and its "pianistic" quality. For the purely orchestral pieces, the first half of the programme falls to eighteenth-century music—an overture by Händel and Haydn's symphony in E-flat; while Smetana's tone-poem, "The Moldau," a flowing "picture", of the course of the river and of the legends that have flowered on its banks, will end the concert.

Mr. Clément, the French tenor of charm of voice and grace of artistry, will sing for the first time hereabouts at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge on Thursday evening. His "numbers" are fragments of operas by Massenet and Lalor and three French songs. The rest of Mr. Fiedler's programme traverses Tschaikowsky's Symphony in E-Minor, in which he excels. Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre" and "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" for relatively light pieces, and Humperdinck's prelude to his opera, "Hänsel und Gretel."

RECORD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1911

Xaver Scharwenka, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at the 15th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

There is a gratifying amount of interest being shown in the coming production of Gabriel Pierne's musical legend, "The Children's Crusade," which is to be given Thursday, Feb. 16, by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler as conductor.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1911

Thursday evening, Feb. 16, in Symphony Hall, a performance by the Cecilia, the Symphony Orchestra and a children's chorus of Pierné's "Children's Crusade"—the mediæval episode retold with imagination in music and verse of the childish troop that set forth for Palestine in innocent devotion and perished by the way. The assisting singers will be Mr. Clément, the distinguished French tenor, Mme. Rider-Kelsey, the proved and admired soprano, Mrs. Goold and Messrs. Cunningham and Cartwright. Mr. Fiedler will conduct.

Friday afternoon, Feb. 17, in Symphony Hall, sixteenth of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1911.

Symphony Concert

The visiting soloist at the Symphony concerts this week will be the distinguished composer and pianist, Xaver Scharwenka, who returns to Boston after an absence of several years. He will play for the first time in Boston his latest concerto for piano.

The rest of the program will comprise Handel's overture in D major, Haydn's symphony in E flat and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

Clement as Soloist

The fifth concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, will be given on next Thursday evening, Feb. 9, at 8 o'clock. A particularly interesting feature of the performance will be the first appearance in this part of the country of Edmond Clement, the distinguished French lyric tenor, who will sing three arias and three songs with piano. The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's Fifth, in E minor, and the other numbers will be the prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel und Gretel" and Saint-Saens's "Omphale's Spinning Wheel", and "Danse Macabre."

"CHILDREN'S CRUSADE" TO BE SUNG

Gabriel Pierne's Setting for Medieval Story to Be Given by Cecilia Society and Boston Symphony Orchestra Under Mr. Fiedler.

WHEN the "Children's Crusade" was sung as a farewell to Mr. Lang on his resignation from the conductorship of the Cecilia Society in 1907, it was a peculiarly characteristic act on his part to devote the receipts of the concert to a well-known school for the benefit of children.

The pathetic story of the children who set out in their desperate quest for the Holy Land, the tribute to the revered and beloved friend of the musicians assembled there and the company of children on the stage, united in a motive of helpfulness to some of the needy little ones of the world, gave a completeness to the occasion which crowned Mr. Lang's long labors with impressive beauty.

For there are few stories more touching than the true tale of the children's crusade of the early thirteenth century, and as Marcel Schwab has conceived it and Gabriel Pierne set it to music it becomes one of the few exquisitely moving works of vocal art before the public today. Too many of the opera scores have tales that are mere ugly exploitation of evil, or are weak and pointless. This story has the solid value which narrative of historic verisimilitude may possess and the higher worth of poetic verity, with that childly charm which the modern stage has of late so persistently attempted to exploit. With the success of Mrs. Marks' "Piper," of Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird," Barrie's "Peter Pan," with half a dozen other society plays where a child is the center of interest, with Humperdinck's child stories set to splendid music, with the boyish "Juggler" (Jongleur de Notre Dame), and Pierne's own "Children at Bethlehem," gaining a hearing throughout the country, it would seem a fulfilment of the promised time when a little child shall lead them. Much of the day's thinking is influenced by the stage.

English Is Smooth

The story of this extraordinary crusade as told by Marcel Schwab in marvelous French, had, of course, to be selected carefully to make the libretto of the cantata. Henry Grafton Chapman is the translator of the French libretto and his work deserves high praise, though the very atmosphere of the rare prose of Schwab is hard to reproduce. The English is, however, singable, the first desideratum if a work is to make its way in the vernacular. The singers will have none of it if the words delay or spoil the pure, musical phraseology, and in music with the modern rhythms it is essential that the word be wedded to the music in every point of accent and unfolding thought.

The characters in the story are Allys, a little girl; Alain, a blind boy; the body of the children who follow the lead of Alain in the search for the Holy Land; a mother; an old sailor and voices of mothers, with the Narrator.

The Voice from on High summons the children to the Holy Land. They are shown starting out in the quest, rushing out from all the homes. The parents are in dismay and plead in vain with the little ones. Alain sings, "Hear ye not the Voice, the Voice that calls?" For him there is no question. The Voice has spoken and he must away. The others catch his enthusiasm and eagerly start forth. They sing along the way, wondering at everything they see, weaving flowers into crosses.

To Allys and Alain in happy dialogue, and later in his encouragement to her in her fatigue, is given the more serious musical task. The children have simple melodies to sing, carols or childly songs of faith. They sing of their journey and the marvelous city Jerusalem which their eyes shall see.

Music Is Praised

A medieval hymn tune is wrought into the score here, with quaint effect, and is later worked out in fuller choral effects. The instrumental introduction to this scene is especially praised for the interplay of oboe, flute and violin solos.

The song of the spring that Alain and Allys sing is full of spirit of the outdoors world. The breeze is set in caressing cadence, the fragrance of the opening world breathes in the music. They see the work of the Lord in all this beauty. Alain hears from Allys description of what they pass. Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold sang Alain when the Cecilia gave the work formerly, and she infused into the role a charming quality of the uplifted and inspired child who was leading the others toward a vision which only his blind eyes could see. At the coming performance in Symphony hall, Feb. 16, when Mr. Fiedler will lead the Cecilia and the Boston Symphony orchestra in this work, Mrs. Goold will sing the role of Allys, which is rather better suited to a high soprano voice, and Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey will sing Alain.

The introduction to the next scene has an exquisite effect of the sea, its calm and its ebb and flow, full of the mystery and beauty of ocean waters. The children exclaim happily over the wonderful sea and the white waves courtesying to them, and wandering on the beach pick up the star fishes, which they say are the stars that have fallen from the sky and have been drowned. A sailor sings them a legend of the Star of Bethlehem, which azure at first, turned red at the crucifixion and fell into the sea. Alain feels the salt breeze in ecstasy, for it is the sign that one stage of his adventurous journey is well past. Here variety is given by a chorus of sailors, one of the most extended and intricate choruses of the work, full of spirit and quality.

Presently the children embark and their pleasure in the voyage is sung. Alain sings to them of the Lord to whom they journey. Then the storm is announced. This is a pitiful part of the story which has, however, to be told for historic accuracy as well as for the dramatic climax for which listeners nowadays are every hungry.

Storm Is Portrayed

The children cry out in fear, and entreat one another for aid, searching for their brothers and sisters in the darkness and confusion. Allys clings to Alain, "I'm frightened, O Alain, Alain!" But the boy quiets the fears of all, for to him amid the night comes the final vision of the Christ he has sought so longingly. The passage which describes the vision of the Lord, the vivid "He is there. I see the light! I see Jesus," in the boyish simple phrases is very beautiful and true. The noisy chorus of the sailors' dismay is heard, the orchestra describes the climax of the vessels devoured by the waves, with the children now quiet, since they are going surely to see Jesus and find the city of their quest. Angel voices represented by the adult chorus sing triumphantly the final glory and heavenly refuge which is opened to the little ones. Mr. Krehbiel speaks of this as a "marvelously exalted canticle."

This work is written in the modern idiom, though the general effect is of melody and clearness. The various numbers melt into one another with the continuity which marks a modern work though preserving more formally defined limits than modern opera. There is little of what can be called the animus of oratorio in the music except perhaps in the splendid final choruses. In general the transcriptions of nature are the happiest successes of the composer here, though the children's songs in the character of folk song are delightful. The orchestration is full of clear color and charm, and the work throughout gives an impression of musical loveliness easily understood. The presence of a hundred children on the stage is alone enough to characterize the work, and the slender sweetness of the voices brings an element of surprise and freshness into this score which sober concert room music does not always provide.

Choruses Effective

Another interest is added through the division of the chorus in places so that some sing off the scenes and appear to be distant groups of children echoing the songs of those on the stage. Smaller solo parts are to be sung by Mrs. Francis Dunton Brown, Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child, Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Claude Cunningham and Earl Cartwright. Edmond Clement is the narrator. The Cecilia chorus includes now 175 highly trained singers and the orchestra on this occasion will number 100.

Of this uprising the history books say that many of the children seem to have come down from France through Italy and to have embarked at Genoa, as the story here shows them. Many others came from Germany, through Switzerland, gathering numbers all the way and losing some, too. The peasants everywhere forwarded the small pilgrims on their way. Many embarked, too, at Marseilles. It is said that those not lost in wrecks in the storm that sprang up after the departure, reached distant lands and fell into bad hands in one way or another. It is one of the most amazing examples in history of how hysteria can be roused by subtle hidden methods. Various stories are told of how this cruel crusade was instigated, but it is believed that religious teachers of the age wished to stimulate interest in a general crusade and sent out young teachers to stir up the children without anticipating the frenzy that was to overtake them. Once started the thing could not consistently be stopped (if at all) and went on to its bitter end. It is the story of the Piper of Hamelin, in a different form, to be sure, but with the same motif of the deserted childless homes.

SUNDAY GLOBE—FEBRUARY 5, 19

Scharwenka Soloist at the Symphony Concerts.

At the Symphony rehearsal and concert this week, Franz Xaver Scharwenka, the pianist, will play his concerto for piano and orchestra in F minor, No. 4, op. 82, for its first hearing in Boston. The score and parts of this concerto were published in 1908 with a dedication to Queen Elizabeth of Roumania. It was played for the first time on any program by Martha Siebold, Oct 31, 1908, at a concert given by her in the Beethoven Saale, Berlin.

It is now 13 years since Mr Scharwenka, with his brother Philipp, was a resident of New York, and was active in the city's musical affairs. At a concert in New York to introduce some of his music he played excerpts from his opera, "Mataswintha," a work in three acts, based upon Felix Dahn's novel, "Ein Kampf um Rom" (1876), which was produced at Weimar, Oct 4, 1896, and was performed once at the Metropolitan opera house by Walter Damrosch's company, April 1, 1897.

While in New York Mr Scharwenka brought forward his piano concerto No. 1 in B flat minor. He was one of the pallbearers at the funeral of Anton Seidl at the Metropolitan opera house, March 31, 1898.

Scharwenka was born at Samter, East Prussia, 1850. At 15 he studied piano with Kullak in Berlin. He made his first public appearance at 19. Concert tours followed through Germany, Russia, Austria, Hungary, Norway, Sweden, Belgium, England and America. He taught meanwhile in Kullak's school. Liszt was interested in him and frequently entertained him at Hoggartnerei.

In 1881 Scharwenka founded the conservatory in Berlin which bore his name and of which he remained director for 10 years. He then opened a branch of his school in New York which he directed in person. Seven years later he returned to Berlin, where he now resides, and joined Klindworth in establishing the Klindworth-Scharwenka conservatory.

Otherwise the program this week will include Handel's overture in D major, Haydn's symphony in E flat and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau.

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert of the Symphony orchestra in Sanders theatre will be given next Thursday evening, and a particularly interesting feature of the performance will be the first appearance in this part of the country of Edmond Clement, the distinguished French lyric tenor.

Mr Clement will sing, with orchestra, the "Aubade" from Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys," an air from Massenet's "Le Mage" and the "Dream Song" from "Manon." With piano he will sing Reynaldo Hahn's "Mai," Diemer's "Le Cavalier" and Weckerlin's "Bergere Legere."

The orchestral selections will be Tschaikowsky's fifth symphony, the prelude to Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel" and Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

"The Children's Crusade."

Twice has the Cecilia society given Pierne's musical setting of "The Children's Crusade" before large audiences, and the third performance in Boston Thursday evening, Feb 16, by the Cecilia society and the Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should be one of the most interesting musical events of the season. Besides the Cecilia society there will be a chorus of 100 children, which is being trained by Prof Hadley of the Somerville schools.

Corinne Rider-Kelsey will sing the part of the boy, Edith Chapman Goold the part of the girl, and the Narrator will be Edmond Clement, the eminent French lyric tenor.

The music of "The Old Sailor" will be sung by Claude Cunningham, and the other soloists will be Frances Dunton Brown, Earl Cartwright, Alice Bates Rice, Laura F. Eaton, Bertha Cushing Child and Emily Wentworth Carter.

SUNDAY POST, FEBRUARY 5, 1911

"THE CHILDREN'S CRUSADE"

Thursday evening, Feb 16, is the date set for the second concert by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the leadership of Max Fiedler. The work to be given then will be Gabriel Pierne's musical legend, "The Children's Crusade," which the Cecilia has given twice in recent years with much success. In addition to the chorus of the Cecilia Society, there will be a chorus of 100 children, and, of course the entire Symphony Orchestra will be employed.

Edmond Clement, the distinguished French tenor, will make his first appearance in concert in Boston on that occasion. Clement from all accounts is a master of the art of song, and should be particularly fortunate in a typical French work like "The Children's Crusade."

The other soloists will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold and Claude Cunningham.

Next Tuesday evening, in Chickering Hall, Miss Carolyn Beebe, pianist, and Mr. Edouard Dethier, violinist, will give the third and last of their sonata recitals this season in this city. They will play Emile Bernard's sonata in E-flat minor; a suite in F major by Reger; a sonata in G major by Stojowski.

At the Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Xavier Scharwenka, the Polish pianist and composer, now in his 61st year, will play for the first time in Boston his latest piano concerto, No. 4, in F minor. Mr. Scharwenka first saw the United States in 1874, when he made a concert tour. In 1891 he established a conservatory in New York. He has not visited this country since his return to Berlin in 1898. He is the composer of the famous "Polish Dance," and many compositions more pretentious. The remainder of the Symphony programme will consist of Haydn's symphony in E-flat; an overture of Handel, for strings, in D major, and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

At the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on the 9th, Edmond Clement, the French tenor, will be the assisting soloist. He will sing three arias and three songs with piano accompaniment. The orchestra will play Tschaikowsky's 5th symphony, the prelude to "Hansel und Gretel"; Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

HERALD, BOSTON, FEBRUARY 5, 1911

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The visiting soloist at the 15th Symphony rehearsal and concert on Friday and Saturday of this week will be the distinguished composer and pianist, Xaver Scharwenka, who returns to Boston, after an absence of several years. Few modern pianists are better known than Mr. Scharwenka, by reason of his compositions and his residence in New York for a number of years, during which time he was a successful teacher. This week he will play for the first time in Boston his latest Concerto for Piano, No. 4, in F Minor.

The rest of the program will be as follows: Handel, Overture in D Major; Haydn, Symphony in E Flat; Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE.

The fifth concert of the Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. Edmond Clement, the distinguished French lyric tenor, will then make his first appearance in this vicinity. He will sing with orchestra the "Aubade" from Lalo's "Roi d'Y's"; an air from Massenet's "Mage" and the Dream Song from "Manon"; with piano, Hahn's "Mai," Diemer's "Le Cavalier" and Weckerlin's "Bergere Legere." The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's fifth in E minor and the other numbers will be the prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel und Gretel" and Saint-Saens's "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

JOURNAL—TUESDAY FEBRUARY 7, 1911.

Symphony Back in Hub After Western Trip

The Symphony Orchestra returns today from its annual Western trip, which has been attended with the usual success that is the general rule with it. An element of novelty was injected into this tour by concerts in Pittsburg and Toledo. In Pittsburg not only was every seat in Memorial Hall occupied, but the entire standing room was filled. The papers were most enthusiastic over the performance of the orchestra and said that nothing could give a greater impetus to the movement for the revival of the Pittsburg Orchestra than the visit here of the great Boston organization. Toledo also gave a great audience on Wednesday evening.

Xaver Scharwenka, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at this week's concerts.

[151]

TIGHT BINDING

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1911.

CHILDREN CRUSADE TO BE SUNG HERE

The episode of "The Children's Crusade," which took place in the very beginning of the 13th century, is not only one of the most dramatic but one of the most pathetic pages in the history of the Middle Ages. Eighty thousand children started from their homes to go across the sea to rescue the Holy Sepulchre in the belief that the purity of their souls would enable them to succeed where the sin-stained men had five times failed. By treacherous ship-masters many were sold into captivity. Forty thousand crossed the Alps amid unheard of difficulties and of the second army of these a few sailed into Brindisi never to be heard of again.

This is the story on which Marcel Schwab has based his narrative, which Narrative Gabriel Pierne has set to music under the title of "The Children's Crusade." Twice this has been given here by the Cecilia Society with much success and the third performance in Boston, Thursday evening, Feb. 16th, by the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should be one of the most interesting musical events of the season. Besides the Cecilia Society there will be a chorus of one hundred children which is being trained by Professor Hadley of the Somerville schools.

The principal women singers will be Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, who will sing the part of "The Boy," Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, the part of "The Girl." Both of them are well known here. The Narrator will be Edmond Clement, the eminent French lyric tenor, who made so profound an impression in New York a year ago when he was a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company. The part of "The Old Sailor" will be sung by Claude Cunningham. The other soloists will be Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown, Earl Cartwright, Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child and Mrs. Bailly Wentworth Carter.

The visiting soloist at the fifteenth symphony rehearsal and concert on Friday and Saturday of this week will be the distinguished composer and pianist, Xaver Scharwenka, who returns to Boston after an absence of several years. Of the pianists now before the public few are better known than Scharwenka, not only because of his compositions, which are played to a greater or less extent by all students of the instrument, but because he resided and was a teacher in New York for a number of years. He will play for the first time in Boston his latest concerto for piano. It is No. 4 and it is in F-Minor. The rest of the programme will comprise Handel's Overture in D-Major, Haydn's Symphony in E-Flat and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

* * *

The fifth concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given Thursday evening, February at 8 o'clock. It will be the first appearance in this part of the country of Edmond Clement, the distinguished French lyric tenor, who a week later is to appear with the Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra in the performance of Pierne's The Children's Crusade." Mr. Clement will sing three arias and three songs with orchestra. He will sing with orchestra the "Aubade" from Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys"; an aria from Massenet's "Le Mage" and the "Dream Song" from "Manon." With piano he will sing Reynaldo Hahn's "Mai," Messager's "Le Cavalier" and Weckerlin's "Bergere legere." The symphony will be Tschaikowsky's fifth in E-Minor, and the other numbers will be the prelude to Humperdinck's "Haensel and Gretel" and Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

* * *

HERALD, BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 5, 191[1]

CECILIA AND SYMPHONY.

The episode of "The Children's Crusade," which took place in the very beginning of the 13th century, is not only one of the most dramatic but one of the most pathetic pages in the history of the middle ages. Eighty thousand children started from their homes to go across the sea to rescue the Holy Sepulchre in the belief that the purity of their souls would enable them to succeed where the sin-stained men had five times failed. This is the story on which Marcel Schwob based his narrative, and to this narrative Gabriel Pierne set music under the title of "The Children's Crusade." The cantata has been given here twice by the Cecilia Society with much success, and its third performance in Boston on Thursday evening, the 16th, by the Cecilia Society and the Symphony orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor, should be an interesting event. There will be a chorus of one hundred children, trained by Prof. Hadley of the Somerville schools.

The principal women singers will be Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey ("the Boy") and Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold ("the Girl"). Both of them are well known here. The Narrator will be Edmond Clement, the eminent French lyric tenor, who made a profound impression in New York a year ago when he was a member of the Metropolitan opera company. The part of "The Old Sailor" will be sung by Claude Cunningham. The other soloists will be Mrs. Frances D. Brown, Earl Cartwright, Mrs. Alice B. Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha C. Child and Mrs. Emily W. Carter.

Seats are now selling at Symphony Hall.

HERALD, TUESDAY,
FEBRUARY 7, 1911.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK.

The Symphony orchestra returns this morning from its annual western trip, which has been attended with the usual success. The trip itself was the longest it has taken in four years, since it went to Chicago in February, 1907. In most of the cities in which it gave concerts it is an annual feature, but this tour included concerts in Pittsburg and Toledo. In Pittsburg not only was every seat in Memorial Hall occupied, but the entire standing room was filled. The newspapers were enthusiastic over the performance of the orchestra, and said that nothing could give a greater impetus to the movement for the revival of the Pittsburg orchestra than the visit here of the great Boston organization. Toledo also gave a great audience on Wednesday evening. Xaver Scharwenka, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at this week's rehearsal and concert.

TRAVELER, TUESDAY,
FEBRUARY 7, 1911

SYMPHONY PLAYERS REPORT GREAT TOUR

The Symphony Orchestra returned today from its annual western trip, which this year has been attended with unusual success, being the longest the orchestra has taken in four years. Pittsburg and Toledo were added to the circuit. In Pittsburg even standing room was at a premium. Toledo also gave them a great audience. Xaver Scharwenka, the distinguished pianist, will be soloist at this week's concerts.

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY
FEBRUARY 7, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNS.

The Symphony Orchestra returns this morning from its annual Western trip, which has been attended with the usual success that is the general rule with it. The trip itself was the longest it has taken in four years since it went to Chicago in February, 1907. In most of the cities in which it gave concerts it is an annual feature, but an element of novelty was injected into this tour by concerts in Pittsburg and Toledo.

Xaver Scharwenka, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at this week's rehearsal and concert.

RECORD, TUESDAY,
FEBRUARY 7, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA RETURNS.

The Symphony Orchestra returns this morning from its annual Western trip, which has been attended with the usual success that is the general rule with it. The trip itself was the longest it has taken in four years since it went to Chicago in February, 1907. In most of the cities in which it gave concerts it is an annual feature, but an element of novelty was injected into this tour by concerts in Pittsburg and Toledo.

Xaver Scharwenka, the distinguished pianist, will be the soloist at this week's rehearsal and concert.

RECORD, THURSDAY,
FEBRUARY 9, 1911

MUSIC NOTES.

Edmond Clement, the distinguished tenor, who is to make his debut in concert here at the performance of "The Children's Crusade" by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra on next Thursday evening, appears for the first time in this neighborhood tonight at the Symphony concert in Cambridge. He is to sing three short arias with orchestra and three songs.

Handel's Overture in D-Major, a work which has not been heard here in many years, Haydn's Symphony in E-Flat, Xaver Scharwenka's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto in F-Minor and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," make the programme for the 15th public rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. The Handel Overture is the one which was arranged by Wullner, the father of Dr. Wullner, the distinguished singer, who was for many years conductor in Cologne and at the head of the Cologne Conservatory. The soloist will be Xaver Scharwenka and his Concerto will be heard here for the first time.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY,
FEBRUARY 9, 1911

When Mr. Busoni plays with the Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of next week, he will revive Beethoven's concerto in C-minor—a piece that pianists choose very seldom nowadays and that has not been heard here for twenty years. In compliment to the pianist, who is composer, too, Mr. Fiedler has put on the programme Mr. Busoni's orchestral suite, "Turandot."

HERALD, THURSDAY,
FEBRUARY 9, 1911.

MUSIC NOTES.

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening will be as follows. Handel, overture in D major (Franz Wuellner's arrangement); Haydn, Symphony in E flat major (B and H No. 1); Scharwenka, concerto in F minor, No. 4 (first time here); Smetana, Symphonic poem "The Moldau." Xaver Scharwenka will be the pianist. He played here with the Symphony orchestra Feb. 6, 7, 1891.

Concerts of next week: Sunday, 7:30 P. M., Verdi's Requiem, performed by the Handel and Haydn Society. Solo quartet, Mme. Alma Gluck, Mme. Schumann-Heink, George Hamlin, Clifford Cairns. Monday, 8:15, second concert of the Longy Club (wind instruments). Tuesday, 8:15, piano recital by George Copeland. pieces by Couperin, Chopin, Turina and Debussy. On Thursday, 8 P. M., Pierne's "Children's Crusade" will be performed by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Fiedler conductor. Edmond Clement, the distinguished tenor of the Opera Comique, Paris and Metropolitan Opera House, New York, and Mrs. Rider-Kelsey and Mrs. Chapman-Goold will be the chief soloists. Friday evening, 8:15, concert by the Hoffmann quartet with Felix Fox, pianist. Pieces by Glazounoff, Dohnanyi and Cesar Franck. The program of the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra (Friday afternoon and Saturday evening) will be as follows: Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin"; Strauss "Don Quixote" (Mr. Warnke, 'cello, Mr. Ferir, viola); Beethoven, piano concerto in C minor, No. 3; Busoni, suite from music to Gozzi's "Turandot." Ferruccio Busoni pianist.

Mr. Busoni will give a piano recital in Jordan Hall Feb. 28 at 3 o'clock. Chopin, four ballads; Liszt, six etudes; two legends and the Don Juan fantasie.

JOURNAL—SATURDAY,
FEBRUARY 11, 1911.

NOTED PIANIST IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Scharwenka Renders His New Fourth Concerto Before Large Audience.

Xaver Scharwenka appeared as both soloist and composer at yesterday's Symphony concert. It was another example of history repeating itself. The distinguished pianist made his debut with the Symphony Orchestra twenty years ago under similar conditions, playing his own concerto, No. 1, in B flat minor. Now he returns, playing his new fourth concerto, in F minor, which is dedicated to Queen Elizabeth of Roumania.

The concerto has been called Schumannesque. It is romantic in spirit, melodious, and here and there brilliant. It is the work of a sound and mature musician; and sound and scholarly is Mr. Scharwenka's playing. The concerto is especially interesting on account of its excellent orchestral part. The soloist and the orchestra are equally prominent. This is an advantage to the soloist when the orchestra is so efficient as the one here in Boston. In the second movement of the concerto, with its suggestion of the old gavotte, piano and orchestra are blended most skilfully. This movement won the greatest applause yesterday. Mr. Scharwenka's playing was thoroughly enjoyed by the large audience. It was artistic in the highest sense of the term.

Two rather unfamiliar numbers, Handel's overture No. 1, in D major and Haydn's symphony in E flat maor, comprise the first part of this week's program. The symphony has not been played here for a score of years. Both of these old-fashioned compositions are spirited and tuneful. The last number on the program is Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

TRANSCRIPT, FRIDAY
FEBRUARY 10, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

A NEW AND RARE TENOR IN MR. CLEMENT

The French Singer at Cambridge Last Night—A Voice That Charms and a Skill and Style That Are Pleasure—The "Comedy for Music" That Hofmannsthal Made for Strauss—An Unusual Opera Text—The Britons and Their Sousa—An Opera in English at the Metropolitan

FOR the first time hereabouts, Edmond Clément, the French tenor, sang at the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge last night. To the expert, at least, his reputation in the opera house and in the concert-room had preceded him. He was very carefully and intelligently trained; he made his way gradually and deservedly; he rose little by little to be the first tenor of the Opéra-Comique in Paris, and from it he went last winter to sing at the Metropolitan Opera House. It has few French operas in its repertory; it had fewer still that were also in Mr. Clément's. He sang only on rare occasion, but those occasions sufficed to prove the pleasure of his right voice, the adroitness of his vocal skill, and the intelligence, resource and the sense of fitness—which are style—that pervaded all that he did. He was not a tenor to pour forth waves of mellow tone or to storm the heavens with the power of his declamation. It was his finer portion to charm the ears of those that perversely like a hint of the baritone in a tenor's voice and the peculiar quality of lightness and transparency in Mr. Clément's upper tones. Distinctly he was and is a tenor for connoisseurs who bear no aversion to the head tones of French singing, who again are perverse enough to like them. Mr. Clément or his managers believed that there were enough such in America to warrant his return. He came first to Boston and its neighborhood last night and for a fortnight or more to come he will sing both in concerts and in opera here.

Mr. Clément seems still a young man, spare and dark, with the distinction of manner and the quiet poise in the concert-room that every French singer somehow learns, until they become as second nature to him. He could hardly have been more warmly received than he was by his audience at Cambridge last night; he could hardly have acknowledged its applause more sincerely and reticently, and such manner—in the best sense of the abused word—is one of the rarer graces of these days of the under-trained in the concert-room. He sang generously—three fragments of operas by Lalo and Massenet, two French songs by minor composers, and a bit of French folk-song in the graceful revision of Weckerlin. His voice is light; but to many ears its lightness gives it a charm that was the more pleasurable in the relatively small auditorium and the sensitive acoustics of Sanders Theatre. It has the tinge of baritone quality that saves it from undue sweetness, and that heightens its capacity for expression; while its upper tones are of a soft brightness of texture and of a curious lace-like quality that make them fascinating to hear. He sings with the artistry that strikes, sustains, rounds and shades his tones almost flawlessly. He shapes his phrases with the skill of the singer who can fuse music and text. He can spin his voice, as the word goes, very gracefully, or he can concentrate it without forcing or hardening it. He is more than the trained singer; he is the singer with the sense of style that flowers from such training and by which Mr. Clément adapted his singing last night with equal fitness to the simple lightness of the folksong or the pretty, fanciful music of Reynaldo Hahn, or the more operatic accents of Massenet. In each piece Mr. Clément preserved and enhanced the quality of the music, because he had the intelligence and the imagination to discover it, and the skill to summon and select the vocal means that would best impart it. Because he is so adroit a singer, the more—and not the less, as some believe—does he convey the mood, the emotion, the poetry, if poetry there be, of song. He is of its finer arts and its finer ends. H. T. P.

POST, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911

SCHARWENKA SOLOIST WITH SYMPHONY

BY OLIN DOWNES

Xaver Scharwenka, the Polish pianist and composer, appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, at the 15th public rehearsal of the season. His concert in F minor was heard for the first time in this city. It is a virtuoso piece, built on an ambitious scale.

His scoring, though thick, is modern. The piano often amalgamates with the other instruments, there is careful attention to symphonic structure, the themes are well contrasted and often developed with ingenuity.

The second movement is in the character of a gavotte and there is a sentimental reminiscence from the movement which went before. The simplicity of this gavotte may well be suspected, and when it is not affectedly simple it is cheap. The finale has a portentous introduction which grows into a jubilant tarantella. The material does not justify the means. The tarantella would be better written for two pianos. The themes are without pronounced distinction or originality. The orchestration is too thick, especially in the scoring of heavy chords.

But this concerto, largely on account of its admirable performance, was enjoyed. It was to be expected that Mr. Scharwenka would play his own work with conviction and authority, but had the music been less interesting than it was, the performance would have been a triumph for him. He sometimes overtaxed the resources of his instrument, but he played with the splendid mastery of one to the manner born, and he earned his applause.

[152]

Pittsburgh Post
Jan. 31, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS NEW RACHMANINOFF WORK

Max Fiedler Conducts Notable Organization, With Its Size Reduced.

ANTON WITEK THE SOLOIST

Admirable Renditions Enthuse Audience in Soldiers' Memorial.

Last evening the Pittsburgh Orchestra association presented the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, in concert in Soldiers' Memorial. Every seat in the big auditorium was accupied and much of the standing room. There was a goodly amount of enthusiasm manifested before the program was finished. The soloist was Anton Witek, concertmaster.

This was the first appearance of the Boston organization in this city in 16 years and the concert had been looked forward to with more than ordinary interest by hundreds of patrons of the old Pittsburgh orchestra and by many others as well. It had been widely advertised that 85 of the 100 men comprising this organization would be heard, but as it turned out there were only about 65 men on the stage. Why there were 20 men less than the number promised was not explained.

But even with so small a personnel the Boston Symphony orchestra is a superb organization, and it has so long stood unchallenged as the greatest orchestra in the world that this fact regarding it does not need to be further emphasized. Equally would an analysis of its tone quality be but a repetition of what has been written hundreds of times for that big, solid, rich and often luscious quality has became a matter of musical history in this country. But last night the beauty of the strings was now and then submerged, just as is always the case when but 12 first violins and the other strings in proportion must play against the brass choir.

This concert was a "first time" occasion four times over, for it served to introduce to this public Max Fiedler, Anton Witek, a symphony by Rachmaninoff, and an overture by Gaston Strube. The only familiar orchestral number on the program was one which many in the audience (thanks to the fact that Pittsburgh once had an orchestra of her own), must have known almost note for note, the greatest overture ever written, Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3."

It would have been more gratifying to have heard Mr. Fiedler conduct one of the well known symphonies and even more gratifying to have heard the orchestra play such a work, for new compositions, particularly those for orchestra, are difficult to understand at a first hearing. Possibly Mr. Fiedler thought that in a city where a permanent orchestra had played for 16 years, a new symphony would be the most enjoyed. But although the audience recalled the conductor a number of times at the close of the Rachmaninoff work, it is more than probable that a better known symphony would have called forth a greater demonstration between the movements. As it was the "Adagio" won the most favor.

Judging from the first hearing of Mr. Feidler, he read the score with the sincerity and sympathy of a scholarly musician. He himself appears more like a successful and cultivated business man than the typical German conductor. In methods he is much given to violent gesticulation, calling his men to action through motion as frequently as though they were not skilled performers. He is full of fire, and produced well built up climaxes with his small orchestra of such volume that the correct and gentle Gericke, who for so many years stood at the conductor's desk before this same organization, would have been horrified. But it sounded well to hear the big climaxes peal forth as they should.

The symphony gave ample opportunity for the technical virtuosity of the orchestra to be demonstrated, for it is one of those intricate scores so dear to the hearts of the present-day composers and so far removed from the magnificent simplicity of a Beethoven. Many beautiful features were revealed in this work, particularly in the "Adagio" and the "Scherzo" charmed with its cleverness even when its spirit was not infectious. A number of hearings of the music might make its entire scheme more patent to the listener, but what in the program book was called the "restless passion" of the first movement did not make a deep impression last evening. More effective was the last movement with its contrasting moods clearly revealed. The entire symphony is richly orchestrated, in some places showing the touch of the true genius in this respect.

Preceding the symphony, Mr. Strube's overture, "Puck," had been given and it proved an agreeable opening number. Not until Mr. Fiedler obliged the composer to stand and receive the applause did the audience know that he was among the first violins.

Mr. Witek chose as his one solo number the well-known and well-loved Mendelssohn concerto in E minor, and gave a beautiful interpretation of the work, particularly in the second and third movements. He was recalled many times, for the auidence was determined to have an encore, which Mr. Fiedler, following the custom of all conductors of great orchestras, did not allow. The program closed with the Beethoven overture, faultlessly played from a technical standpoint, although more sympathetic interpretations of it have been heard from orchestras less notable. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler possesses the "divine fire," but it was not manifested in last evening's performance, although all he did commanded admiration because it was the work of the sincere and thorough musician.

The next concert in the Pittsburgh Orchestra association series will be given by the Theodore Thomas orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, on the evening of February 21. J. M.

THE PITTSBURG PRESS
EVENING, JANUARY 31, 1911

BIG AUDIENCE GREETS BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Even Standing Room Taken at Memorial Hall.

For the first time in 16 years the Boston Symphony appeared before a Pittsburg audience last night. The concert, the second in the series arranged by the Pittsburg Orchestra Association, was given in Soliers' and Sailors' Memorial hall, Bellefield. The orchestra was conducted by Max Fiedler, one of the best-known conductors in the world. Although there was a disappointment at the very outset when it was seen that Conductor Fiedler had brought with him only 65 players, instead of the 85 assured in the press notices, the feeling was allayed by teh splendid work of the players.

Two numbers new to Pittsburg were on the program. They were the comedy overture "Puck," composed by Gustave Strube, one of the orchestra's first violins, and the Symphony in E Miner by the Russian composer, Rachmaninoff. The second part of the program was devoted to the Mendelssohn violin concerto in E Minor and the Beethoven overture, "Lenore" No. 3. At the conclusion of this last selection, Anton Witek, violinist, was recalled time and time again.

The next concert of the series will be given by the Theodore Thomas Orchestra, of Chicago, the conductor of which is Frederick Stock. It will be given in the same hall on the evening of February 21.

THE PITTSBURG LEADER
EVENING, JANUARY 31, 1911.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYERS GREETED BY GREAT THRONG

Pittsburg's music lovers were out in force last night, filling Soldiers' Memorial hall to hear the Boston Symphony orchestra in the second of the series of concerts given by the Pittsburg Orchestra association. The fame of the Bostonians is country wide and since they have not been here in a number of years, the music-hungry public of this city and vicinity assembled to give them a generous welcome.

Max Fiedler, who has been head of the organization several years, conducted the players, who numbered 65. The program opened with Strube's overture, "Puck." The second symphony of Rachmaninoff was unusually well received. Anton Witek, the concertmeister, was the soloist, playing the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. He has a solid, clear technic, good tone and displayed great familiarity with the composition. He was recalled several times.

The program closed with Beethoven's Lenore No. 3 overture, a Pittsburg favorite. The orchestra's rendition was almost faultless and Conductor Fiedler added charm to it by giving it a different reading than local music lovers have been accustomed to. It is announced that the Theodore Thomas orchestra will be here for the next concert, February 21.

SPRINGFIELD REPUBLICAN
FEBUARY 2, 1911.

It will be glad news for Springfield music-lovers that the Boston symphony orchestra has unexpectedly decided to give a concert at Court Square theater Monday evening, March 27. With this and the concert to be given at the same place Wednesday evening, February 15, by the New York Philharmonic orchestra conducted by Gustav Mahler, the season will be uncommonly rich in orchestral music of the finest sort. The Boston orchestra used to visit Springfield each season for a series of concerts, but of late years it has been averse to travel; its change of policy will be welcome to the public.

SPRINGFIELD DAILY REPUBLICAN FEBUARY 2, 1911

It will be good news to the musical public of Springfield that arrangements have finally been made whereby the Boston symphony orchestra will give a concert here during the current season. The date set for the concert is Monday evening, March 27, and the place will as usual be the Court Square theater. Full details concerning this will be announced later.

Pittsburg Post
Jan. 31, 1911

TUESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1911
THE PITTSBURGH CHRONICLE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA GIVES PLEASING PROGRAM

Fiedler's Players Afford a Musical Treat to Standing Room Audience.

UNITY AND EXCELLENCE

By PAUL KENNEDY HARPER.

As the second of its series of visiting orchestras, the Pittsburg Orchestra Association presented in Soldiers' Memorial Hall last evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor. An appreciative and enthusiastic audience filled every seat and a goodly portion of the standing room was gathered together to hear this extraordinary orchestra and was most demonstrative in its expressions of approval. This is the first visit the Boston organization has paid Pittsburg in many years and had been awaited with pleasurable anticipation by most of the music-loving element of the city. The deep interest shown and evident pleasure received by each and every member of the large audience once more stirs up hope of better things in the Pittsburg "orchestra situation." "It is an ill wind that blows no good," and because of the suspension of operations of our own orchestra for a time we are being given this musical treat which otherwise would have been denied us—that of hearing these great organizations in real symphonic programs.

The Boston organization is as nearly perfectly balanced as would be possible. A complete and highly efficient complement of strings is perfectly supported by reed and brass choirs of satisfactory dimensions. Particularly satisfying are the horns.

Two New Numbers.

Two numbers new to Pittsburg audiences were given—the Comedy Overture, "Puck," by Gustav Strube, and the Symphony in E Minor, by the Russian, Rachmaninoff. In Strube's "Puck" there is an element of rare good humor throughout, the whole composition being typical of its title. The Boston violinist-composer evidently conceived and certainly executed the number in a bright and jocose mood. It was excellently played, and received instant favor wtih the audience. Mr. Strube is one of the first violins in the orchestra, and was compelled to bow acknowledgment many times. The composition is dedicated to Mr. Fiedler.

In his Symphony in E Minor Rachmaninoff has evolved one of the most interesting and original works of the decade, using many surprising effects in places where they are least expected, as for example, the entire coda to the first movement and its final ending.

Perhaps the most beautiful, and certainly the most interesting, portion of the symphony is the second part "Allegro molto." In this movement the composer has shown more inventiveness and originality than in the other parts, or, perhaps, strictly speaking, the inspiration is more marked. It was in this movement that the good work of the horns was most noticed. In the Adagio are used several beautifully melodic passages, and special mention might be made of the excellent manner in which the incidental clarinet solo was played. The symphony ends with an Allegro vivace of great power, containing many melodic fragments heard in the earlier portions of the work.

Program's Second Part.

The second part of the evening was devoted to the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto in E Minor and the Beethoven overture, "Lenore" No. 3. The concerto is without doubt the most popular and best known of all violin concertos and was familiar, no doubt, to many in the audience. Anton Witek is undoubtedly a technicist of great ability, but his tone is not always altogether satisfactory and in places he seemed to fall somewhat short of what we expect in this concerto. Especially in the impassioned Allegro there was a lack of intensity. However, Mr. Witek was recalled many times.

That this series of concerts is being so well patronized and that such an interest is being shown is an excellent augury for the future.

The concert last evening did not start until 15 minutes to 9 o'clock, although the orchestra was in position and ready at about 10 minutes after 8 o'clock, but, owing to the constant arrival of tardy persons, did not commence to play until the time mentioned.

The next concert of the series will be given in Soldiers' Memorial Hall, February 21, by the Theodore Thomas orchestra of Chicago, Frederick Stock, conductor, and Bruno Steindel, 'cellist, as soloist.

Symphony Concert Attracts Throng

Attendance and Enthusiasm Show Pittsburghers' Appreciation of Really Good Music.

THE PROGRAM PLEASES ALL

However indifferent Pittsburghers may be to the merits of a symphony orchestra which makes Pittsburgh its permanent abiding place, their indifference vanishes when a distinguished orchestra from abroad comes to town. This was made plain last night at Memorial Hall, where the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association gave the second of its series of four concerts, presenting the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler. The repute of this great organization as being second to none in America and being on a par with the best of the European orchestras is of long standing, and it is effectively maintained under the skillful hands of the present director. The Boston orchestra never before had been heard in Pittsburgh and consequently interest in its appearance was widespread. Every seat in the house was occupied and hundreds of auditors had to be content with standing room. Unfortunately the audience was slow in arriving, with the result that the opening of the concert was delayed nearly half an hour, and it was an unconscionably late hour when the program was completed.

The program embraced but four numbers, representing widely different styles. Chief among these was the Second Symphony in E minor, by Rachmaninoff, a work which had its first presentation in Moscow two years ago and which is new to Pittsburghers. This production is so complex in construction and so replete with abstruse conceptions and involved thematic development as to be a long way above the head of the average musician, to say nothing of the general public. Had Rachmaninoff written his symphony in advance of Strauss, D'Indy and Debussy he would have been regarded as being a long way in advance of his time. As it is, he goes further than Brahms, while he himself admits that he is unable to keep pace with or to comprehend the value of the work of the present-day musical mystics. He is a master of colorful orchestration, and this fact it was probably that moved Director Fiedler to introduce the new symphony here, the splendid powers of the orchestra being thus brought into bold relief, while the director himself enjoyed the opportunity of giving a notable demonstration of his ability.

In the second part Anton Witek, the concertmaster of the orchestra, played the familiar and always popular violin concerto of Mendelssohn. Herr Witek possesses flawless technique and a delicacy of tone suggesting that he is playing on strings of silk or gossamer. He was tremendously applauded, the audience calling him out half a dozen times, but in accordance with Mr. Fiedler's rules, an encore was not permitted.

A minor number of genuine interest was the Comedy Overture to "Puck," by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, with which the concert opened. This composition, in sonata form, is charmingly scored and abounds in dainty poetic effects. The composer received an ovation. The concert closed with Beethoven's overture, "Lenore" No. 3, well worn, but of popularity that never wanes.

For the next of the season's dates the orchestra association announces the Theodore Thomas Orchestra of Chicago, Frederick Stock, conductor.

ARTHUR G. BURGOYNE.

SYRACUSE JOURNAL
Monday, February 6, 1911.

Music

One of those musical events upon which you can pin your memory and refer to for years to come as one of the most delightful of its kind, was the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at the Wieting Saturday evening. It was a program of the dainty novelty and exquisitely interesting in symphony, overture and concerto. It did not have so much of the solidly dignified and dull and was therefore more appreciated by the majority. To the Morning Musicals is to be given the credit of bringing the Boston Symphony here, and, while their tribute to the art of the season meant a distinct loss to the Musicals, it has done much for an already brilliant season. Every one who enjoyed that concert Saturday night is a debtor of the Morning Musicals.

[153]

SBURGH SUN

LARGE AUDIENCE ENJOYS CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes First Appearance in Pittsburgh in 16 Years and Scores a Triumph.

After an absence from Pittsburgh of 16 years the Boston Symphony orchestra paid a visit to our city last night to give a concert at the Soldiers' Memorial under the auspices of the Pittsburgh Orchestra association, and scored a distinct triumph. Previous to the concert it had been announced that at least 85 men would be brought here, but for some reason when Conductor Max Fiedler raised his baton for the first number of the program there were not more than 65 men on the platform. The 65 that did come, however, showed themselves to be banded together in a sterling organization and there is no telling what would have been the result with 20 more players.

The audience that was thoroughly pleased with the concert was immense and enthusiastic. Nearly every seat in the big auditorium of the Memorial was taken and there were many people standing. The efforts of the musicians were appreciated and time and again after the completion of a number by the orchestra the hall fairly rang with spontaneous and continued applause. Anton Witek, the concermaster, was the soloist.

The principle number by the orchestra was a Rachmaninoff symphony, a work entirely new to Pittsburgh music lovers. There may have been a few in the vast audience that had heard the work before, but the great majority had not. However, the audience seemed to like the number as well as if it had been one with which they were entirely familiar and the conductor and orchestra were applauded when it was finished. The "adagio" proved the most popular movement.

Mr. Fiedler was just as new to the audience as the symphony was, but he soon won for himself a permanent place in the hearts of the many who heard him conduct last night. His men responded to his every appeal and he showed himself to be a scholarly musician and an able conductor. The symphony gave both the conductor and the orchestra ample opportunity to show their ability, and they both took full advantage of it.

Other numbers on the program were the opening number, the overture, "Puck," by Gaston Strube, another number new to Pittsburghers, and Beethoven's "Leonore No. 3" overture.

Mr. Witek gave as his solo number the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor in such a finished manner that he was recalled several times by the audience when he had finished, but Mr. Fiedler did not allow him to respond with an encore. Taken all in all the concert last night was the biggest musical event Pittsburgh has had this winter and one long to be remembered. The Boston Symphony orchestra has a reputation among many of being the best orchestra in the world and it surely lived up to this reputation last night as far as Pittsburgh is concerned, even though it was not playing in its full strength.

W. W.

GAZETTE TIMES, TUESD

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES SUCCESS

Immense Audience Fills to Overflowing the Great Soldiers' Memorial Hall.

MANY AUDITORS STANDING

Conductor Max Fiedler and Musicians Ably Render a Delightful Program.

By THEODORE RENTZ.

The long-anticipated concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the second in the Pittsburgh Orchestra Association's series, was given last night in the Soldiers and Sailors' Memorial Hall.

It is many years since the Boston orchestra has been heard here and their appearance last night was the fulfillment of a wish expressed many times by Pittsburgh music-lovers. These were out in force and the surrounding towns contributed to an audience that filled every seat in the vast auditorium, and many were obliged to stand through the performance, being unable to procure seats. There was an air of expectancy noticeable, and while it was justified by the fame of the Boston musicians, it led to meditation on the lack of similar manifestations at the Pittsburgh Orchestra concerts of past seasons.

Much has been said and written in the past few weeks of the unusual personnel of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and it is not necessary to repeat these details here, but it is undoubtedly one of the finest orchestras in the world. It was announced that the orchestra would contain 85 players, but the usual disappointment resulted, as there were but 65 on the stage. Max Fiedler, the conductor, has been at the head of the organization for several years, following such eminent musicians as Gericke, Paur, Nickish and Dr. Carl Muck. Before coming to Boston he was well known in Europe as pianist and conductor, and is a man of scholarly attainments and sincerity of purpose. Under his direction the orchestra plays both solidly and brilliantly. Though evidently gifted with great musical temperament, he never allows it to interfere with balance in his readings.

New Overture for Opening.

The program began with a new overture composed by Gustave Strube, one of the first violinists of the orchestra. Mr. Strube's reputation as a composer is gradually spreading, but as his works are generally in the larger form, opportunities to hear them are comparatively infrequent. His overture "Puck," which was brought forward last night, is based on the ancient idea of Puck as a genial, mischievious imp, and its pervading idea is brightness and sprightliness. Mr. Strube has reproduced this spirit in tone and his command of the orchestral resources is admirably illustrated by this work, which proved an excellent opening number for the program. Mr. Fiedler caused the violinist to acknowledge the applause, which he was forced to do several times. The orchestra played the work with verve and enthusiasm.

Last season, Sergei Rachmaninoff was heard in a piano recital and created a very favorable impression, both by his pleasing personality and by his music. Pittsburgh had its first opportunity last night to hear one of his orchestral works. His second symphony has been played in several cities by the Boston and other orchestras and has invariably been accorded a fine reception as one of the most representative of ultra-modern works. It is difficult to give a critical opinion of a symphony like this after a single hearing, but there is no doubt that the music gives a very favorable impression and promise of deeper enjoyment upon better acquaintance. The influence of the Russian school, especially that of Tchaikovsky, is felt throughout the work. It is somber in mood and, even in the rhythmic measures of the second movement the melancholy temperament of the Slav is not altogether absent.

Work Is Well Received.

The adagio, perhaps, met with the greatest reception, though the whole work was well received and the conductor was recalled several times at its conclusion. This slow movement afforded splendid opportunity for observing the beautiful tone color of the orchestra. The warmth and quality of the strings, the precision and intonation of the wood winds and the refinement of the brasses were a revelation.

Anton Witek, the concertmaster, was the soloist of the evening. He is well known in Europe as a sterling artist, having served for many years as concertmaster of the Berlin Philharmonic, one of the leading orchestras of Germany. He played the Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. Of great melodic beauty and displaying the technical possibilities of the instrument in a brilliant manner, this work is a favorite of violinists, being played perhaps oftener than any concerto in the literature of the instrument. Mr. Witek posseses a solid, clear technic, a good tone and displayed the greatest familiarity with the composition. The andante, which always is a favorite with the audience, was warmly received. The last movement suffered from the tempo taken by the artist. The speed was such that the orchestra had some difficult in following and the rapid passages in the solo instrument were unclear and blurred. Mr. Witek was recalled numerous times, but did not respond with an encore, probably on account of the lateness of the hour.

Beethovens' Lenore, No. 3 overture, a familiar favorite with Pittsburgh audiences, closed the program. Mr. Fiedler gave it a somewhat different reading than that we are accustomed to. It was rather tempetuous, and though dramatic and virile, some of the quieter parts suffered. The orchestra again displayed the qualities that have made it one of the most famous in the world. The attack, execution and tone were well nigh faultless.

The audience was so long getting seated that it was after the announced starting time before the concert could begin, consequently it was quite late before the last note was played and undoubtedly inconvenienced those obliged to rely on trains to carry them home. The Orchestra Association announces the Theodore Thomas Orchestra for the next concert on February 21.

BUFFALO ENQUIRER,
FEBURAIY 4, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY'S EXCELLENT CONCERT

Marvelous beyond words is the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its wonderful director, Max. Fiedler. It was no wonder that Convention Hall was filled to its capacity last night for the concert by this great organization, for the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra always is associated with the best and noblest in the noble art of music.

The programme was splendid in arrangement and magnificently presented. Never has Beethoven's sweet, sad and simple "Leonora" Overture No. 3, been so grandly interpreted before a Buffalo audience as last night. Every detail of this beautiful overture was delivered with utmost skill, and the waves of music held the audience spellbound as they glided over the great hall. Max Fiedler truly is a genius and the work of his orchestra truly sublime.

The programme opened with the comedy overture "Puck," by Gustav Strube, delivered brilliantly and accurately, with a marvelous degree of evenness throughout the interpretation. Rachmaninoff's Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27, never before played in Buffalo, is great in its conception, and the rendition given this last night created great enthusiasm among the audience.

In the Mendelssohn concert in E minor for violin, Anton Witek was soloist. Much has been said of Mr. Witek in local musical circles, but last night afforded the first opportunity to hear him in Buffalo. He is a great master and completely captivated his audience last night by his splendid rendering of the difficult concerto. His playing was enthusiastically received and the impression he gave was most favorable.

Boston Symphony Captivates Big Audience at the Wieting

Red Letter Night for Music Lovers of Syracuse—Gratification Shown at Public Spirited Action in Bringing Organization Here.

Last night, for the second time within a year, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, was heard in concert in Syracuse and captivated a fine audience. It was a red-letter event in the musical history of Syracuse, and every one who enjoyed it must have felt a debt of gratitude to that enterprising and public-spirited local organization, the Morning Musicals, for having brought Herr Fiedler's accomplished band of performers to this city, at great expense and no little risk. The Boston Symphony orchestra is now the largest in the country. It is fully double the size of the company of artists with which Theodore Thomas gave many American auditors their first delighted taste of classic orchestral compositions about forty years ago.

But the exceptionally large number of orchestral voices now at Herr Fiedler's command means not the slightest deterioration of the fine unity and symmetry of method and deep sympathy of feeling that have always characterized the public exhibitions of the Boston Symphony organization.

The programme, as a whole, was a prodigy of advanced art, and it seems well nigh impossible to particularize justly in favor of one brilliant number at the expense of the rest. In its rich variety and high representative quality it was specially deserving of praise. Our great symphony orchestras are too apt to ignore the famous and always popular overtures in the selection of their concert repertories—such overtures as "Oberon" and "William Tell," the beauty of which time and repetition have not impaired. To this class belongs the overture to Carl Weber's opera, "Der Freischutz," which was first produced in Berlin in 1821. It is one of the masterpieces of this form of composition, breathing from the first bar to the last the romantic spirit of the noble opera. It was performed by the orchestra last night with dramatic enthusiasm and superb artistic finish, and this beautiful initial number immediately established the closest of sympathy between the orchestra and its cultivated hearers.

Dvorak's wonderful E minor symphony, "From the New World," in which he revealed the choice fruits of his creative genius after a patient and sympathetic study of our plantation chants and negro folk songs, was already familiar to many of the audience; but it must have disclosed new power and beauty and meaning to them under the scholarly and dignified treatment of Conductor Fiedler and his men last night. There is very little of the new world and very much of Dvorak's own Bohemian mysticism in this extremely interesting work; but nobody who heard the interpretation of it last night could have doubted that it is one of the very greatest orchestral productions of the last decade.

The violin performance of Anton Witek, a soloist of high rank, were among the most charming features of the concert. He is singularly fortunate in the possession of a famous violin, a Stradivarius of great rarity and value and of surpassingly sweet timbre, a king of kings among string instruments. With this marvelous violin to conjure with, Mr. Witek rendered a Paganini concerto with a delicacy of expression, a beauty of color and cantabile effect and a grace and facility of execution that could scarcely be overpraised. It was a fascinating display of technical power and proficiency supplemented by the poetic instinct and that sure grasp of the possibilities of melodic variation which are always the unmistakable signs of true virtuosity. His extraordinary play in harmonics has perhaps never been equaled in this city; and on the whole he must rank, in the opinion of local judges, as the greatest violinist who has visited Syracuse in the last two decades, with the exception of Fritz Kreisler. At the close of Mr. Witek's remarkable performance he was vociferously applauded, and bowed his acknowledgments over and over again. But he stood fast to his wise rule and that of his orchestra, and declined to play another selection. In the Wagnerian number, he was heard again in the sonorous and always welcome strains of the Meistersingers' overture, and confirmed the opinion formed by the audience of his brilliant talents.

Not the least of the numbers rendered with such artistic finesse by the orchestra was that weird blend of saturnine humor and insistent pathos given to the world by the famous Russian composer Tschaikowsky in his whimsical ballet music, "The Nutcrackers." It was a delight, not alone intrinsically, but in its striking contrast with overture and symphony.

The Wagnerian prelude was nobly reproduced, and it was a fitting close to one of the finest musical feasts it has been the privilege of our citizens to enjoy.

POST-STANDARD, SYRACUSE,
FEBRUARY 6, 1911.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Morning Musicals, an organization which stands for the advancement of art in the community, gave to Syracuse on Saturday night a remarkable orchestral concert by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the conductorship of Max Fiedler.

It was in many respects a musical triumph in the history of Syracuse. There were present music lovers who are ever eager to hear the best, there were musicians who earn their livelihood in the musical realm, there were students and there were many in the audience who are coming to realize that one does not have to be a professional musician or even a close student to enjoy the best that the great composers and players are giving to the American people to-day.

Not only did Mr. Fiedler direct his orchestra of skilled players with rare charm, but he gave to Syracuse a programme that entertained the lay musician as well as the scholar. It must be said to the credit of both Mr. Fiedler and the Morning Musicals that the selection of the programme was highly commendable.

Opening with the Weber overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," the orchestra provided a number of impressive selections. Next came the Dvorak symphony, from "The New World," which was a revelation to the average music lover from such points as interpretation, tonal effects and wealth of coloring. Delightful in all its phases was the Tschaikowsky suite for full orchestra from the score of the ballet "Nutcracker." In this there were dances, marches and waltz, all typical of a fairy story with plenty of jollity and grotesqueness.

In the "Dans de la Fee-Dragee" the celesta, a keyboard instrument, was introduced with brilliant effect. There was a wealth of rhythm throughout this suite that concluded with the beautiful "Valse des Fleurs." Mr. Fiedler concluded his programme with the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," by Wagner.

The soloist, Anton Witek, concert master and violinist, was a factor of no mean proportions. He aroused the audience to a pitch of enthusiasm that brought him back to the stage a half dozen times after his Paganini concerto.

It was an eventful occasion in the history of music in Syracuse. It cost the Morning Musicals $3,000. The box office [illegible] $2,000.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1911.

THE TOLEDO NEWS-BEE.

Fine Music by Boston Orchestra

Superb concert was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Max Fiedler at the Valentine Wednesday evening. Yet that was exactly what one should expect of such an orchestra, with such a director.

Take a band of 75 virtuosi and artists, most of whom have played together for years, and have been trained under the greatest directors of the musical world, including the present leader, and what less would you expect than that the orchestra is not only the best in America, but even ranks with any of the big orchestras of the old world?

Director Fiedler is a man of great ability. Of striking peculiarities he has none. He is simply the broad, scholarly musician. He knows the possibilities of the orchestra. He is master of every detail in his branch of musical science and art. He works out the little points, but ever keeps in view the effect of a piece as a whole.

And, of course, he is thoroughly familiar with the music played and with the composer's intention. Such a man's interpretations must be authoritative. His message to the audience is positive, clear, convincing.

[154]

BUFFALO COMMERCIAL, FEBRUARY 4, 1911.

BRILLIANT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gave Excellent Program Last Evening.

ANTON WITEK FINE.

Created an Exceptional Furore With His Masterful Performance—Fiedler is Immense.

A large and enthusiastic audience assembled at Convention Hall last evening to hear the annual concert in Buffalo of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Max Fiedler as conductor.

Since the first engagement here of this celebrated organization the music-loving people of Buffalo consider the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra the grand event of the season. That the concert last night was up to the standard goes without saying. Never before have these splendid musicians played with more warmth and the beautiful effects produced on the several different groups of instruments were astonishing.

Max Fiedler is one of the giants in the musical world. He must be reckoned among the most important appearances in the orchestral field. In flight of fancy, in poetry of conception he is among the foremost of orchestral conductors. He possesses a strong personality and he has the power of making the musicians do things just as he wishes. Every phrase is given with clearness, and the fine blending of the instruments is immense. The tonal volume of the orchestra is splendid and for rhythmic freedom, great dynamic variety, and an intimacy of comprehension the work of these fine musicians is indeed notable. A subtle feeling for the refined, poetic sentiment that never sentimentalizes; clarity and beauty of tone, bewildering palette of tonal coloring, the rare lyric sense, the witchery of varying mood woven into a web of harmonies and melodic charm, this is the great power of this wonderful orchestra.

The program contained two compositions heard here for the first time. "Puck," a comedy overture, by Strube, and symphony in E minor, by Rachmaninoff.

The overture is a composition of intrinsic worth; it contains some beautiful melodies and it reveals decided creative talent, structural excellence and a high degree of skill in manipulating the orchestra. Fiedler gave an ideal performance of the novelty and helped it to a very fair success.

The Rachmaninoff symphony followed the overture and elicited storms of applause and approving calls. Amidst this enthusiastic demonstration Fiedler turned to the orchestra, signaled the men to arise and altogether they received the homage. This served to illustrate a phase of Fiedler's character which enables one to understand the secret of his remarkable power over the orchestra.

The symphony is decided in originality, and it possesses elements of real musical power. The composer had something to say and it takes hold of the listener at once. The melodies are irresistible in rhythm and the splendid instrumentation is worthy of notice. Rachmaninoff understands himself well and he knows how to express his feelings. In the first few measures of the "Adagio" he reveals a phase of beauty never expressed in tone before, and asserts an artistic character as convincing as it is intangible, and as original as it is authentic.

Anton Witek, the new concert master, was the soloist and he played the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor. He is an artist of the first rank and his success was immense. He is complete master of the violin and the expectations that his greeting implied were wholly realized by his playing. It was a superbly spirited performance of the Mendelssohn work, passionate, fiery, and eloquent, highly individual in eliciting the meaning and full value of every phrase, yet never losing sight of the larger proportions of the work. Witek rose to great heights in the "Andante" and "Allegro molto Vivance," giving a performance that made a profound impression. Every violinist knows how difficult the technical requirements, both for the left hand and the right arm, are in this, one of the most difficult of all violin concertos. Witek rose superior to all difficulties. He was technically so far above the work that one forgot all about the difficulties and listened with delight to his noble and impassioned delivery.

The program concluded with an inspired reading of the "Leonora" overture, No. 3, by Beethoven.

As the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last night, the immense audience heard with delight that another orchestra concert is to be included in the series arranged for this season by Mrs. Mai Davis Smith. Slips were inclosed in the programs announcing that, instead of the piano recital on Friday evening, March 3d, by Mme. Olga Samaroff, the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Leopold Stokovski conductor, with Mme. Samaroff as soloist, will give a concert in Convention Hall on Thursday evening, March 9th. The suggestion of the change originated with Mme. Samaroff, who has been playing with the Cincinnati Orchestra for a series of concerts. So the consent of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of Mme. Samaroff, was secured and the change of date arranged for. The Cincinnati Orchestra has never played in Buffalo and will come here with its full complement of men. The entire program will be Russian. Mme. Samaroff playing a Tschaikowsky concerto. There will be no advance in prices for this combined attraction, which will form the sixth and last in the concert series. Subscribers' tickets for the Samaroff recital on March 3d, will be honored for March 9th. Mail orders for seats may be sent now to Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, No. 26 Irving place, and will be filled in the sequence of receipt before the opening of the public sale.

BUFFALO EVENING NEWS — FEBRUARY 4, 1911.

TRIBUTE TO BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Audience Which Overflowed Convention Hall Heard a Splendid Concert.

The brilliant audience that overflowed Convention Hall last night on the occasion of the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the local management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith, was a tribute to the noble, gracious ministrations and lofty ideals associated to a pre-eminent degree with this organization, a national pride and glory. The program opened with the comedy overture, Puck, by Gustave Strube. This clever composition well deserves the exploiting given it so generously by Mr. Fiedler since its first performance in Boston last March. It is a work of delightful imagination, showing ingenuity of ideas, the hand of one who knows the orchestral idiom thoroughly, and, as touching its title, is truly eloquent in meaning. The composer acknowledged the enthusiastic applause bestowed on his composition from his place among the first violins.

The event of the evening came next in the first performance here of Rachmaninoff's E minor symphony. A work taking something more than an hour in performance, and confessedly in a form said by those incapable of its long, tireless strides, to be an anachronism in present day musical expression, must be voiced with compelling power to effect the impression this one does. Here music is winged on its most sustained flights, pursued with a high purpose that would exhaust any but the great ones of art. From the opening theme, the Russian composer comes before us with a language of such nobility, grave and glorious beauty that we are drawn and held to the unfolding of the musical drama, for so it is, with irresistable power. There is the rigid adherence to the exposition and development of thematic material we associate with sonata form, but withal the musical ideas vibrate with a character and quality that are essentially modern, not to say Russian.

The deep impression created by them, points to the first two movements as containing greatest elevation of idea and mastery of expression. Especially the first, so rich in thematic material, is developed with a profundity and expressiveness that remains unforgettable even in the variety and interest of succeeding movements. The close of the finale was signal for a warmth and continuance of applause in the acknowledgement of which Mr. Fiedler made the orchestra share, and was proof of the deep impression made by the work, thanks to the splendid band and its ardent leader, who brought an enthusiasm to the task that must be named as uplifting to a superb degree.

The third Leonore overture with its exalted and infinitely touching character, did not fail of its customary strong appeal, given as it was an exceptional nobility of reading.

Anton Witek, the concert master, was heard in the Mendelssohn E minor concerto. He came with the reputation of a great violinist and added to that one of a great interpreter. His masterly performance of the well worn work, the charm and delicate warmth he instilled in the different movements, bore tribute of the highest rank to his powers. He was greeted by the unusual sight of an audience remaining expectantly seated at the close of his performance, but according to the rules of the Boston orchestra there could be no encore.

HARMONY IN EVERY NOTE

Boston Symphony makes decided Hit with Buffalonians.

SPLENDID CONCERT

Express Feb 4/1911

Director Fiedler is accorded Welcome of unusual Heartiness.

One of the gala occasions in the musical season of Buffalo is the annual concert given here by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This event, which is rightly considered one of the greatest artistic delights offered to the local public, took place last evening in Convention Hall before an audience that taxed the capacity of the house, and listened with absorbed attention and keenest pleasure to the beautiful programme, of which the only possible criticism was its length.

When Mr. Fiedler appeared on the stage he was accorded a welcome of unusual heartiness, as a conductor who has proved his powers on a former occasion in this city. And whether it is due to his leadership, to finer orchestral material, to longer association of the men, or to all these combined, the results never seemed more marvelous, more satisfying, than at last night's concert. It would be difficult to surpass the tonal beauty, the range of color, the subtle sympathy shown in the work of this orchestra. Each section of the instrumental whole was ravishing in its tone quality, the brass and the woodwind especially seeming to have gained in sweetness and smoothness since the organization was last heard here.

The programme was one of wide contrast, ranging from the classic simplicity of Beethoven's Leonora overture, No. 3, to the modern Rachmaninoff symphony, No. 2, with its wealth of thematic material, and comprising also a composition by one of the first violins of the orchestra, Gustav Strube, whose dainty and charming Comedy Overture, Puck, was composed two years ago and dedicated to Mr. Fiedler. This work opened the programme. Its themes are original and spontaneous, and the treatment throughout is sane and free from either exaggeration or imitation. The overture received a delightful interpretation, and the composer was called on to bow in acknowledgment of the the very hearty reception of his work.

Special interest centered in the Rachmaninoff symphony, which was an absolute novelty here. Its four movements are rich in thematic beauty, and the scoring is of much brilliance. At times both melodies and harmonies, without being at all reiniscent, suggest that greatest Russian of them all, Tschaikowski. There is an underlying thought of sadness interwoven even with the maddest, merriest strains. Incisive and irrecistible rhythms, loveyl themes and richness of orchestral coloring, mark the work, and the interest is sustained without flagging, except, perhaps, in the adagio, of which the close is too long drawn out and somewhat monotonous. The symphony received a masterly performance and both Mr. Fiedler and his men were greeted with tremendous applause at its conclusion.

The soloist was Anton Witek, who is concertmaster of the orchestra. Although much has been written of Mr. Witek's remarkable gifts as a solo violinist, Buffalonians were scarcely prepared for so admirable a performance as this artist gave the Mendelssohn concerto. In the first place, he owns an instrument of noble tone, a Stradivarius, the song of which is truly liquid sweetness. He plays this beautiful violin with such unerring intonation, such absolute control of all technical virtues and such charm of artistic feeling, that his work compels unlimited admiration. He sang the lovely andante with almost human warmth and sweetness of tone, and took the final movement with such captivating brightness and such splendid steadiness of rhythm that the storm of enthusiasm which greeted him would not subside till he had returned again and again to the stage.

Slips were distributed in the hall announcing that the last concert of the series of six under the management of Mrs. Mai Davis Smith would offer not only Mme. Samaroff as pianist, but also the Cincinnati Orchestra under Leopold Stokovski, on the evening of March 9th.

M. M. H.

...Clipping Bureau in the World

om .....

dress .....

te .....

EVENING SUN BALTIMORE, MD. FEB 4 - 1911

Beethoven will reign supreme at the fourth Boston symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 22. The chief item of the evening will be the ninth symphony, in the last movement of which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore and a quartet consisting of such eminent singers as Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham.

The only other number on the program will be Beethoven's concerto for violin in D major. This will serve to introduce to Baltimore as soloist Anton Witek, the orchestra's new concert master.

[155]

WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Many Numbers Rendered For First Time Here.

Courier Feb 4

At the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo last evening, Convention Hall was crowded to the door with a fashionable audience to hear this matchless organization in a superb programme under the eminent direction of Max Fiedler, one of the most distinguished conductors in the musical world.

The programme was more than usually interesting inasmuch as the first half included works played for the first time in Buffalo. The opening number was the Comedy Overture, "Puck," composed by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, and dedicated to Max Fiedler. This composition received a reading by Mr. Fiedler that was full of freedom and brilliance and which brought out effectively the captivating and unique effects of a series of sylvan tone pictures. At its close the applause was continued until the composer was induced by Mr. Fiedler to rise and acknowledge the appreciation of the audience.

The great number of the evening was the Rachmaninoff Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27, which was one feast of musical delight. Beauty of tone, exquisite phrasing and impressive volume marked this rendition, and in his reading Mr. Fiedler maintained his strong individuality and breadth of culture, his attitude being one of such magnetic poise as to inspire his musicians to sublime effort. The four movements in this characteristic work by the great Russian composer afforded opportunity for striking contrasts and dramatic climaxes, and the lovely adagio carried a special appeal, followed as it was by the fascinating melody and lively action of the last movement.

Wave after wave swept through the hall at the finish of this masterly performance, and after bowing his acknowledgements several times, Mr. Fiedler insisted upon the members of his orchestra rising to share the honors. The remaining orchestral number was the beautiful overture Leonora No. 3, by Beethoven, which was another triumph.

The soloist of the evening was Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, who played the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor for violin in such a manner as to prove his ability as a great artist. He played with a lusciousness of tone, notably in the andante and a variety of dynamic gradations, while he invested the allegro molto vivace with a lightsome grace that captivated his hearers. He was recalled several times to accept the tributes of his enthusiastic auditors.

LARGE AUDIENCE DELIGHTED WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

Many Numbers Rendered For First Time Here.

At the annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Buffalo last evening, Convention Hall was crowded to the door with a fashionable audience to hear this matchless organization in a superb programme under the eminent direction of Max Fiedler, one of the most distinguished conductors in the musical world.

The programme was more than usually interesting inasmuch as the first half included works played for the first time in Buffalo. The opening number was the Comedy Overture, "Puck," composed by Gustav Strube, a member of the orchestra, and dedicated to Max Fiedler. This composition received a reading by Mr. Fiedler that was full of freedom and brilliance and which brought out effectively the captivating and unique effects of a series of sylvan tone pictures. At its close the applause was continued until the composer was induced by Mr. Fiedler to rise and acknowledge the appreciation of the audience.

The great number of the evening was the Rachmaninoff Symphony in E minor, No. 2, Op. 27, which was one feast of musical delight. Beauty of tone, exquisite phrasing and impressive volume marked this rendition, and in his reading Mr. Fiedler maintained his strong individuality and breadth of culture, his attitude being one of such magnetic poise as to inspire his musicians to sublime effort. The four movements in this characteristic work by the great Russian composer afforded opportunity for striking contrasts and dramatic climaxes, and the lovely adagio carried a special appeal, followed as it was by the fascinating melody and lively action of the last movement.

Wave after wave swept through the hall at the finish of this masterly performance, and after bowing his acknowledgements several times, Mr. Fiedler insisted upon the members of his orchestra rising to share the honors. The remaining orchestral number was the beautiful overture Leonora No. 3, by Beethoven, which was another triumph.

The soloist of the evening was Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, who played the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor for violin in such a manner as to prove his ability as a great artist. He played with a lusciousness of tone, notably in the andante and a variety of dynamic gradations, while he invested the allegro molto vivace with a lightsome grace that captivated his hearers. He was recalled several times to accept the tributes of his enthusiastic auditors.

BUFFALO EVENING TIMES,
FEBRUARY 4, 1911.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MADE A LASTING IMPRESSION

Wonderful Musical Organization Delighted Great Audience at Convention Hall—Witek, Unheralded, Proved Pleasant Surprise.

"Well, what do you think of it?" was the question put to a gentleman at the conclusion of the Boston Symphony Concert last night. He seemed to be the head center of the enthusiastic company about him, all eyes were fastened upon him and each seemed anxious to hear his reply. Noticing the position he was in, he straightened himself, as though to give force and emphasis to his words and said: "Taken all in all, it was the best orchestra concert I ever heard."

Many who gave opinions last night voiced the same sentiment, although not under the same interesting and somewhat dramatic circumstances.

Convention Hall was filled to hear Max Fiedler and his renowned aggregation of accomplished musicians in a program which while presenting only four numbers was a study in itself.

Strubes "Puck" overture was given for the first time in the city and will always be heard with interest and pleasure when the opportunity presents.

The great Rachmanioff symphony was given a reading that was masterly.

Anton Witek, the soloist, gave the Bartholdy concerto with a sweetness, fire, dash and finish, that was simply marvelous. It was a surprise in fact, for he had not been heralded as many less worthy than he have been on the concert stage and his execution will ever be a pleasant memory.

The Leonors overature by the orchestra proceeded the Witek solo because of the latter's late arrival. It, too, was given an interpretation that gave it added charm and beauty.

Is it any wonder the man said: "It was the best orchestra concert I ever heard?"

Boston Symphony Orchestra Score Artistic Triumph

Music like that the Boston Symphony orchestra played in the Light Guard armory last evening, is heard in Detroit only once a year, when the Boston musicians pay their annual visit. No other body of players that comes here has the ideal beauty of tone, the precision of attack, the fine spun pianissimos, the flawless crescendos, this band possesses. Last evening's concert was notable in many ways. It was probably the farewell of Conductor Max Fiedler to this city. The program was played before the largest audience that has attended a Detroit Orchestral association concert. Every chair was occupied and standing room was in demand, and finally, the orchestra introduced its new concert master, Anton Witek, as the solo violinist of the evening.

Mr. Witek played the very familiar Mendelssohn concerto in E minor, and perhaps he could not have chosen better, for the work made direct comparison with other artists easy. The concertmaster interpreted Mendelssohn after the manner of a true virtuoso, with fineness of tone, and superb technique. His conception of the andante was not as poetic as it might have been, but altogether it was eminently satisfactory. Mr. Witek must rank high among the violinists who have played before Detroit audiences.

The overture to Humperdinck's "Hansel and Gretel" opened the concert. The themes that make up this masterpiece are familiar to Detroiters though the overture itself may not be. In it one finds a gloried epitome of the "finest German opera since Wagner." Built as every one knows after the Wagnerian pattern, it is still so deliciously fresh and original, so spontaneous in its melodies, that only the close observer, or he who is forewarned, suspects that the score is a mighty web, so delicate that it might have been woven by a spider, so intricate that only a genius could have conceived it.

The symphony was Tschaikowsky's fifth, which one is tempted to characterize as an attenuated "Pathetique," or, better, a preparation for the "Pathetique." Though it has strange passages where inspiration is missing, other parts of the work are very powerful, and the finale is stupendous and worthy of Tschaikowsky at his best.

Sibelius, the greatest of Finland's composers, was presented by his symphonic poem, "Finlandia." "Finlandia" is modern in spirit and insensibly modern in structure, but it has so distinct a message to tell that it is never obscure. Indeed, it is so straightforward and eloquent in its pathos and majesty that one easily forgets its complexity.

Gustav Strube's comedy overture "Puck," completed the program. "Puck" is a clever composition of the lighter order, and interest in it was lightened because the composer sat in the ranks of the first violins and was forced to bow his acknowledgments.

Feb. 2, 1911 Times
TOLE

SPLENDID PROGRAM GREATLY ENJOYED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Given Great Ovation by Toledo Music Lovers.

The Valentine audience last evening quite belied Toledo's long reputation for a frigid temperament and a highly unmusical mind, and fairly went wild over the splendid program offered by the Boston Symphony orchestra. All of which may signify that Toledo music lovers are not lacking in enthusiasm, as often represented, but are simply fastidious in their tastes. No better arrangement of program could possibly have been placed before the public than that rendered by the Boston organization last evening. Everything that could appeal to the most exacting human mind was there—romance, exemplified in the opening number, the overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz" of Weber; the folk-lore and lyric beauty of the Dvorak Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World;" the irresistable, lilting, lively Tschaikowski suite from the score of the ballet, "The Nutcracker;" and the superb finale, full of all the grandeur and inspiration in music—the Tannhauser overture.

Anton Witek, the soloist of the evening, displayed admirable strength and delicacy of technique in the Paganini number, a concerto in D major for the violin, and was recalled again and again by the audience which seemed almost insatiable.

The Boston organization is perfect in its orchestration, reeds, wind and string instrument responding to the baton, in one big symphonic word-painting. Max Fiedler, the conductor, is a real artist, his readings, rich with dramatic bigness, the lyric sweep, or fantasy, of his selection. More of a proof of his real artistry lies in his grace and generosity in sharing the honors heaped upon him, with the individuals of the orchestra.

One of the most stupendous offerings of the evening was the selection "From the New World," four movements of which were rendered. This symphony of Dvorak is of particular appeal to the American audience as it was written by the composer as an exposition of his belief that a national music could be founded upon the folk-songs of the negroes of America. This idea predominates in the themes which are introduced and developed thru the four movements, and sings out in all of the romanticism, superstition, religion, and sweetness of these melodies, now in the blare of the horns, now in the soft lament or subtle witchery of the strings, now in the full orchestra, until the dominant idea and interlacing of themes is completed in the tumultuos coda.

Delightful Ballet Score.

The most delightful refreshing bit of harmony on the program last evening was the Tschaikowsky number, the ballet score based upon the charming fairy story of Hoffman, "The Nutcracker." It is light, fantastic, and entirely irresistable, and with its variations and dances, one in particular, the Dance de la Fee introducing the celesta, it fairly lilts and trips its way along until the audience becomes one with the composer and the interpreter and succumbs wholly to the enchanting atmosphere of the fairy tale.

As an excellent finale to the program came the over-powering Tannhauser number read with all of its dramatic force and intensity. From the very introduction of the Pilgrim motif, soft and plaintive, thru the alluring, bacchanalian venus music, now sweetly tempting and insistent, now rising to a mad frenzy, a passion crying out for dom'nance over the religious theme, and ending in the exultant triumph of the pilgrim's chorus, sung out by the trombones and trumpets, the audience sat tense, silence, overwhelmed completely by the immensity of the production and the power with which it was sent out to them. It was the biggest thing of the evening's big program, and held the audience until some seconds after the last chant of the pilgrims had died away in the distance.

The visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra was one of the rarest feasts Toledo music lovers have been awarded in some time, and one not soon to be forgotten by those fortunate enough to have been in the audience last evening.

Feb. 2, 1911 Times
TOLE

SPLENDID PROGRAM GREATLY ENJOYED

Boston Symphony Orchestra Given Great Ovation by Toledo Music Lovers.

The Valentine audience last evening quite belied Toledo's long reputation for a frigid temperament and a highly unmusical mind, and fairly went wild over the splendid program offered by the Boston Symphony orchestra. All of which may signify that Toledo music lovers are not lacking in enthusiasm, as often represented, but are simply fastidious in their tastes. No better arrangement of program could possibly have been placed before the public than that rendered by the Boston organization last evening. Everything that could appeal to the most exacting human mind was there—romance, exemplified in the opening number, the overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz" of Weber; the folk-lore and lyric beauty of the Dvorak Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World;" the irresistable, lilting, lively Tschaikowski suite from the score of the ballet, "The Nutcracker;" and the superb finale, full of all the grandeur and inspiration in music—the Tannhauser overture.

Anton Witek, the soloist of the evening, displayed admirable strength and delicacy of technique in the Paganini number, a concerto in D major for the violin, and was recalled again and again by the audience which seemed almost insatiable.

The Boston organization is perfect in its orchestration, reeds, wind and string instrument responding to the baton, in one big symphonic word-painting. Max Fiedler, the conductor, is a real artist, his readings, rich with dramatic bigness, the lyric sweep, or fantasy, of his selection. More of a proof of his real artistry lies in his grace and generosity in sharing the honors heaped upon him, with the individuals of the orchestra.

One of the most stupendous offerings of the evening was the selection "From the New World," four movements of which were rendered. This symphony of Dvorak is of particular appeal to the American audience as it was written by the composer as an exposition of his belief that a national music could be founded upon the folk-songs of the negroes of America. This idea predominates in the themes which are introduced and developed thru the four movements, and sings out in all of the romanticism, superstition, religion, and sweetness of these melodies, now in the blare of the horns, now in the soft lament or subtle witchery of the strings, now in the full orchestra, until the dominant idea and interlacing of themes is completed in the tumultuos coda.

Delightful Ballet Score.

The most delightful refreshing bit of harmony on the program last evening was the Tschaikowsky number, the ballet score based upon the charming fairy story of Hoffman, "The Nutcracker." It is light, fantastic, and entirely irresistable, and with its variations and dances, one in particular, the Dance de la Fee introducing the celesta, it fairly lilts and trips its way along until the audience becomes one with the composer and the interpreter and succumbs wholly to the enchanting atmosphere of the fairy tale.

As an excellent finale to the program came the over-powering Tannhauser number read with all of its dramatic force and intensity. From the very introduction of the Pilgrim motif, soft and plaintive, thru the alluring, bacchanalian venus music, now sweetly tempting and insistent, now rising to a mad frenzy, a passion crying out for dom'nance over the religious theme, and ending in the exultant triumph of the pilgrim's chorus, sung out by the trombones and trumpets, the audience sat tense, silence, overwhelmed completely by the immensity of the production and the power with which it was sent out to them. It was the biggest thing of the evening's big program, and held the audience until some seconds after the last chant of the pilgrims had died away in the distance.

The visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra was one of the rarest feasts Toledo music lovers have been awarded in some time, and one not soon to be forgotten by those fortunate enough to have been in the audience last evening.

TOLEDO DAILY BLADE
SDAY, FEBRUARY 2, 1911

At the Theatres

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

It was an event de luxe at the Valentine Wednesday evening when the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, presented a program which from an artistic viewpoint was an orchestral exposition difficult to surpass. Pity it was that there were empty seats, for the concert proved one of the most satisfactory and delightful ever heard in Toledo.

It is a difficult matter to write concerning the playing of the Boston musicians without lapsing into hyperbole and exaggerations. The ordinary critical adjectives do not apply. The orchestra is so unique in its artistic qualities that such terms as magnificent, unexcelled, splendid, et cetera, inadequately fit the situation. An analysis of its effort may disclose some reasons why the Boston Symphony excells many similar organizations.

No orchestral body in America today can boast of more natural endowed musicians. Years of association under the baton of a musical genius, always in perfect sympathy with him, and ever mindful of the fact that Fiedler is a dictator whose batonic behests must be explicitly obeyed, the orchestra has reached a degree of proficiency seldom attained.

Concretely considered, the orchestra has been resolved by its director—through an intelligent responsiveness on the part of the musicians—into a single composite instrument perfect in its artistic adjustment. They play artistically because they can't help it. All this has been the result of years of training on the part of Fiedler and the capable conductors who have preceded him. Rome was not built in a day, neither was the Boston Symphony orchestra. This is its 30th year.

As a conductor Fiedler ranks well toward the front. Possessing deep seated musical intelligence and a pleasing personality which enables him to get into close communion with his men he easily conveys to them his ideas of interpretation and instills in them the warmth and temperament without which he would be unable to secure the astounding results that were obtained.

The evening's program appealed strongly to all classes of music lovers for it consisted of representative works of different periods and different styles. Weber's overture to the opera Der Freischuz, gave the audience an immediate glimpse of the orchestra's virtuosity and ensemble. It was a glorious revelation of musical unity and precision of attack, the best any conductor could wish. With the Dvorak symphony from The New World which followed came further display of artistry. The delicate coloratura work, beautifully graduated tonal effects and melodic sweetness of the composition enthralled the audiences.

Tschaikowsky's Nutcracker suit was even more fascinating in its simple, melodic charm and the exquisite skill in which it was presented. Delightfully charming were the orchestral effects produced in the various dance movements of the ballet.

The familiar but favorite overture from Tannhauser was given a glorious performance as the closing number. The great Wagner composition was interpreted with splendid regard for its strength and symetry and gave the orchestra opportunity to rise to its topmost heights. As after all the other numbers a storm of applause evidenced the appreciation of the enthusiastic audiences.

Interpolated between the symphony and the Tschaikowsky number, Anton Witek, the orchestra's famed concert master, delighted with Paganini's concerto for violin in D minor. The number scintillated with brilliancy, warmth and beautiful singing quality of tone, and he swept his bow fearlessly and faultlessly through the amazing difficulties of this show piece. His interpretation was as agreeable as it was astonishing.

J. FRED GLEICK.

5 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. On Thursday evening he will play Beethoven's concerto in C minor, and on Saturday afternoon Liszt's "Dance of Death." On Thursday night the principal item on the programme will be Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote," and on Saturday afternoon the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROVES SELF PEER OF ANY

Everything in the musical life of Detroit leads up to and recedes from the annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which event, for the season of 1911 took place, Thursday evening, in the Light Guard armory.

The big bare hall was filled with an audience that numbered the music lovers in every walk of life, the smartest of smart society, white-haired men and women who rarely find their way to the ordinary musical attraction and a large body of eager young students. There were not more than a dozen vacant seats in the hall and the "standees" were packed in the rear and around the sides of the lower floor. For one rare occasion in the draughty, uncomfortable and inconvenient armory, the women took chances on catching cold and spoiling their best frocks by wearing their handsomest, decollete toilettes, and the result was a scene of real brilliancy of color and fashion.

Conductor Max Fiedler and his men were greeted with the utmost enthusiasm. Following the performance of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, the applause lasted several minutes, and Mr. Fiedler was recalled to the director's stand six or seven times. Mr. Fiedler is one of the great conductors of the world, and possesses a supremely interesting personality. His manner of conducting is incisive, almost military in its crispness, precision and authority. The results he attains are transcendent. With such a body of individual artists as are numbered in the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra anything is possible to a good conductor.

To anyone familiar with the great symphony orchestras of the country there can be no question in the mind and critical judgment that the Boston organization is the peer of any. Such beauty, purity and smoothness of tone, in the strings, are rarely heard in any concert hall. The playing is that of one man, one instrument. The tone produced is so exquisitely limpid that it is a constant source of marvel as well as of enjoyment to the musical ear. It is a matter of justifiable pride with this orchestra that the instruments used are the very finest the world can produce, from the violins and cellos to the perfectly tuned triangle.

The real musicianship of the players, the majority of whom have belonged to the organization for many years, is quite apparent, and it is easy to believe that the reputed high test of ability required of a man before he can take his place at any desk in the orchestra has not been over-accentuated. There were 81 players on the platform, Thursday evening, the largest body of musicians ever heard on the local concert stage.

The program was remarkable for several things. For one, every number was played, in this city, for the first time by a great orchestra. There were many old musicians in the audience who declared that to the best of their belief Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony had not been played here before. The Humperdinck overture to "Haensel und Grotel" has been given only once and that when the Metropolitan grand opera company presented the fairy operetta in the Detroit Opera house last spring; Siberlius' symphonic poem "Finlandia" was heard for the first time, and the comedy overture "Puck" by Gustav Strube, likewise had its first hearing. Mr. Strube is a member of the orchestra—one of the first violin players—and Mr. Fiedler gracefully pointed him out and made him rise to acknowledge the applause that greeted this charming composition. The fact that a man who can compose an overture good enough for the greatest orchestra in the world to play is a member of that self-same orchestra is sufficient substantiation of all claims to artistic perfection, in its ranks, made for the Boston organization.

Anton Witek, the concertmeister, was the soloist of the evening; and he played the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor in a manner seldom heard in this city. Mr. Witek is a violinist who shows that he is first, last and always the musician. His tone is beautifully clear and broad and he plays with a technical perfection and purity of intonation that should have been an invaluable lesson to every violin student in the audience. He was most cordially received and was recalled repeatedly.

Such a splendid program so wonderfully and satisfyingly played needs no critical commendation. Suffice it to say that the evening was one of ideal communion with the Muse of Music.

For the third time within a month, the always delighted and loyal supporters of the Detroit Orchestral association will have the pleasure of listening to a great orchestra, in the second visit this winter, of the Theodore Thomas Symphony orchestra, which will play in the armory, Monday evening, Feb. 20, giving an all-Wagner program.

ELLA MAE HAWTHORNE.

DETROIT SATURDAY NIGHT

February 4, 1911

Another Great Program.

The Detroit Orchestral Association has been working very hard this season for the pleasure and profit of its subscribers, and in consequence its guarantor list, its subscription list, and the quality of its concerts, as well as its single ticket audiences, have grown appreciably. The history of the art education of a general public, which in Europe is a matter of governmental or municipal expense, but depends in this country upon individual generosity and public spirit, has been, as a rule, one of constantly increasing demand through at least a decade upon its supporters. It is the ambitious endeavor of the Detroit Association to improve upon this record and see if it cannot secure a constantly lighter burden while offering better and better things. This means hard thinking and a goodly exhaust of nervous energy upon the part of those in charge. The concerts this year have had two distinctive features, both of which were absolutely in line with its original policy and ideals. In the first place, every concert program, except one, includes a soloist of distinction that cannot be questioned, with orchestral accompaniment, thereby emphasizing all the functions of the orchestra, as well as directing attention to its individual instruments and to the sympathetic qualities of the conductor and the absolute unity of his ensemble. In the second place, we have been honored with what in great music circles is considered an event, orchestrally, of the most thrilling interest. This is the presentation of a new work, or of a new composer. The writing of symphonic or orchestral music is the crowning capacity of great genius. It establishes the musical standing of a nation. The repertoire is comparatively limited; the claim of a new writer means the discovery, possibly, of a new planet. The Damrosch and Boston Orchestras, two great authorities in this country, have each presented us with a metropolitan opportunity, for which we cannot be too grateful. It should be born in mind that our audiences are made up of those who know little of any orchestral music; of those who are familiar with many well-known compositions, and of those who know that they can only grow to the point of the musical development of today by listening to the music of today. All are entitled to consideration. We must have numbers that win the attention of the undeveloped; numbers that satisfy those who long for compositions they know and love; and numbers that educate the most scholarly among us, who realize that a musician only grows and keeps pace with his time by a knowledge of new repertoire. A magazine ministers to many classes of readers, an orchestral program to many sorts of hearers, and all are worthy of equal consideration, since all unite in defraying the expenses of the concerts. With a total of only thirty numbers or so possible, and with the conductors only presenting the numbers they have in rehearsal for this season, and desiring to limit the library they transport as much as possible, the making of these programs, grouping them with due consideration for light and shade, timing them to the proper length, and emphasizing in turn all the orchestral parts, is no child's play. A serious well wisher of this educational musical movement, which has raised the general opinion of the country at large of Detroit as a musical center, will consider all these things and strengthen the hands of the association, which is strenuously trying to accomplish all it can for everyone, and to consider all needs, thereby giving it courage. Criticism is so easy, and endeavor is so difficult. Even in listening to a concert program altruism is necessary—and no number upon any orchestral program is less than beautiful or well worth while. No conductor has been more fortunate in the matter of program arrangement than Frederick Stock, and his grouping of the numbers which constitute his Wagner program is wonderfully fine. The concert will be one of the best Detroit has ever heard. We have gradually begun to realize that the Boston, Chicago and New York Symphony orchestras stand shoulder to shoulder. Cincinnati promises to grow to an equal stature; must, if it is to be worth while; for having had the best, nothing else satisfies. On the anniversary of the birthday of America's greatest man, we shall have an opportunity to listen to Germany's epoch-making musical genius. This is the program that will be presented: Overture to the Flying Dutchman; Prelude to Lohengrin; Magic Fire Scene, and Ride of the Valkyries, from the Walkune; Waldweben and Forge Song from Siegfried; Traume, Vorspiel to Act III, and Finale from Tristan; Procession of the Knights of the Grail, and Good Friday Spell from Parsifal, and Overture to the Mastersinger.

DETROIT JOURNAL

FEBRUARY 3, 1911

Boston Orchestra Gives Musical Treat of the Season; Armory Packed

It was not a mere orchestra which gave delight to the overflowing audience in the Light Guard armory last night on the occasion of the third orchestral concert of the season, but a band of music professors from Boston. Three-fold was the treat enjoyed. Not only did the orchestra by its remarkably finished playing confirm the impression previously formed that it represents the high water mark of musical progress on this side of the Atlantic, but Anton Witek, the concert meister, rendered the violin part of the Mendelssohn concerto, and Gustav Strube's comedy overture, "Puck," was given its first production here under the eye of the composer.

Max Fiedler is one of the really authoritative conductors of the present day. His readings are marked by rare insight and appreciation of emotional and poetic values. His men respond to his baton with such ready intelligence as to make a perfect balance of ensemble. Strings bewitchingly silvery in tone, brass mellow and unobtrusive, wood wind soft as the thrush's song—these are some of the qualities which mark the orchestra's work. Its excellence is so pronounced as to make it tower above all other American organizations.

Humperdinck's prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," the fairy opera, based on Grimm's tale of the broommaker's children lost in the forest, opened the program. The fantasy of the piece was beautifully expressed. One could see the fourteen angels hovering over the sleeping youngsters and hear the weird sounds at the orgy of the witches. The number was a thing of joy and beauty.

A finished interpretation was given to Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, the most important work of the evening. Like "Pathetique," this composition reflects one of the gloomy moods of the composer. Its effect on the mind is that of a titanic soul struggle with the drums of destiny resounding sternly as an accompaniment. The second movement contains a truly inspired melody for the horns. A gracefully poetic waltz takes the place of the usual third part. The sombreness of the work becomes accentuated in the finale where storm, stress and strife are heaped up and the ominous roll of drums is prominent. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra received an ovation at the close.

The Mendelssohn concerto is attempted by every violinist with pretensions. It is perhaps the most popular of all violin concertos being marked not only by melodious and difficult passages for the soloist, but by exquisite orchestration. Anton Witek's performance was superb from the viewpoint of technique. He obtains an entrancing tone from his Stradivarius and goes through intricate passages, designed as a test of virtuosity, with perfect ease. He is not, however, an emotional player and one could not but contrast his severely beautiful rendition with the warm and colorful bowing of Ysaye. Mr. Witek's attitude toward the violin is like that of D'Albert toward the piano. Both favor Greek simplicity and look askance at what is called soulful interpretation. Mr. Witek was recalled time after time, the audience being worked up to an intense pitch of enthusiasm. It was noted with pleasure that Mr. Fiedler did not, as some conductors do, drown the soloist, but kept the orchestra in its proper place as a background and accompaniment.

When the elfinlike comedy overture, "Puck," with its suggestion of "Midsummer Night's Dream" and brownie gambols in moonlit woods had been given the audience was surprised to see a modest little man among the violins stand up in response to their applause. It was Gustav Strube, the author, formerly professor of the violin in Mannheim conservatory, and member of the Gewendhaus orchestra, but who has been a resident of Boston for some years and has added many works to the musical catalogues.

Closing an eventful evening came the significant symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius. In one respect the composer is the Wagner of Finland. He has taken the Kalevala, a poem embodying the magic and mystery of Finnish mythology, and has expressed it in music just as the niebelungenlied sets forth the weird and ancient Teutonic spirit. Sibelius is a genius who stands alone on a pinnacle, so different is he from all other modern writers. He expresses the life and death struggle of the Finnish nation, the conflict of titanic forces in waste and melancholy places. His "Finlandia" so vividly expresses the national yearning of the Finns that the czar suppressed it as an incitement to revolution. As given by the Boston orchestra this work will linger long in the memory. It is marked by surpassingly beautiful melody, haunting sadness, strength and hopefulness. Had it been given earlier in the evening to untaxed brains it probably would have made a deeper impression.

T. C. GREENWOOD.

DAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1911.

Boston Orchestra and Anton Witek Astonish Best Audience of Year

The hold which symphonic music is acquiring on Detroit was demonstrated last night when a packed house greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Light Guard armory. It was rewarded by a remarkable program presented in a remarkable manner.

In the first place, all the music played by the full orchestra was composed within the past 22 years. The earliest number in composition was the Tschaikowsky symphony, the fifth, of the date of 1888. The most recent bore a date 20 years later. It would have been well if those who find it fashionable to decry modern music could all have heard the Boston organization. They would have found small foundation for their prejudice.

And secondly, that amazing Boston orchestra seemed even better than before. Under the commanding baton of Fiedler it developed a tone quality that was marvelous, and the noise which many complain about in the full orchestration of Tschaikowsky and other modern composers was notable in its absence. There was never a harsh note, though at times the tone swelled to an extraordinary volume of sound.

Thirdly, there was Anton Witek, who introduced the only classic in the program by playing the familiar Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. Under his bow the music acquired new beauties which made it seem almost strange. Herr Witek compels admiration. He has discarded all the tricks and flourishes of the violin virtuoso; he "plays it straight," in the cant expression of the day, but how he does play! Maintaining at all times a magnificent tone, he twinkled the fingers of his left hand over the strings of his wonderful Stradivarius until his hearers gasped, and capped the climax of marvelous playing by such an exhibition of double-stopping and broken chords as has never been heard in Detroit. Without the poetry of Elman, he nevertheless showed a power of interpretation and a beauty of technique that brought round after round of applause. It seemed as if the concert would not be permitted to proceed until Herr Witek had given more, but Mr. Fiedler was firm in his refusal to permit an encore. Rightly, too, for a repetition or an addition would have been an anti-climax.

There was little demonstration until the close of the symphony. The Haensel and Gretel prelude, while pleasing, was not big enough to create enthusiasm. The first movement of the Tschaikowsky number, calling the full orchestra into play, beginning with a most depressing passage, working through pessimistic but remarkable well orchestrated themes and developments, and closing with a gradual deepening of tone until it ceases in an ominous rumbling of the kettledrum, astonished the audience into silence. The andante was better liked; the waltz deepened the interest; and when, in the finale the orchestra broke into the triumphant hymn, reminiscent of the close of the Tannhauser overture, in a great burst of sound, the emotions of the hearers could scarcely be restrained.

A comedy overture called "Puck," by Gustav Strube, was played. It proved ultra-modern in tone, and was very well liked. At its close a little man in the third row of violins, at a sign from Mr. Fiedler, rose and bowed. It was Mr. Strube himself. More power to him.

The final number was a tone poem, "Finlandia," by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. It is extremely patriotic, showing the writer's faith in his people, who have conquered the wastes of northern Russia and who, though they have lost their independence, are still lovers of liberty and restless under domination. Sibelius has employed a deal of orchestral color in this composition. There is a passage that sounds like a prayer that is surpassingly beautiful.

Next in the Orchestral association's series comes the Theodore Thomas orchestra for its second concert of the season, Feb. 20, in an all-Wagner program.

m NEWS

ress Baltimore, Md.

FEB 4 - 1911

Beethoven Will Reign At Boston Symphony

Beethoven will reign supreme at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 22. The chief item of the evening will be the immortal Ninth Symphony. In the last movement of which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore and such eminent singers as Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham. The performance of this symphony a year ago was such a great success that it is repeated this year in response to numerous requests.

The only other number on the program will be Beethoven's immortal concerto for violin in D major. This will serve to introduce to Baltimore as soloist Anton Witek, the Orchestra's new concert master, whose appearances so far have been among the sensations of the season.

rom

ddress

ate FEB 5 - 1911 BALTIMORE, MD.

LYRIC.—Beethoven will reign supreme at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 22. The chief item of the evening will be the immortal Ninth Sympony, in the last movement of which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore and a quartet consisting of Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham.

The only other number on the program will be Beethoven's Concerto for violin in D major. This will serve to introduce to Baltimore as soloist Anton Witek

m STAR

ress BALTIMORE, MD. FEB 4 - 1911

Fourth Boston Symphony.

Beethoven will reign supreme at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 22. The chief item of the evening will be the immortal Ninth Symphony in the last movement of which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore and a quartet consisting of such eminent singers as Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham. The performance of this symphony a year ago was such a great success that it is repeated this year in response to numerous requests.

The only other number on the program will be Beethoven's equally immortal concerto for violin in D major. This will serve to introduce to Baltimore as soloist Anton Witek, the orchestra's new concert master, whose appearances so far have been among the sensations of the season.

[157]

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROVES SELF PEER OF ANY

Everything in the musical life of Detroit leads up to and recedes from the annual visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which event, for the season of 1911 took place, Thursday evening, in the Light Guard armory.

The big bare hall was filled with an audience that numbered the music lovers in every walk of life, the smartest of smart society, white-haired men and women who rarely find their way to the ordinary musical attraction and a large body of eager young students. There were not more than a dozen vacant seats in the hall and the "standees" were packed in the rear and around the sides of the lower floor. For one rare occasion in the draughty, uncomfortable and inconvenient armory, the women took chances on catching cold and spoiling their best frocks by wearing their handsomest, decollete toilettes, and the result was a scene of real brilliancy of color and fashion.

Conductor Max Fiedler and his men were greeted with the utmost enthusiasm. Following the performance of Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony, the applause lasted several minutes, and Mr. Fiedler was recalled to the director's stand six or seven times. Mr. Fiedler is one of the great conductors of the world, and possesses an extremely interesting personality. His manner of conducting is incisive, almost military in its crispness, precision and authority. The results he attains are magnificent. With such a body of individual artists as are numbered in the ranks of the Boston Symphony orchestra anything is possible to a good conductor.

To anyone familiar with the great symphony orchestras of the country there can be no question in the mind and critical judgment that the Boston organization is the peer of any. Such beauty, purity and smoothness of tone, in the strings, are rarely heard in any concert hall. The playing is that of one man, one instrument. The tone produced is so exquisitely limpid that it is a constant source of marvel as well as of enjoyment to the musical ear. It is a matter of justifiable pride with this orchestra that the instruments used are the very finest the world can produce, from the violins and cellos to the perfectly tuned triangle.

The real musicianship of the players, the majority of whom have belonged to the organization for many years, is quite apparent, and it is easy to believe that the reputed high test of ability required of a man before he can take his place at any desk in the orchestra has not been over-accentuated. There were 81 players on the platform, Thursday evening, the largest body of musicians ever heard on the local concert stage.

The program was remarkable for several things. For one, every number was played, [illegible]ity, for the first time by a great orchestra. There were many old musicians in the audience who declared that to the best of their belief Tschaikowsky's Fifth Symphony had not been played here before. The Humperdinck overture to "Haensel und Gretel" has been given only once and that when the Metropolitan grand opera company presented the fairy operetta in the Detroit Opera house last spring; Siberlius' symphonic poem "Finlandia" was heard for the first time, and the comedy overture "Puck" by Gustav Strube, likewise had its first hearing. Mr. Strube is a member of the orchestra—one of the first violin players—and Mr. Fiedler gracefully pointed him out and made him rise to acknowledge the applause that greeted this charming composition. The fact that a man who can compose an overture good enough for the greatest orchestra in the world to play is a member of that self-same orchestra is sufficient substantiation of all claims to artistic perfection, in its ranks, made for the Boston organization.

Anton Witek, the concertmeister, was the soloist of the evening; and he played the Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor in a manner seldom heard in this city. Mr. Witek is a violinist who shows that he is first, last and always the musician. His tone is beautifully clear and broad and he plays with a technical perfection and purity of intonation that should have been an invaluable lesson to every violin student in the audience. He was most cordially received and was recalled repeatedly.

Such a splendid program so wonderfully and satisfyingly played needs no critical commendation. Suffice it to say that the evening was one of ideal communion with the Muse of Music.

For the third time within a month, the always delighted and loyal supporters of the Detroit Orchestral association will have the pleasure of listening to a great orchestra, in the second visit this winter, of the Theodore Thomas Symphony orchestra, which will play in the armory, Monday evening, Feb. 20, giving an all-Wagner program.

ELLA MAE HAWTHORNE.

DETROIT SATURDAY NIGHT

February 4, 1911

Another Great Program.

The Detroit Orchestral Association has been working very hard this season for the pleasure and profit of its subscribers, and in consequence its guarantor list, its subscription list, and the quality of its concerts, as well as its single ticket audiences, have grown appreciably. The history of the art education of a general public, which in Europe is a matter of governmental or municipal expense, but depends in this country upon individual generosity and public spirit, has been, as a rule, one of constantly increasing demand through at least a decade upon its supporters. It is the ambitious endeavor of the Detroit Association to improve upon this record and see if it cannot secure a constantly lighter burden while offering better and better things. This means hard thinking and a goodly exhaust of nervous energy upon the part of those in charge. The concerts this year have had two distinctive features, both of which were absolutely in line with its original policy and ideals. In the first place, every concert program, except one, includes a soloist of distinction that cannot be questioned, with orchestral accompaniment, thereby emphasizing all the functions of the orchestra, as well as directing attention to its individual instruments and to the sympathetic qualities of the conductor and the absolute unity of his ensemble. In the second place, we have been honored with what in great music circles is considered an event, orchestrally, of the most thrilling interest. This is the presentation of a new work, or of a new composer. The writing of symphonic or orchestral music is the crowning capacity of great genius. It establishes the musical standing of a nation. The repertoire is comparatively limited; the claim of a new writer means the discovery, possibly, of a new planet. The Damrosch and Boston Orchestras, two great authorities in this country, have each presented us with a metropolitan opportunity, for which we cannot be too grateful. It should be born in mind that our audiences are made up of those who know little of any orchestral music; of those who are familiar with many well-known compositions, and of those who know that they can only grow to the point of the musical development of today by listening to the music of today. All are entitled to consideration. We must have numbers that win the attention of the undeveloped; numbers that satisfy those who long for compositions they know and love; and numbers that educate the most scholarly among us, who realize that a musician only grows and keeps pace with his time by a knowledge of new repertoire. A magazine ministers to many classes of readers, an orchestral program to many sorts of hearers, and all are worthy of equal consideration, since all unite in defraying the expenses of the concerts. With a total of only thirty numbers or so possible, and with the conductors only presenting the numbers they have in rehearsal for this season, and desiring to limit the library they transport as much as possible, the making of these programs, grouping them with due consideration for light and shade, timing them to the proper length, and emphasizing in turn all the orchestral parts, is no child's play. A serious well wisher of this educational musical movement, which has raised the general opinion of the country at large of Detroit as a musical center, will consider all these things and strengthen the hands of the association, which is strenuously trying to accomplish all it can for everyone, and to consider all needs, thereby giving it courage. Criticism is so easy, and endeavor is so difficult. Even in listening to a concert program altruism is necessary—and no number upon any orchestral program is less than beautiful or well worth while. No conductor has been more fortunate in the matter of program arrangement than Frederick Stock, and his grouping of the numbers which constitute his Wagner program is wonderfully fine. The concert will be one of the best Detroit has ever heard. We have gradually begun to realize that the Boston, Chicago and New York Symphony orchestras stand shoulder to shoulder. Cincinnati promises to grow to an equal stature; must, if it is to be worth while; for having had the best, nothing else satisfies. On the anniversary of the birthday of America's greatest man, we shall have an opportunity to listen to Germany's epoch-making musical genius. This is the program that will be presented: Overture to the Flying Dutchman; Prelude to Lohengrin; Magic Fire Scene, and Ride of the Valkyries, from the Walkure; Waldweben and Forge Song from Siegfried; Traume, Vorspiel to Act III, and Finale from Tristan; Procession of the Knights of the Grail, and Good Friday Spell from Parsifal, and Overture to the Mastersinger.

n ..... NEWS .....

ress ..... Baltimore, Md. .....

Beethoven Will Reign At Boston Symphony

Beethoven will reign supreme at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 22. The chief item of the evening will be the immortal Ninth Symphony. In the last movement of which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore and such eminent singers as Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham. The performance of this symphony a year ago was such a great success that it is repeated this year in response to numerous requests.

The only other number on the program will be Beethoven's immortal concerto for violin in D major. This will serve to introduce to Baltimore as soloist Anton Witek, the Orchestra's new concert master, whose appearances so far have been among the sensations of the season.

[157]

THE DETROIT JOURNAL

FEBRUARY 3, 1911

Boston Orchestra Gives Musical Treat of the Season; Armory Packed

It was not a mere orchestra which gave delight to the overflowing audience in the Light Guard armory last night on the occasion of the third orchestral concert of the season, but a band of music professors from Boston. Three-fold was the treat enjoyed. Not only did the orchestra by its remarkably finished playing confirm the impression previously formed that it represents the high water mark of musical progress on this side of the Atlantic, but Anton Witek, the concert meister, rendered the violin part of the Mendelssohn concerto, and Gustav Strube's comedy overture, "Puck," was given its first production here under the eye of the composer.

Max Fiedler is one of the really authoritative conductors of the present day. His readings are marked by rare insight and appreciation of emotional and poetic values. His men respond to his baton with such ready intelligence as to make a perfect balance of ensemble. Strings bewitchingly silvery in tone, brass mellow and unobtrusive, wood wind soft as the thrush's song—these are some of the qualities which mark the orchestra's work. Its excellence is so pronounced as to make it tower above all other American organizations.

Humperdinck's prelude to "Hansel and Gretel," the fairy opera, based on Grimm's tale of the broommaker's children lost in the forest, opened the program. The fantasy of the piece was beautifully expressed. One could see the fourteen angels hovering over the sleeping youngsters and hear the weird sounds at the orgy of the witches. The number was a thing of joy and beauty.

A finished interpretation was given to Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 5, the most important work of the evening. Like "Pathetique," this composition reflects one of the gloomy moods of the composer. Its effect on the mind is that of a titanic soul struggle with the drums of destiny resounding sternly as an accompaniment. The second movement contains a truly inspired melody for the horns. A gracefully poetic waltz takes the place of the usual third part. The sombreness of the work becomes accentuated in the finale where storm, stress and strife are heaped up and the ominous roll of drums is prominent. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra received an ovation at the close.

The Mendelssohn concerto is attempted by every violinist with pretensions. It is perhaps the most popular of all violin concertos being marked not only by melodious and difficult passages for the soloist, but by exquisite orchestration. Anton Witek's performance was superb from the viewpoint of technique. He obtains an entrancing tone from his Stradivarius and goes through intricate passages, designed as a test of virtuosity, with perfect ease. He is not, however, an emotional player and one could not but contrast his severely beautiful rendition with the warm and colorful bowing of Ysaye. Mr. Witek's attitude toward the violin is like that of D'Albert toward the piano. Both favor Greek simplicity and look askance at what is called soulful interpretation. Mr. Witek was recalled time after time, the audience being worked up to an intense pitch of enthusiasm. It was noted with pleasure that Mr. Fiedler did not, as some conductors do, drown the soloist, but kept the orchestra in its proper place as a background and accompaniment.

When the elfinlike comedy overture, "Puck," with its suggestion of "Midsummer Night's Dream" and brownie gambols in moonlit woods had been given the audience was surprised to see a modest little man among the violins stand up in response to their applause. It was Gustav Strube, the author, formerly professor of the violin in Mannheim conservatory, and member of the Gewendhaus orchestra, but who has been a resident of Boston for some years and has added many works to the musical catalogues.

Closing an eventful evening came the significant symphonic poem, "Finlandia," by Jean Sibelius. In one respect the composer is the Wagner of Finland. He has taken the Kalevala, a poem embodying the magic and mystery of Finnish mythology, and has expressed it in music just as the niebelungenlied sets forth the weird and ancient Teutonic spirit. Sibelius is a genius who stands alone on a pinnacle, so different is he from all other modern writers. He expresses the life and death struggle of the Finnish nation, the conflict of titanic forces in waste and melancholy places. His "Finlandia" so vividly expresses the national yearning of the Finns that the czar suppressed it as an incitement to revolution. As given by the Boston orchestra this work will linger long in the memory. It is marked by surpassingly beautiful melody, haunting sadness, strength and hopefulness. Had it been given earlier in the evening to untaxed brains it probably would have made a deeper impression.

T. C. GREENWOOD.

rom .....

ddress .....

ate .....

FEB 5 - 1911

BALTIMORE, MD.

LYRIC.—Beethoven will reign supreme at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 22. The chief item of the evening will be the immortal Ninth Sympony, in the last movement of which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore and a quartet consisting of Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham.

The only other number on the program will be Beethoven's Concerto for violin in D-major. This will serve to introduce to Baltimore as soloist Anton Witek, the or-

Detroit News

DAY, FEBRUARY 3, 1911.

Boston Orchestra and Anton Witek Astonish Best Audience of Year

The hold which symphonic music is acquiring on Detroit was demonstrated last night when a packed house greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Light Guard armory. It was rewarded by a remarkable program presented in a remarkable manner.

In the first place, all the music played by the full orchestra was composed within the past 22 years. The earliest number in composition was the Tschaikowsky symphony, the fifth, of the date of 1888. The most recent bore a date 20 years later. It would have been well if those who find it fashionable to decry modern music could all have heard the Boston organization. They would have found small foundation for their prejudice.

And secondly, that amazing Boston orchestra seemed even better than before. Under the commanding baton of Fiedler it developed a tone quality that was marvelous, and the noise which many complain about in the full orchestration of Tschaikowsky and other modern composers was notable in its absence. There was never a harsh note, though at times the tone swelled to an extraordinary volume of sound.

Thirdly, there was Anton Witek, who introduced the only classic in the program by playing the familiar Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. Under his bow the music acquired new beauties which made it seem almost strange. Herr Witek compels admiration. He has discarded all the tricks and flourishes of the violin virtuoso; he "plays it straight," in the cant expression of the day, but how he does play! Maintaining at all times a magnificent tone, he twinkled the fingers of his left hand over the strings of his wonderful Stradivarius until his hearers gasped, and capped the climax of marvelous playing by such an exhibition of double-stopping and broken chords as has never been heard in Detroit. Without the poetry of Elman, he nevertheless showed a power of interpretation and a beauty of technique that brought round after round of applause. It seemed as if the concert would not be permitted to proceed until Herr Witek had given more, but Mr. Fiedler was firm in his refusal to permit an encore. Rightly, too, for a repetition or an addition would have been an anti-climax.

There was little demonstration until the close of the symphony. The Haensel and Gretel prelude, while pleasing, was not big enough to create enthusiasm. The first movement of the Tschaikowsky number, calling the full orchestra into play, beginning with a most depressing passage, working through pessimistic but remarkable well orchestrated themes and developments, and closing with a gradual deepening of tone until it ceases in an ominous rumbling of the kettledrum, astonished the audience into silence. The andante was better liked; the waltz deepened the interest; and when, in the finale the orchestra broke into the triumphant hymn, reminiscent of the close of the Tannhauser overture, in a great burst of sound, the emotions of the hearers could scarcely be restrained.

A comedy overture called "Puck," by Gustav Strube, was played. It proved ultra-modern in tone, and was very well liked. At its close a little man in the third row of violins, at a sign from Mr. Fiedler, rose and bowed. It was Mr. Strube himself. More power to him.

The final number was a tone poem, "Finlandia," by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. It is extremely patriotic, showing the writer's faith in his people, who have conquered the wastes of northern Russia and who, though they have lost their independence, are still lovers of liberty and restless under domination. Sibelius has employed a deal of orchestral color in this composition. There is a passage that sounds like a prayer that is surpassingly beautiful.

Next in the Orchestral association's series comes the Theodore Thomas orchestra for its second concert of the season, Feb. 20, in an all-Wagner program.

m .....

ress ..... BALTI ...

Fourth Boston Symphony.

Beethoven will reign supreme at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 22. The chief item of the evening will be the immortal Ninth Symphony in the last movement of which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore and a quartet consisting of such eminent singers as Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham. The performance of this symphony a year ago was such a great success that it is repeated this year in response to numerous requests.

The only other number on the program will be Beethoven's equally immortal concerto for violin in D major. This will serve to introduce to Baltimore as soloist Anton Witek, the orchestra's new concert master, whose appearances so far have been among the sensations of the season.

THE DETROIT NEWS.
FEBRUARY 3, 1911.

A Capacity Audience Greets Boston Orchestra at Splendid Concert

The hold which symphonic music is acquiring on Detroit was demonstrated last night when a packed house greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Light Guard armory. It was rewarded by a remarkable program presented in a remarkable manner.

In the first place, all the music played by the full orchestra was composed within the past 22 years. The earliest number in composition was the Tschaikowsky symphony, the fifth, of the date of 1888. The most recent bore a date 30 years later. It would have been well if those who find it fashionable to decry modern music could all have heard the Boston organization. They would have found small foundation for their prejudice.

And secondly, that amazing Boston orchestra seemed even better than before. Under the commanding baton of Fiedler it developed a tone quality that was marvelous, and the noise which many complain about in the full orchestration of Tschaikowsky and other modern composers was notable in its absence. There was never a harsh note, though at times the tone swelled to an extraordinary volume of sound.

Thirdly, there was Anton Witek, who introduced the only classic in the program by playing the familiar Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. Under his bow the music acquired new beauties. Maintaining at all times a magnificent tone, he twinkled the fingers of his left hand over the strings of his wonderful Stradivarius until his hearers gasped, and capped the climax of marvelous playing by such an exhibition of double-stopping and broken chords as has never been heard in Detroit.

The first movement of the Tschaikowsky number, calling the full orchestra into play, beginning with a most depressing passage, working through pessimistic but remarkably well orchestrated themes and developments, and closing with a gradual deepening of tone until it ceased in an ominous rumbling of the kettle-drum, astonished the audience into silence. The andante was better liked; the waltz deepened the interest; and when, in the finale the orchestra broke into the triumphant hymn, reminiscent of the close of the Tannhauser overture, in a great burst of sound, the emotions of the hearers could scarcely be restrained.

A comedy overture called "Puck," by Gustav Strube, was played. It proved ultra-modern in tone, and was very well liked. At its close a little man in the third row of violins, at a sign from Mr. Fiedler, rose and bowed. It was Mr. Strube himself.

The final number was a tone poem, "Finlandia," by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

Next in the Orchestral association's series comes the Theodore Thomas orchestra for its second concert of the season, Feb. 20, in an all-Wagner program.

THE PILOT
FEBRUARY 11, 1911.

THE CHILDREN'S CRUSADE.

Cecilia Society and Boston Symphony Orchestra to be Heard in Symphony Hall, Feb. 16.

The principal musical event of the coming week will be the performance of Gabriel Pierne's musical legend, "The Childrens Crusade," for which distinguished soloists have been engaged. The most important part, the Narrator, will be taken by Edmond Clement, French lyric tenor, who was soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last Thursday.

Clement is the leading French lyric tenor. He first came to America a year ago as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company and next year in special performances of French opera in the New Theatre, he will head the company. He has been compared to Jean de Reske, though his voice is not of heroic quality, but his art is of extraordinary perfection.

The principal soprano will be Madame Corinne Kider-Kelsey, who is the leading concert singer today of American training. The other principal woman's character, that of Allys, will be taken by Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, who has already sung with the Cecilia in "The Children's Crusade here. The part of a "Mother" will be taken by Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown and that of the "Old Sailor" will be taken by Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso. Mr. Earle Cartwright will be "The Voice from on High," while the parts of the four women will be taken by Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child and Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter.

The entire chorus of the Cecilia, 175 voices, will be used, and the entire force of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, in addition, a children's chorus of 100, trained by Professor Hadley.

The work itself appeals not merely from the delightful quality of the musical setting, but the story itself exerts a strong attraction to anyone who has the least sentiment in his nature.

The concert will begin at 8 o'clock.

Plain Dealer

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Annual Concert At the Armory

BY ARCHIE BELL.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, gave its annual concert at Grays armory last evening before an audience that filled the auditorium. As usual, it proved to be one of the most satisfactory musical evenings of the year. This for several reasons. There is no orchestral body in America and perhaps in all the world, the individual members of which are so competently equipped by natural talent and traditional training for their difficult task. They have been gathered together from the four musical quarters of the globe, have been long associated and always under the baton of a musical genius, they have reached a degree of proficiency seldom, if ever before, accomplished in the history of music.

Another contributing factor to their excellent performance at this time is deep seated musical intelligence of the conductor. There is nothing of the eccentric about Fiedler, not even the faintest suggestion of even whimsically which seems to take hold of so many men who hold the baton. He is worthy of the players who sit beneath him. His method of conveying his intentions is mental and he makes the slightest physical movements in accomplishing astounding results. I have never seen more than one example of such supremacy of the baton as the chief solo instrument, and that was in the hand of Hans Richter directing a Wagnerian performance, standing in one position, rigid sometimes, and seeming by some psychical method to flash his thoughts to the men about him. Fiedler is the best of the directors who have come to us with the Boston orchestra or with any other, at least in recent years.

The program was an attractive one and naturaly called out the representatives of what is best in the musical life of Cleveland. It was the first time that Rachmaninoff's symphony in E. minor had been heard in this city. Although this remarkable young Russian with the unpronounceable name of Sergei Vassilievich has been frequently represented upon local programs, the works selected have been in no way representative of his creations of the past two or three years since he left his fatherland and settled in Dresden, where the stupendous work heard last evening was written.

It was first played abroad two years ago and might have waited some time for an American performance but for the visit of the composer to this country during the fall of 1909, when it was given by the Philadelphia orchestra with Rachmaninoff himself conducting. Its success abroad was quickly duplicated here and each subsequent performance has been a triumph.

While very long, taking over an hour for the four movements, it is not tedious for a moment and has a charm that is not easy to define. The composer may have become an expatriate for professional reasons, but he is a Russian and the national spirit pervades his work. In the first movement, there is a tonal coloring that meets the requirements of Maurice Barres' definition of landscape, which he says is a "state of soul." Through the early passages creeps the spirit of the Steppes, flashes of sunshine and a broad expanse. It seems the very soul of Russia.

The second movement is more brilliant in coloring, full of a wild Cossack spirit and a primitive dance. The third movement is a weird, almost oriental wail of a fettered people. The finale seems to throw aside all restraint and in a barbaric blast utilizing the full equipment of the orchestra ends in triumph.

It is a magnificent creation, and coming from a man still under 40, is another prophecy of the artistic supremacy to which the Russians are rapidly attaining. Italian music seems rapidly on the decline, the French masters are wandering in vague mists led by Debussy and d'Indy; whereas the Russ, with such a representative as Rachmaninoff, demonstrate all the vigor of the past, with an added virility borrowed from what has preceded them.

The program opened with the comedy overture, "Puck," written by G. Strube, a violinist with the orchestra. It is an interesting work on the lines of the "Marche Joyeuse," heard here two years ago, though perhaps more "legitimate" and in closer accord with the traditions. The idea of the composer is to represent Puck, the little imp, capering about on an expedition in which he causes general consternation and fright, at the same time an effort being made to create a tonal description of his environment.

Alwin Schroeder, the cellist, gave a masterly interpretation of Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The program closed with Beethoven's sublime third "Leonore" overture.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911.

SCHARWENKA RECITAL!

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Xaver Scharwenka was heard at yesterday afternoon's Symphony rehearsal in his own Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, Op. 82, which was played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Scharwenka is not a stranger to Boston audiences, having played with the orchestra on two previous occasions, also in recital and with the Kneisel quartette, but his appearances have been so infrequent as to be a decided novelty. And certainly his concerto which he played yesterday was a novelty in many ways. All the dry dust of the past years of concerto writing was shaken out of it, all the stiff, inflexible decorum which eats out the life of many concertos was done away with, and we heard a fresh, spontaneous, living creation, which flowed from the instruments with all the lightness and vigor of a mountain breeze that sweeps down the hillside and across lakes gathering new life and beauty with every breath. Mr. Scharwenka himself plays with this same spontaneous, creative touch; we feel as if he were dreaming for the first time the dreams of his music, as if each measure that his fingers play were fresh from the creative mind that moves them.

He communicates to the orchestra playing much of this same rare quality. The concerto itself opens with a free expression of the theme by the orchestra, and instead of orchestra and piano working on it independently of each other, with now and then interchange of ideas, the orchestra and solo instrument coalesce into one expressive being, each is the counterpart and true complement of the other. Novel instrumentation and combinations of orchestral instruments with the piano are introduced, lovely trilling flute arias over running arpeggio work in the piano, rich, deep horn motifs, that draw in long breaths of beauty play over sympathetic chords in the piano; or the piano develops a theme over delicate pizzicato strings. Although the piano is always the solo instrument, it never divorces itself from the orchestra, but sings with it, now having the quality of an orchestral instrument itself, now a solitary voice with some sweet utterance to give. The orchestration of the concerto is exceedingly varied an replete with melodic expression; it affords a setting for the piano score that enriches and enhances its beauties at every point. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra yesterday brought out all special and specific orchestral values. Mr. Scharwenka's reception was a most cordial one.

The rest of the programme included the Handel Overture No. 1 in D minor, the Haydn Symphony in E-flat Major, and "The Moldau" from the Smetana Symphonic Poem, "Ma Vlast." The Haydn Symphony never fails of a most enthusiastic welcome from its audience, and yesterday was no exception. It is thematically not complicated, but its beauties are of the simple, lasting kind which never wear dim nor lose one atom of their intrinsic worth.

The "Moldau," with its long, flowing melodies like the stream which it typifies, was a graceful, curving rivulet, all the delicate wood and calls mingling with its voice, and moonlit, starlit shadows playing across its reflective surface. It followed most naturally the concerto preceding it, and gace to the programme a sense of completed harmony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," which was one of the most brilliant achievements of last season's Symphony concerts, is to be played on the programmes of next week, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Nothing which Mr. Fiedler has done in Boston has won him greater praise than did his conducting of this work. As last year the violoncello solo will be played by Mr. Warnke, and the solo viola by Mr. Ferir. The soloist will be Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, and he will play the seldom heard concerto for pianoforte in C minor, No. 3, by Beethoven. The novelty on the programme will be Mr. Busoni's suite "Turandot," which was played last year by the Philharmonic Society in New York.

THE CECILIA SOCIETY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Cecilia Society will give "The Children's Crusade" in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 16, at 8 o'clock. Edmond Clement, a leading figure in lyric opera in France and formerly a member of the French section of the Metropolitan at its last season's special performances at the New Theatre, in New York, will sing the leading tenor role.

Mme. Rider-Kelsey and Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold will sing the two soprano roles. The entire chorus of 175 voices and the entire Symphony orchestra will be assisted by a children's chorus of 100 voices, which have been trained by Prof. Hadley of the Somerville schools.

FEBRUARY 11, 1911.
MONITOR, BOSTON,

The Boston Symphony activities of the coming week include the presentation of Pierne's "Children's Crusade," with the Cecelia Society, at Symphony hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and the performance of the "Don Quixote" tone poem of Richard Strauss, Friday afternoon, Feb. 17, and Saturday evening, Feb. 18. The choral concert brings forward Edmond Clement, the French tenor, Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey and Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold as soloists. The orchestral concert is the occasion of the first Boston appearance this season of the pianist, Ferrucio Busoni. Mr. Busoni brings in his portfolio Beethoven's C minor concerto, No. 3, op. 37, and a new orchestral suite of his own composition which Mr. Fiedler and his men will interpret, "Turandot," a work played in New York last year by the Philharmonic Society.

RECORD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911

MUSIC NOTES.

The most brilliant achievement of the Symphony orchestra last year came at the 23d concert when Strauss's "Don Quixote" was performed. Nothing that Fiedler has done since he has been in Boston has won him greater praise and the inclusion of this work in the 16th programme on next Friday and Saturday will be welcomed by everybody. The soloist will be Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, who will play the seldom-heard concerto for pianoforte in C-Minor No. 3 by Beethoven.

A notable event of the coming week will be the performance of Pierne's legend, "The Children's Crusade." A distinguished list of soloists has been engaged for the event, the most important part of which, that of the Narrator, will be taken by Edmond Clement, the French tenor.

The work will be sung by the Cecilia society in Symphony hall Feb. 16.

[158]

GLOBE, SATURDAY
FEBRUARY 11, 1911

PLAYS OWN CONCERTO

Scharwenka's Work at Symphony.

Works of Haydn and Handel Given by the Orchestra.

The program of the 15th symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Handel, overture No. 1 in D major (arranged by Franz Wullner, the father of the lieder singer); Haydn, symphony in E flat major; Xaver Scharwenka, concerto for piano No. 4, F minor, op 82, first time in Boston, played by the composer; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vltava" ("The Moldau"), second in the series "My Country."

This overture by Handel, even as the one to "The Messiah," which it resembles in the recurring rhythmical figure of alternately long and short notes, is a memento to the influence upon the development of musical form exerted by one who began his career at the French court as scullery boy.

Lully's form of overture, consisting of a grave movement followed by a rapid one, became the pattern for those of Handel, as of all those of his time. Yesterday the sturdy dignity of the unvarying polyphony and the crisp incisiveness and logical sequence of the fugue were still wholesome models for modern ears.

If the public of Haydn's day had threatened to have none of him as a composer, either because on the one hand, perchance, he wrote in strange idioms and new forms, or because he wrote respectable, but somniferous music on the other, no doubt he could have earned his living in some theatre as a drummer. Early in their youth, the children of every German tympanist are taught to laugh heartily at the story of the boy Haydn, who once improvised a drum for practice by stretching a cloth tightly over a meal basket, and belaboring the same with such good will as to nearly ruin the upholstered chair beneath it.

Haydn retained his fondness for the drums and this symphony is known in Germany as the "Pauken wirbel," the "drum roll," named from the roll of the tympani in the first bar, and yesterday beautifully played.

This symphony is to be enjoyed purely as music. Here is a typical Haydn minuet of a tidy, precise and well-ordered cheerfulness. Here, too, is a first theme of the andante, an embellished form of a bald Croatian folk-tune that denotes the composer's trait of treating folk-songs and dances.

For the historian of musical form here are further signs of development associated with Haydn—the definite boundaries of the divisions of the movements, the clearness in the system of keys, increased importance of the coda and the use of the slow and stately introduction to prepare the mind for serious attention.

It might be an interesting experiment to play the minuet of this symphony with one-half the strings used yesterday and without doubling the wood-wind. Haydn thought himself luxuriously supplied in London with Salomon's orchestra of 40.

To hear Hadyn performed with a full modern symphony orchestra leaves much of the aristocratic aloofness, the naivete and delicacy of outline of his music to be imagined. Yet Mr Witek's exquisite playing of the variation upon this Croatian air supplied the moments of all the work which seemed most apt and appropriate. Here was the antique grace, the quaintly formal elegance which marked the etiquette and the dress of the period.

Mr Scharwenka is a worthy and estimable pedagogue of the piano who directs a conservatory in Berlin, and who some years since dwelt in New York, likewise to impart instruction there.

His fourth concerto, performed yesterday by himself and for the first time in this city, is a vast and extensive composition. The composer performed the three movements with much equanimity and aplomb, and when at length he had finished and had wrung the hand of Mr Fiedler, also that of of Mr Witek, there did not appear any inevitable or plausible reason why they should have been performed upon the program of the Boston symphony orchestra.

There are a few themes with identity and character. The development of them is unduly prolonged for the vitality and inspiration of the work is sparse and nebulous. There are several climaxes atttained through a series of throes and shudders. There are melodic passages which curve in ingratiating scrolls, but yesterday did not tempt one to find sentiment or passion within them.

At times in the orchestra there is effective use of thematic material and evidence of tonal contrast. In the intermezzo there is a tinkling passage in marked rhythm which may be called pretty and neat. In the last movement there are pages which George Cohan might fancy for his next Broadway show. Neither these delights, nor the reminiscences of other tunes cannot offset the dreary measures of vaporous embellishment through which the piano meanders.

Mr Scharwenka played with exactitude and precision, as a teacher might have demonstrated an academic point to his class. There was no variation of nuances, no revelation of planistic color, no intimation that the piano could be made to sing nor was there the suggestion that any moment was the inevitable and spontaneous voicing of emotional thought. Both the composition and the performance were oftenest soporific and characterized by pedantry.

Sonetana's tone poem is imaginative and spontaneous music.

HE DETROIT NEWS.
FEBRUARY 3, 1911.

A Capacity Audience Greets Boston Orchestra at Splendid Concert

The hold which symphonic music is acquiring on Detroit was demonstrated last night when a packed house greeted the Boston Symphony orchestra at the Light Guard armory. It was rewarded by a remarkable program presented in a remarkable manner.

In the first place, all the music played by the full orchestra was composed within the past 22 years. The earliest number in composition was the Tschaikowsky symphony, the fifth, of the date of 1888. The most recent bore a date 20 years later. It would have been well if those who find it fashionable to decry modern music could all have heard the Boston organization. They would have found small foundation for their prejudice.

And secondly, that amazing Boston orchestra seemed even better than before Under the commanding baton of Fiedler it developed a tone quality that was marvelous. and the noise which many complain about in the full orchestration of Tschaikowsky and other modern composers was notable in its absence. There was never a harsh note, though at times the tone swelled to an extraordinary volume of sound.

Thirdly, there was Anton Witek, who introduced the only classic in the program by playing the familiar Mendelssohn concerto in E minor. Under his bow the music acquired new beauties. Maintaining at all times a magnificent tone, he twinkled the fingers of his left hand over the strings of his wonderful Stradivarius until his hearers gasped, and capped the climax of marvelous playing by such an exhibition of double-stopping and broken chords as has never been heard in Detroit.

The first movement of the Tschaikowsky number, calling the full orchestra into play, beginning with a most depressing passage, working through pessimistic but remarkably well orchestrated themes and developments, and closing with a gradual deepening of tone until it ceased in an ominous rumbling of the kettle-drum, astonished the audience into silence. The andante was better liked; the waltz deepened the interest; and when, in the finale the orchestra broke into the triumphant hymn, reminiscent of the close of the Tannhauser overture, in a great burst of sound, the emotions of the hearers could scarcely be restrained.

A comedy overture called "Puck," by Gustav Strube, was played. It proved ultra-modern in tone, and was very well liked. At its close a little man in the third row of violins, at a sign from Mr. Fiedler, rose and bowed. It was Mr. Strube himself.

The final number was a tone poem, "Finlandia," by the Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius.

Next in the Orchestral association's series comes the Theodore Thomas orchestra for its second concert of the season, Feb. 20, in an all-Wagner program.

THE PILOT
FEBRUARY 11, 1911.

THE CHILDREN'S CRUSADE.

Cecilia Society and Boston Symphony Orchestra to be Heard in Symphony Hall, Feb. 16.

The principal musical event of the coming week will be the performance of Gabriel Pierne's musical legend. "The Childrens Crusade," for which distinguished soloists have been engaged. The most important part, the Narrator, will be taken by Edmond Clement, French lyric tenor, who was soloist with the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last Thursday.

Clement is the leading French lyric tenor. He first came to America a year ago as a member of the Metropolitan Opera Company and next year in special performances of French opera in the New Theatre, he will head the company. He has been compared to Jean de Reske, though his voice is not of heroic quality, but his art is of extraordinary perfection.

The principal soprano will be Madame Corinne Kider-Kelsey, who is the leading concert singer today of American training. The other principal woman's character, that of Allys, will be taken by Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, who has already sung with the Cecilia in "The Children's Crusade here. The part of a "Mother" will be taken by Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown and that of the "Old Sailor" will be taken by Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso. Mr. Earle Cartwright will be "The Voice from on High," while the parts of the four women will be taken by Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child and Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter.

The entire chorus of the Cecilia, 175 voices, will be used, and the entire force of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, in addition, a children's chorus of 100, trained by Professor Hadley.

The work itself appeals not merely from the delightful quality of the musical setting, but the story itself exerts a strong attraction to anyone who has the least sentiment in his nature.

The concert will begin at 8 o'clock.

Plain Dealer, Cleveland

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Annual Concert At the Armory

BY ARCHIE BELL.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, gave its annual concert at Grays armory last evening before an audience that filled the auditorium. As usual, it proved to be one of the most satisfactory musical evenings of the year. This for several reasons: There is no orchestral body in America and perhaps in all the world, the individual members of which are so competently equipped by natural talent and traditional training for their difficult task. They have been gathered together from the four musical quarters of the globe, have been long associated and always under the baton of a musical genius, they have reached a degree of proficiency seldom, if ever before, accomplished in the history of music.

Another contributing factor to their excellent performance at this time is deep seated musical intelligence of the conductor. There is nothing of the eccentric about Fiedler, not even the faintest suggestion of even whimsically which seems to take hold of so many men who hold the baton. He is worthy of the players who sit beneath him. His method of conveying his intentions is mental and he makes the slightest physical movements in accomplishing astounding results. I have never seen more than one example of such supremacy of the baton as the chief solo instrument, and that was in the hand of Hans Richter directing a Wagnerian performance, standing in one position, rigid sometimes, and seeming by some psychical method to flash his thoughts to the men about him. Fiedler is the best of the directors who have come to us with the Boston orchestra or with any other, at least in recent years.

The program was an attractive one and naturaly called out the representatives of what is best in the musical life of Cleveland. It was the first time that Rachmaninoff's symphony in E. minor had been heard in this city. Although this remarkable young Russian with the unpronounceable name of Sergei Vassilievich has been frequently represented upon local programs, the works selected have been in no way representative of his creations of the past two or three years since he left his fatherland and settled in Dresden, where the stupendous work heard last evening was written.

It was first played abroad two years ago and might have waited some time for an American performance but for the visit of the composer to this country during the fall of 1909, when it was given by the Philadelphia orchestra with Rachmaninoff himself conducting. Its success abroad was quickly duplicated here and each subsequent performance has been a triumph.

While very long, taking over an hour for the four movements, it is not tedious for a moment and has a charm that is not easy to define. The composer may have become an expatriate for professional reasons, but he is a Russian and the national spirit pervades his work. In the first movement, there is a tonal coloring that meets the requirements of Maurice Barres' definition of landscape, which he says is a "state of soul." Through the early passages creeps the spirit of the Steppes, flashes of sunshine and a broad expanse. It seems the very soul of Russia.

The second movement is more brilliant in coloring, full of a wild Cossack spirit and a primitive dance. The third movement is a weird, almost oriental wail of a fettered people. The finale seems to throw aside all restraint and in a barbaric blast utilizing the full equipment of the orchestra ends in triumph.

It is a magnificent creation, and coming from a man still under 40, is another prophecy of the artistic supremacy to which the Russians are rapidly attaining. Italian music seems rapidly on the decline, the French masters are wandering in vague mists led by Debussy and d'Indy; whereas the Russ, with such a representative as Rachmaninoff, demonstrate all the vigor of the past, with an added virility borrowed from what has preceded them.

The program opened with the comedy overture, "Puck," written by G. Strube, a violinist with the orchestra. It is an interesting work on the lines of the "Marche Joyeuse," heard here two years ago, though perhaps more "legitimate" and in closer accord with the traditions. The idea of the composer is to represent Puck, the little imp, capering about on an expedition in which he causes general consternation and fright, at the same time an effort being made to create a tonal description of his environment.

Alwin Schroeder, the cellist, gave a masterly interpretation of Tachaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme." The program closed with Beethoven's sublime third "Leonore" overture.

GLOBE, SATURDAY
FEBRUARY 11, 1911

PLAYS OWN CONCERTO

Scharwenka's Work at Symphony.

Works of Haydn and Handel Given by the Orchestra.

The program of the 15th symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Handel, overture No. 1 in D major (arranged by Franz Wullner, the father of the lieder singer); Haydn, symphony in E flat major; Xaver Scharwenka, concerto for piano No. 4, F minor, op 82, first time in Boston, played by the composer; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vltava" ("The Moldau"), second in the series "My Country."

This overture by Handel, even as the one to "The Messiah," which it resembles in the recurring rhythmical figure of alternately long and short notes, is a memento to the influence upon the development of musical form exerted by one who began his career at the French court as scullery boy.

Lully's form of overture, consisting of a grave movement followed by a rapid one, became the pattern for those of Handel, as of all those of his time. Yesterday the sturdy dignity of the unvarying polyphony and the crisp incisiveness and logical sequence of the fugue were still wholesome models for modern ears.

If the public of Haydn's day had threatened to have none of him as a composer, either because on the one hand, perchance, he wrote in strange idioms and new forms, or because he wrote respectable, but somniferous music on the other, no doubt he could have earned his living in some theatre as a drummer. Early in their youth, the children of every German tympanist are taught to laugh heartily at the story of the boy Haydn, who once improvised a drum for practice by stretching a cloth tightly over a meal basket, and belaboring the same with such good will as to nearly ruin the upholstered chair beneath it.

Haydn retained his fondness for the drums and this symphony is known in Germany as the "Pauken wirbel," the "drum roll," named from the roll of the tympani in the first bar, and yesterday beautifully played.

This symphony is to be enjoyed purely as music. Here is a typical Haydn minuet of a tidy, precise and well-ordered cheerfulness. Here, too, is a first theme of the andante, an embellished form of a bald Croatian folk-tune that denotes the composer's trait of treating folk-songs and dances.

For the historian of musical form here are further signs of development associated with Haydn—the definite boundaries of the divisions of the movements, the clearness in the system of keys, increased importance of the coda and the use of the slow and stately introduction to prepare the mind for serious attention.

It might be an interesting experiment to play the minuet of this symphony with one-half the strings used yesterday and without doubling the woodwind. Haydn thought himself luxuriously supplied in London with Salomon's orchestra of 40.

To hear Hadyn performed with a full modern symphony orchestra leaves much of the aristocratic aloofness, the naivete and delicacy of outline of his music to be imagined. Yet Mr Witek's exquisite playing of the variation upon this Croatian air supplied the moments of all the work which seemed most apt and appropriate. Here was the antique grace, the quaintly formal elegance which marked the etiquette and the dress of the period.

Mr Scharwenka is a worthy and estimable pedagogue of the piano who directs a conservatory in Berlin, and who some years since dwelt in New York, likewise to impart instruction there.

His fourth concerto, performed yesterday by himself and for the first time in this city, is a vast and extensive composition. The composer performed the three movements with much equanimity and aplomb, and when at length he had finished and had wrung the hand of Mr Fiedler, also that of of Mr Witek, there did not appear any inevitable or plausible reason why they should have been performed upon the program of the Boston symphony orchestra.

There are a few themes with identity and character. The development of them is unduly prolonged for the vitality and inspiration of the work is sparse and nebulous. There are several climaxes atttained through a series of throes and shudders. There are melodic passages which curve in ingratiating scrolls, but yesterday did not tempt one to find sentiment or passion within them.

At times in the orchestra there is effective use of thematic material and evidence of tonal contrast. In the intermezzo there is a tinkling passage in marked rhythm which may be called pretty and neat. In the last movement there are pages which George Cohan might fancy for his next Broadway show. Neither these delights, nor the reminiscences of other tunes cannot offset the dreary measures of vaporous embellishment through which the piano meanders.

Mr Scharwenka played with exactitude and precision, as a teacher might have demonstrated an academic point to his class. There was no variation of nuances, no revelation of pianistic color, no intimation that the piano could be made to sing nor was there the suggestion that any moment was the inevitable and spontaneous voicing of emotional thought. Both the composition and the performance were oftenest soporific and characterized by pedantry.

Sonetana's tone poem is imaginative and spontaneous music.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911.

SCHARWENKA RECITAL!

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Xaver Scharwenka was heard at yesterday afternoon's Symphony rehearsal in his own Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, Op. 82, which was played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Scharwenka is not a stranger to Boston audiences, having played with the orchestra on two previous occasions, also in recital and with the Kneisel quartette, but his appearances have been so infrequent as to be a decided novelty. And certainly his concerto which he played yesterday was a novelty in many ways. All the dry dust of the past years of concerto writing was shaken out of it, all the stiff, inflexible decorum which eats out the life of many concertos was done away with, and we heard a fresh, spontaneous, living creation, which flowed from the instruments with all the lightness and vigor of a mountain breeze that sweeps down the hillside and across lakes gathering new life and beauty with every breath. Mr. Scharwenka himself plays with this same spontaneous, creative touch; we feel as if he were dreaming for the first time the dreams of his music, as if each measure that his fingers play were fresh from the creative mind that moves them.

He communicates to the orchestra playing much of this same rare quality. The concerto itself opens with a free expression of the theme by the orchestra, and instead of orchestra and piano working on it independently of each other, with now and then interchange of ideas, the orchestra and solo instrument coalesce into one expressive being, each is the counter, part and true complement of the other. Novel instrumentation and combinations of orchestral instruments with the piano are introduced, lovely trilling flute arias over running arpeggio work in the piano, rich, deep horn motifs, that draw in long breaths of beauty play over sympathetic chords in the piano; or the piano develops a theme over delicate pizzicato strings. Although the piano is always the solo instrument, it never divorces itself from the orchestra, but sings with it, now having the quality of an orchestral instrument itself, now a solitary voice with some sweet utterance to give. The orchestration of the concerto is exceedingly varied an replete with melodic expression; it affords a setting for the piano score that enriches and enhances its beauties at every point. Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra yesterday brought out all special and specific orchestral values. Mr. Scharwenka's reception was a most cordial one.

The rest of the programme included the Handel Overture No. 1 in D minor, the Haydn Symphony in E-flat Major, and "The Moldau" from the Smetana Symphonic Poem, "Ma Vlast." The Haydn Symphony never fails of a most enthusiastic welcome from its audience, and yesterday was no exception. It is thematically not complicated, but its beauties are of the simple, lasting kind which never wear dim nor lose one atom of their intrinsic worth.

The "Moldau," with its long, flowing melodies like the stream which it typifies, was a graceful, curving rivulet, all the delicate woodland calls mingling with its voice, and moonlit, starlit shadows playing across its reflective surface. It followed most naturally the concerto preceding it, and gace to the programme a sense of completed harmony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," which was one of the most brilliant achievements of last season's Symphony concerts, is to be played on the programmes of next week, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Nothing which Mr. Fiedler has done in Boston has won him greater praise than did his conducting of this work. As last year the violoncello solo will be played by Mr. Warnke, and the solo viola by Mr. Ferir. The soloist will be Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, and he will play the seldom heard concerto for pianoforte in C minor, No. 3, by Beethoven. The novelty on the programme will be Mr. Busoni's suite "Turandot," which was played last year by the Philharmonic Society in New York.

THE CECILIA SOCIETY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Cecilia Society will give "The Children's Crusade" in Symphony Hall on Thursday evening, Feb. 16, at 8 o'clock. Edmond Clement, a leading figure in lyric opera in France and formerly a member of the French section of the Metropolitan at its last season's special performances at the New Theatre, in New York, will sing the leading tenor role.

Mme. Rider-Kelsey and Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold will sing the two soprano roles. The entire chorus of 175 voices and the entire Symphony orchestra will be assisted by a children's chorus of 100 voices, which have been trained by Prof. Hadley of the Somerville schools.

MONITOR, BOSTON, FEBRUARY 11, 1911.

The Boston Symphony activities of the coming week include the presentation of Pierne's "Children's Crusade," with the Cecelia Society, at Symphony hall, Thursday evening, Feb. 16, and the performance of the "Don Quixote" tone poem of Richard Strauss, Friday afternoon, Feb. 17, and Saturday evening, Feb. 18. The choral concert brings forward Edmond Clement, the French tenor, Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey and Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold as soloists. The orchestral concert is the occasion of the first Boston appearance this season of the pianist, Ferrucio Busoni. Mr. Busoni brings in his portfolio Beethoven's C minor concerto, No. 3, op. 37, and a new orchestral suite of his own composition which Mr. Fiedler and his men will interpret, "Turandot," a work played in New York last year by the Philharmonic Society.

RECORD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911

MUSIC NOTES.

The most brilliant achievement of the Symphony orchestra last year came at the 23d concert when Strauss's "Don Quixote" was performed. Nothing that Fiedler has done since he has been in Boston has won him greater praise and the inclusion of this work in the 16th programme on next Friday and Saturday will be welcomed by everybody. The soloist will be Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, who will play the seldom-heard concerto for pianoforte in C-Minor No. 3 by Beethoven.

A notable event of the coming week will be the performance of Pierne's legend, "The Children's Crusade." A distinguished list of soloists has been engaged for the event, the most important part of which, that of the Narrator, will be taken by Edmond Clement, the French tenor.

The work will be sung by the Cecilia society in Symphony hall Feb. 16.

[158]

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911 ADVERTISER, SATURDAY, MORNING, FEBRUARY

CONCERT AND OPERA

FIEDLER MAKES A LIGHTSOME PROGRAMME

Haendel and Haydn for a Classical Beginning, Mr. Scharwenka's Amiable Concerto for a Middle Piece and Smetana's Transparent Tone-Picturing for End—"Il Trovatore" at the Opera House, with Mr. Slezak in Assorted Voice, Mr. Amato as Opulent as Ever of Tone and Mme. Rappold for a Competent Leonora—Care for the Old Opera Too

UNLIKE some conductors of symphony concerts, Mr. Fiedler has the courage of a programme that shall make light entertainment. Of course, there are many pieces, and classic pieces withal, that are meet for such a purpose. They surreptitiously slip them among severer music; he has dared more than once to fill a whole concert with them. He did so again yesterday afternoon, and, so to say, killed three musical birds with one stone. First, he made his light programme; second, he did the annual duty that symphony orchestras and their conductors should do by Händel and Haydn; and third, he made known here Mr. Xaver Scharwenka's new concerto for pianoforte, and after many years brought back the pianist himself to play it. Precedent at the Symphony Concerts bids the conductor choose each year a symphony from Haydn and an orchestral piece—overture, concerto grosso or suite—from Händel. Mr. Fiedler, like Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck once before him, picked the symphony in E-flat from the series that Haydn wrote for Salamon's concerts in London, and chose from Händel an overture in D that from time to time, and as the composer's habit was with music that he liked, served him for the three distinct purposes of three different occasions. These he yoked for the first half of his programme. The second began with Mr. Scharwenka's concerto and ended with Smetana's tone-picture of his Bohemian river, "The Moldau," which is pleasantly fluent and transparently pictorial music.

The audience, in turn, had its particular joy of each of these pieces. Give Händel unedited to an orchestra of modern dimensions, and between the multiplied strings, woodwinds, and brass, he becomes very sonorous indeed. Have him previously reënforced by modern editing, as a certain Franz Wüllner has edited this overture in D, and his voice becomes larger and statelier still. Let the music begin with a full-voiced prelude "majestically," as it did yesterday and continue with a stoutly built and long-breathed fugue, and the effect is of the weaving, with sweeps of the hand, of a huge pattern in tones. The figures of the "majestical" prelude seemed to stride across the orchestra, and Händel tossed about the four voices of his fugue as jugglers toss their cannon-balls. It was as ample, ordered and flowing as his full-bottomed wig, and outside its energy, no more interesting. Both prelude and fugue had, besides, the curiously impersonal quality, as it seems nowadays, of Händel's music. Listen to Bach and the imagination believes that it detects individual and intimate emotions in the organist and choirmaster who was composer, too, and without a suspicion that he was to be of the "great masters." Mozart is Mozart; Haydn has usually his naive and homely savor. Händel, on the other hand, is the disembodied, the universal, the changeless pomp and power of sound. No one seems even to think of him intimately or off parade. His music forbids such belittling fancies. He seems always to have written it ceremonially.

Thus, Haydn, coming after him, seemed more than usually playful, chattering and naive, though he did try his hand at pomposities of sound in the drum-roll and the rumbling basses of this symphony in E-flat. He was not very whole-hearted or persistent in this excursion from his familiar paths, and by the time he has reached his second theme in his allegro, he has his strings and his wood-winds chattering gaily. If Händel loved the power of sound, Haydn loved the play of it. The wind often blows through Händel's music in gusts or gales; the sunshine flecked now and then with the chance shadow of a passing cloud plays through Haydn's. His slow movement paces its serene way from variation to variation, altering its rhythm as a man might vary his step to his musings. The minuet, again as usual, is the composer's little bow to the elegant company that has deigned to hear him and in the finale he is at play with sound again, that these same hearers may depart smiling at the sport. A shrewd old man was "papa" Haydn; he had his "peasant cunning" in the measuring of his audiences. He had another sort of cunning, too, that cropped curiously and amusingly out of the performance yesterday. Haydn's music is very easy to an orchestra accustomed to read Strauss, Debussy and Reger on the moment. The virtuosi of the platform at Symphony Hall know the bright, light, supple quality of euphoneous tone that Haydn's music exacts. Therefore, they take their ease with it, until some such slip as that of yesterday sets them smiling at their own carelessness. And Haydn's to trust and, if the listener is not too exacting, to like besides. It is a music to trust because it almost always takes the anticipated course. The melodic ideas appear where there is reason to expect them; they are developed in orderly fashion; in due place are the cadenzas, in due place the tutti; in due succession the contrasting passages; while repetition and reminiscence bind the whole together. Mr. Scharwenka has no mind to hardy rebellion against the concerto form or evasive experiments with it. If he suspects that it is antiquated and binding, his recourse is the lightness of the musical material that he encloses within it. True, he labels his first movement "allegro patetico" as though he were going in quest of grave and racking emotions and the broken utterance of them. In reality he has written an extended piece of moody but not very deep-running music that is "grateful" to pianist, pianoforte and orchestra, that is mellifluous throughout and that falls pleasantly upon the listening ears—as much more amiable than pathetic allegro. The slow movement is prettily graceful, rippling along from suggestion to suggestion of elegant old dance measures; while the finale, once a graver introduction is done, is vivacity itself, almost to the vein of operetta. Mr. Strube in his concerto for violin and violoncello took refuge from the perils and limitations of the chosen form by the writing of light music. Mr. Scharwenka has done likewise with a concerto for piano, and written, may be, more lightly than he himself at sixty, could play his own music. In these days, when the concertos become longer and longer, severer and severer, and more and more abruptly and harshly daring, he has been content to write amiably, "gratefully." The pianists, and all their audiences but the youngsters, will like his music.

The Moldau itself did not flow more smoothly in Smetana's succeeding music. The other day, when Mr. Fiedler tried Gernsheim's music "To a Drama," someone said it was the modern tone-poem made easy. By the same token Smetana's "Moldau" is modern tone-picturing made transparent. The dullest imagination may not miss a detail of the course of the stream in the music. The rivulets of tone rise and coalesce; they flow past the forest where are the huntsmen; past the meadows where are the dancers. They expand in broad reaches; they boil in rapids; they course by the ancient citadel; they recede till eye—and ear—can follow them no more. Through all this journey the music has flowed as steadily as variedly out of itself. The learned say that when the musical development and the imaginative scheme are thus fused, then does a tone-poem fulfill its dual end. Smetana's scheme was modest—and musical. His execution of it is simple—and musical. A happy completeness crowns the whole.

SCHARWENKA PLAYS AT THE SYMPHONY

HIS CONCERTO GIVEN WITH OLD-TIME SKILL

An Overture by Handel, a Symphony by Haydn and Smetana's Symphonic Poem.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Handel—Overture in D.
Haydn—Symphony in E-flat.
Xaver Scharwenka—Piano Concerto, No. 4, in F minor. Pianist, Xaver Scharwenka.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."

It was kettle-drum day. Haydn's symphony began with kettle-drum trills and Scharwenka's Concerto did the same, with plenty of other prominent calf-skin passages interspersed between—and we have an excellent kettle-drummer. The Handel overture was in the old French form, exactly the form that he employed in the overture to "The Messiah." Handel always wears well, for he was the most dramatic composer of his time, and he was a constant innovator in the orchestra. Pizzicato violin effects, the use of horns in orchestra, the introduction of the contrabassoon, the employment of harp in large score, experiments with clarinette, the development of the dramatic power of the bassoons, all these and more were due to Handel, the Richard Strauss of the 18th century.

He was thoroughly melodic, too, thanks to his sojourn in Italy, and this gave charm to the beginning of his overture, as re-scored by Franz Wuellner. Of course there was a blare of trumpets, for Handel loved this instrument, but we moderns may never know the effect of the trumpets which he used, with narrow tubes and very shallow mouthpieces. The present reviewer has heard such a trumpet played in Germany and can assert that the soaring and incisive effect is not present in our modern scores. In this dramatic and orchestral field Handel was the superior of Bach, but when it came to the final fugue one could not but feel that Handel did not attain the Bach ease and fluency in this king of forms. The strings, however, gave the contrapuntal movement with sharp decision and it made a strong ending to the overture.

The Haydn Symphony was rather thin musical gruel. Usually Haydn charms by his pretty naivete, and his simple musical chatter wears better in his symphonies than the more ambitious symphonic works of Mozart. But in this symphony he, too, becomes ambitious and tries to be intense and dramatic. Such music has no especial message to convey to the modern concert auditor, except, perhaps, from the historical standpoint. It was interesting, for example, to note the first attempts at thematic transferences from movement to movement, and then to observe a similar effect done with modern power, in the Scharwenka Concerto. But the mysterious roll of kettle-drums did not cause us to shudder, and the slow variations of the second movement, with a quite conventional theme as core, became tiresome.

Usually the old Minuet is the most boresome movement of the pre-Beethoven Symphony, but in this work the minuet was more effective than usual, both intrinsically and by contrast with what had preceded. The Finale, with Haydn and Mozart, was almost always rollicking and jolly, but in this symphony it had a little of that resolute dignity which Beethoven began to teach the world in the finale of his second symphony. Therefore there were points to watch in the Haydn symphony, and the performance was excellent, but, having studied our lesson, let us put that particular book away.

We dare not say how many years ago it is that we sat in the Tivoli, in Copenhagen, and heard Xaver Scharwenka play his second concerto, with an orchestra of 45 men under Balduin Dahl. It was pleasant to note that the many intervening years have not made the slightest havoc with his excellent technique, nor with his ability to compose effective works in good form. His new concerto is a good model of classical music. Scharwenka does not run amuck through the various keys nor is he ashamed to resolve a chord according to Richter once in a while. His score does not call for Heckelphones, Pedal clarinettes, Besset Horns, Wind Machines or Tonitruones, but he is content with the classical orchestra.

The concerto is serious, sometimes even sombre, and follows the Tschaikowsky path during the first part of its journey. The transference of figures from one movement to another gives homogeneity to the composition without becoming monotonous. The thematic material is good, but sometimes spread out rather thinly, however. The placing of the cadenza (not a very showy one) between the chief and subordinate themes in the last part of the first movement shows that the composer was not desirous of displaying the virtuoso at the expense of the musical thought. Mendelssohn did the same trick in his violin concerto, placing the cadenza in the development section.

The whole cadenza idea is beginning to fade out. Brahms discarded it in his great piano concerto and even Beethoven came to suspect this personal display in his last works. That the general character of the concerto is earnest may be gathered from the fact that the first movement is "Allegro Patetico," the second "Allegro molto Tranquilio," and the third begins with a dirge. For all this the impression is by no means lachrymose, but generally sturdy and virile. The second movement is quite short and sentimentalizes a little.

The Finale is the best movement and has a powerful climax that was nobly played. Only we wished that the piano could have given a broader effect against the power of the orchestra. After the funereal opening, the last movement changes character utterly and becomes a most exciting Tarantella. The orchestra rapped out the crisp 6-8 rhythm splendidly and the soloist gave an exhibition of both finger and wrist action that was masterly.

Except in this portion of the Finale Mr. Scharwenka has avoided the fault that composer-pianists, from Liszt downward, fall into; he has not turned the work into a piano solo with orchestral accompaniment. It is a good and sterling concerto, one that is healthy to hear in these days of musical cataclysms, and the splendid work of the Finale brought its reward, for there were many recalls.

If our indigestible latter-day composers would only follow Humperdinck in Opera and Smetana in tone-poems, we would be much happier. Smetana's "Moldau" received a beautiful reading. The river-figure was most ripplingly carried out and the military and terpsichorean scenes upon the banks were delightful. Especially the dance-theme deserves recognition for the dainty beauty with which it was interpreted. Smetana was a genius and it is probable that his works will wear better than those of his more talented pupil Dvorak, in spite of their comparative simplicity and tunefulness—perhaps just because of these attributes.

MUSIC NOTES.

Edmond Clement, the French tenor, will make his debut at the Boston Opera House as Chevalier Des Grieux in Massenet's "Manon," Wednesday, Feb. 15. Clement was for years the first tenor of the famous Opera Comique in Paris, and has sung with great success at the other opera houses of France, in Monte Carlo and in Brussels.

Last season he was a member of the Metropolitan Co., while this season he was the star of the Montreal Opera Co. Boston music lovers are looking forward with great interest to the debut of this excellent artist.

The most brilliant achievement of the Symphony orchestra last year came at the 23d concert when Strauss's "Don Quixote" was performed. Nothing that Fiedler has done since he has been in Boston has won him greater praise and the inclusion of this work in the 16th programme on next Friday and Saturday will be welcomed by everybody. The soloist will be Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, who will play the seldom-heard concerto for pianoforte in C-Minor No. 3 by Beethoven.

RECORD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911

OLD TIME PIANIST AT SYMPHONY

(From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Handel—Overture in D.
Haydn—Symphony in E-flat.
Xaver Scharwenka—Piano Concerto, No. 4, in F minor. Pianist, Xaver Scharwenka.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."

We dare not say how many years ago it is that we sat in the Tivoli, in Copenhagen, and heard Xaver Scharwenka play his second concerto, with an orchestra of 45 men under Balduin Dahl. It was pleasant to note that the many intervening years have not made the slightest havoc with his excellent technique, nor with his ability to compose effective works in good form. His new concerto is a good model of classical music.

The concerto is serious, sometimes even sombre, and follows the Tschaikowsky path during the first part of its journey. The transference of figures from one movement to another gives homogeneity to the composition without becoming monotonous. The thematic material is good, but sometimes spread out rather thinly, however. The placing of the cadenza (not a very showy one) between the chief and subordinate themes in the last part of the first movement shows that the composer was not desirous of displaying the virtuoso at the expense of the musical thought. Mendelssohn did the same trick in his violin concerto, placing the cadenza in the development section.

The Finale is the best movement and has a powerful climax that was nobly played. Only we wished that the piano could have given a broader effect against the power of the orchestra. After the funereal opening, the last movement changes character utterly and becomes a most exciting Tarantella. The orchestra rapped out the crisp 6-8 rhythm splendidly and the soloist gave an exhibition of both finger and wrist action that was masterly.

If our indigestible latter-day composers would only follow Humperdinck in Opera and Smetana in tone-poems, we would be much happier. Smetana's "Moldau" received a beautiful reading.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1911.

SCHARWENKA PLAYS WELL AT SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Xavier Scharwenka was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He played his fourth piano concerto, a work composed less than two years ago, and dedicated to the Queen of Roumania.

Scharwenka is now sixty-one years old and no longer plays with the brilliancy and technical perfection that distinguished him a dozen years ago when he was at the head of piano virtuosi.

He still retains the authority, dignity and majesty of acknowledged greatness and it was inspiring to see his march across the platform, his ceremony of seating himself and his pose as the orchestra played the prelude.

Scharwenka has not played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1891, but those who saw him then say he has changed but little in appearance, while his playing is still full of expression.

The concerto is a dainty, pretty sort of affair. Its second movement is a charming but dignified dance, while the final movement is richly melodious.

The Haydn Symphony in E flat major, one of the most fanciful works of that master of melody, was played by the orchestra for the third time only, and was entirely a novelty to most of the audience.

Smetana's "Moldau" brought the program to a close. Modern composers who paint tone poems with horrid noises should consider this exquisite picture of a river rising and threading its way through uplands until it becomes a broad and placid stream. Here is descriptive music which is at the same time wholly lovely, and it is thirty-five years old.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY FEBRUARY 11, 1911

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

ON Friday and Saturday Mr. Fiedler will fulfil his promise to repeat Strauss's "Don Quixote" in the penetrating and vivid performance that he accomplished last spring. The music, as everyone knows by this time, is a masterpiece of delineation. Taking a conventional form—an introduction, theme, variations and finale, Strauss has wrought into it a musical image of the knight and his fall into melancholy and madness, successive pictures of one and another of his adventures, and the mingled piteousness and nobility of his end. Now it is music that deeply touches the imagination with its emotional penetration and power, and again it is music of ironic and fantastic delineation. Last spring the orchestra and Mr. Fiedler distinguished themselves in it. The other unfamiliar piece is Mr. Busoni's suite "Turandot," to be played for the first time here and out of compliment to the composer, who is also to be the pianist of the concerts. His piece is Beethoven's concerto in C-minor, unheard here in twenty years. Mr. Busoni brings to it the intellectual grasp and the large and varied power that have distinguished him in the past and the new sensitiveness and frankness of emotion that warmed his playing when he returned last year. The remaining item of the programme, the prelude to "Lohengrin," begins it.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911 ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY

CONCERT AND OPERA.

MR. FIEDLER MAKES A LIGHTSOME PROGRAMME

Haendel and Haydn for a Classical Beginning, Mr. Scharwenka's Amiable Concerto for a Middle Piece and Smetana's Transparent Tone-Picturing for End—"Il Trovatore" at the Opera House, with Mr. Slezak in Assorted Voice, Mr. Amato as Opulent as Ever of Tone and Mme. Rappold for a Competent Leonora—Care for the Old Opera Too

UNLIKE some conductors of symphony concerts, Mr. Fiedler has the courage of a programme that shall make light entertainment. Of course, there are many pieces, and classic pieces withal, that are meet for such a purpose. They surreptitiously slip them among severer music; he has dared more than once to fill a whole concert with them. He did so again yesterday afternoon, and, so to say, killed three musical birds with one stone. First, he made his light programme; second, he did the annual duty that symphony orchestras and their conductors should do by Händel and Haydn; and third, he made known here Mr. Xaver Scharwenka's new concerto for pianoforte, and after many years brought back the pianist himself to play it. Precedent at the Symphony Concerts bids the conductor choose each year a symphony from Haydn and an orchestral piece—overture, concerto grosso or suite—from Händel. Mr. Fiedler, like Mr. Gericke and Dr. Muck once before him, picked the symphony in E-flat from the series that Haydn wrote for Salamon's concerts in London, and chose from Händel an overture in D that from time to time, and as the composer's habit was with music that he liked, served him for the three distinct purposes of three different occasions. These he yoked for the first half of his programme. The second began with Mr. Scharwenka's concerto and ended with Smetana's tone-picture of his Bohemian river, "The Moldau," which is pleasantly fluent and transparently pictorial music.

The audience, in turn, had its particular joy of each of these pieces. Give Händel unedited to an orchestra of modern dimensions, and between the multiplied strings, woodwinds, and brass, he becomes very sonorous indeed. Have him previously reënforced by modern editing, as a certain Franz Wüllner has edited this overture in D, and his voice becomes larger and statelier still. Let the music begin with a full-voiced prelude "majestically," as it did yesterday and continue with a stoutly built and long-breathed fugue, and the effect is of the weaving, with sweeps of the hand, of a huge pattern in tones. The figures of the "majestical" prelude seemed to stride across the orchestra, and Händel tossed about the four voices of his fugue as jugglers toss their cannon-balls. It was as ample, ordered and flowing as his full-bottomed wig, and outside its energy, no more interesting. Both prelude and fugue had, besides, the curiously impersonal quality, as it seems nowadays, of Händel's music. Listen to Bach and the imagination believes that it detects individual and intimate emotions in the organist and choirmaster who was composer, too, and without a suspicion that he was to be of the "great masters." Mozart is Mozart; Haydn has usually his naive and homely savor. Händel, on the other hand, is the disembodied, the universal, the changeless pomp and power of sound. No one seems even to think of him intimately or off parade. His music forbids such belittling fancies. He seems always to have written it ceremonially.

Thus Haydn, coming after him, seemed more than usually playful, chattering and naive, though he did try his hand at pomposities of sound in the drum-roll and the rumbling basses of this symphony in E-flat. He was not very whole-hearted or persistent in this excursion from his familiar paths, and by the time he has reached his second theme in his allegro, he has his strings and his wood-winds chattering gaily. If Händel loved the power of sound, Haydn loved the play of it. The wind often blows through Händel's music in gusts or gales; the sunshine flecked now and then with the chance shadow of a passing cloud plays through Haydn's. His slow movement paces its serene way from variation to variation, altering its rhythm as a man might vary his step to his musings. The minuet, again as usual, is the composer's little bow to the elegant company that has deigned to hear him and in the finale he is at play with sound again, that these same hearers may depart smiling at the sport. A shrewd old man was "papa" Haydn; he had his "peasant cunning" in the measuring of his audiences. He had another sort of cunning, too, that cropped curiously and amusingly out of the performance yesterday. Haydn's music is very easy to an orchestra accustomed to read Strauss, Debussy and Reger on the moment. The virtuosi of the platform at Symphony Hall know the bright, light, supple quality of euphoneous tone that Haydn's music exacts. Therefore, they take their ease with it, until some such slip as that of yesterday sets them smiling at their own carelessness. And Haydn's music is very transparent.

to trust and, if the listener is not too exacting, to like besides. It is a music to trust because it almost always takes the anticipated course. The melodic ideas appear where there is reason to expect them; they are developed in orderly fashion; in due place are the cadenzas, in due place the tutti; in due succession the contrasting passages; while repetition and reminiscence bind the whole together. Mr. Scharwenka has no mind to hardy rebellion against the concerto form or evasive experiments with it. If he suspects that it is antiquated and binding, his recourse is the lightness of the musical material that he encloses within it. True, he labels his first movement "allegro patetico" as though he were going in quest of grave and racking emotions and the broken utterance of them. In reality he has written an extended piece of moody but not very deep-running music that is "grateful" to pianist, pianoforte and orchestra, that is mellifluous throughout and that falls pleasantly upon the listening ears—as much more amiable than pathetic allegro. The slow movement is prettily graceful, rippling along from suggestion to suggestion of elegant old dance measures; while the finale, once a graver introduction is done, is vivacity itself, almost to the vein of operetta. Mr. Strube in his concerto for violin and violoncello took refuge from the perils and limitations of the chosen form by the writing of light music. Mr. Scharwenka has done likewise with a concerto for piano, and written, may be, more lightly than he himself at sixty, could play his own music. In these days, when the concertos become longer and longer, severer and severer, and more and more abruptly and harshly daring, he has been content to write amiably, "gratefully." The pianists, and all their audiences but the youngsters, will like his music.

The Moldau itself did not flow more smoothly in Smetana's succeeding music. The other day, when Mr. Fiedler tried Gernsheim's music "To a Drama," someone said it was the modern tone-poem made easy. By the same token Smetana's "Moldau" is modern tone-picturing made transparent. The dullest imagination may not miss a detail of the course of the stream in the music. The rivulets of tone rise and coalesce; they flow past the forest where are the huntsmen; past the meadows where are the dancers. They expand in broad reaches; they boil in rapids; they course by the ancient citadel; they recede till eye—and ear—can follow them no more. Through all this journey the music has flowed as steadily as variedly out of itself. The learned say that when the musical development and the imaginative scheme are thus fused, then does a tone-poem fulfill its dual end. Smetana's scheme was modest—and musical. His execution of it is simple—and musical. A happy completeness crowns the whole.

RECORD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1911

OLD TIME PIANIST AT SYMPHONY

(From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Handel—Overture in D.
Haydn—Symphony in E-flat.
Xaver Scharwenka—Piano Concerto, No. 4, in F minor. Pianist, Xaver Scharwenka.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."

We dare not say how many years ago it is that we sat in the Tivoli, in Copenhagen, and heard Xaver Scharwenka play his second concerto, with an orchestra of 45 men under Balduin Dahl. It was pleasant to note that the many intervening years have not made the slightest havoc with his excellent technique, nor with his ability to compose effective works in good form. His new concerto is a good model of classical music.

The concerto is serious, sometimes even sombre, and follows the Tschaikowsky path during the first part of its journey. The transference of figures from one movement to another gives homogeneity to the composition without becoming monotonous. The thematic material is good, but sometimes spread out rather thinly, however. The placing of the cadenza (not a very showy one) between the chief and subordinate themes in the last part of the first movement shows that the composer was not desirous of displaying the virtuoso at the expense of the musical thought. Mendelssohn did the same trick in his violin concerto, placing the cadenza in the development section.

The Finale is the best movement and has a powerful climax that was nobly played. Only we wished that the piano could have given a broader effect against the power of the orchestra. After the funereal opening, the last movement changes character utterly and becomes a most exciting Tarantella. The orchestra rapped out the crisp 6-8 rhythm splendidly and the soloist gave an exhibition of both finger and wrist action that was masterly.

If our indigestible latter-day composers would only follow Humperdinck in Opera and Smetana in tone-poems, we would be much happier. Smetana's "Moldau" received a beautiful reading.

SCHARWENKA PLAYS AT THE SYMPHONY

HIS CONCERTO GIVEN WITH OLD-TIME SKILL

An Overture by Handel, a Symphony by Haydn and Smetana's Symphonic Poem.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Handel—Overture in D.
Haydn—Symphony in E-flat.
Xaver Scharwenka—Piano Concerto, No. 4, in F minor. Pianist, Xaver Scharwenka.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau."

It was kettle-drum day. Haydn's symphony began with kettle-drum trills and Scharwenka's Concerto did the same, with plenty of other prominent calf-skin passages interspersed between—and we have an excellent kettle-drummer. The Handel overture was in the old French form, exactly the form that he employed in the overture to "The Messiah." Handel always wears well, for he was the most dramatic composer of his time, and he was a constant innovator in the orchestra. Pizzicato violin effects, the use of horns in orchestra, the introduction of the contra-bassoon, the employment of harp in large score, experiments with clarinette, the development of the dramatic power of the bassoons, all these and more were due to Handel, the Richard Strauss of the 18th century.

He was thoroughly melodic, too, thanks to his sojourn in Italy, and this gave charm to the beginning of his overture, as re-scored by Franz Wuellner. Of course there was a blare of trumpets, for Handel loved this instrument, but we moderns may never know the effect of the trumpets which he used, with narrow tubes and very shallow mouthpieces. The present reviewer has heard such a trumpet played in Germany and can assert that the soaring and incisive effect is not present in our modern scores. In this dramatic and orchestral field Handel was the superior of Bach, but when it came to the final fugue one could not but feel that Handel did not attain the Bach ease and fluency in this king of forms. The strings, however, gave the contrapuntal movement with sharp decision and it made a strong ending to the overture.

The Haydn Symphony was rather thin musical gruel. Usually Haydn charms by his pretty naivete, and his simple musical chatter wears better in his symphonies than the more ambitious symphonic works of Mozart. But in this symphony he, too, becomes ambitious and tries to be intense and dramatic. Such music has no especial message to convey to the modern concert auditor, except, perhaps, from the historical standpoint. It was interesting, for example, to note the first attempts at thematic transferences from movement to movement, and then to observe a similar effect done with modern power, in the Scharwenka Concerto. But the mysterious roll of kettle-drums did not cause us to shudder, and the slow variations of the second movement, with a quite conventional theme as core, became tiresome.

Usually the old Minuet is the most boresome movement of the pre-Beethoven Symphony, but in this work the minuet was more effective than usual, both intrinsically and by contrast with what had preceded. The Finale, with Haydn and Mozart, was almost always rollicking and jolly, but in this symphony it had a little of that resolute dignity which Beethoven began to teach the world in the finale of his second symphony. Therefore there were points to watch in the Haydn symphony, and the performance was excellent, but, having studied our lesson, let us put that particular book away.

We dare not say how many years ago it is that we sat in the Tivoli, in Copenhagen, and heard Xaver Scharwenka play his second concerto, with an orchestra of 45 men under Balduin Dahl. It was pleasant to note that the many intervening years have not made the slightest havoc with his excellent technique, nor with his ability to compose effective works in good form. His new concerto is a good model of classical music. Scharwenka does not run amuck through the various keys nor is he ashamed to resolve a chord according to Richter once in a while. His score does not call for Heckelphones, Pedal clarinettes, Besset Horns, Wind Machines or Tonitruones, but he is content with the classical orchestra.

The concerto is serious, sometimes even sombre, and follows the Tschaikowsky path during the first part of its journey. The transference of figures from one movement to another gives homogeneity to the composition without becoming monotonous. The thematic material is good, but sometimes spread out rather thinly, however. The placing of the cadenza (not a very showy one) between the chief and subordinate themes in the last part of the first movement shows that the composer was not desirous of displaying the virtuoso at the expense of the musical thought. Mendelssohn did the same trick in his violin concerto, placing the cadenza in the development section.

The Finale is the best movement and has a powerful climax that was nobly played. Only we wished that the piano could have given a broader effect against the power of the orchestra. After the funereal opening, the last movement changes character utterly and becomes a most exciting Tarantella. The orchestra rapped out the crisp 6-8 rhythm splendidly and the soloist gave an exhibition of both finger and wrist action that was masterly.

Except in this portion of the Finale Mr. Scharwenka has avoided the fault that composer-pianists, from Liszt downward, fall into; he has not turned the work into a piano solo with orchestral accompaniment. It is a good and sterling concerto, one that is healthy to hear in these days of musical cataclysms, and the splendid work of the Finale brought its reward, for there were many recalls.

If our indigestible latter-day composers would only follow Humperdinck in Opera and Smetana in tone-poems, we would be much happier. Smetana's "Moldau" received a beautiful reading. The river-figure was most ripplingly carried out and the military and terpsichorean scenes upon the banks were delightful. Especially the dance-theme deserves recognition for the dainty beauty with which it was interpreted. Smetana was a genius and it is probable that his works will wear better than those of his more talented pupil Dvorak, in spite of their comparative simplicity and tunefulness—perhaps just because of these attributes.

MUSIC NOTES.

Edmond Clement, the French tenor, will make his debut at the Boston Opera House as Chevalier Des Grieux in Massenet's "Manon," Wednesday, Feb. 15. Clement was for years the first tenor of the famous Opera Comique in Paris, and has sung with great success at the other opera houses of France, in Monte Carlo and in Brussels.

Last season he was a member of the Metropolitan Co., while this season he was the star of the Montreal Opera Co. Boston music lovers are looking forward with great interest to the debut of this excellent artist.

The most brilliant achievement of the Symphony orchestra last year came at the 23d concert when Strauss's "Don Quixote" was performed. Nothing that Fiedler has done since he has been in Boston has won nim greater praise and the inclusion of this work in the 16th programme on next Friday and Saturday will be welcomed by everybody. The soloist will be Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, who will play the seldom-heard concerto for pianoforte in C-Minor No. 3 by Beethoven.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1911.

SCHARWENKA PLAYS WELL AT SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

Xavier Scharwenka was soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He played his fourth piano concerto, a work composed less than two years ago, and dedicated to the Queen of Roumania.

Scharwenka is now sixty-one years old and no longer plays with the brilliancy and technical perfection that distinguished him a dozen years ago when he was at the head of piano virtuosi.

He still retains the authority, dignity and majesty of acknowledged greatness and it was inspiring to see his march across the platform, his ceremony of seating himself and his pose as the orchestra played the prelude.

Scharwenka has not played with the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1891, but those who saw him then say he has changed but little in appearance, while his playing is still full of expression.

The concerto is a dainty, pretty sort of affair. Its second movement is a charming but dignified dance, while the final movement is richly melodious.

The Haydn Symphony in E flat major, one of the most fanciful works of that master of melody, was played by the orchestra for the third time only, and was entirely a novelty to most of the audience.

Smetana's "Moldau" brought the program to a close. Modern composers who paint tone poems with horrid noises should consider this exquisite picture of a river rising and threading its way through upands until it becomes a broad and placid stream. Here is descriptive music which is at the same time wholly lovely, and it is thirty-five years old.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY FEBRUARY 11, 1911

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

ON Friday and Saturday Mr. Fiedler will fulfil his promise to repeat Strauss's "Don Quixote" in the penetrating and vivid performance that he accomplished last spring. The music, as everyone knows by this time, is a masterpiece of delineation. Taking a conventional form—an introduction, theme, variations and finale, Strauss has wrought into it a musical image of the knight and his fall into melancholy and madness, successive pictures of one and another of his adventures, and the mingled piteousness and nobility of his end. Now it is music that deeply touches the imagination with its emotional penetration and power, and again it is music of ironic and fantastic delineation. Last spring the orchestra and Mr. Fiedler distinguished themselves in it. The other unfamiliar piece is Mr. Busoni's suite "Turandot," to be played for the first time here and out of compliment to the composer, who is also to be the pianist of the concerts. His piece is Beethoven's concerto in C-minor, unheard here in twenty years. Mr. Busoni brings to it the intellectual grasp and the large and varied power that have distinguished him in the past and the new sensitiveness and frankness of emotion that warmed his playing when he returned last year. The remaining item of the programme, the prelude to "Lohengrin," begins it.

ERALD, SATURDAY, EBRUARY 11, 1911.

FOURTH CONCERTO BY SCHARWENKA

Played in Boston for the First Time at the 15th Symphony Rehearsal.

COMPOSER IS THE PIANIST

Orchestral Part of the Program Presents Handel and Haydn in Succession.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 15th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted, and Xaver Scharwenka was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Overture in D major.....Handel
Symphony in E flat major (B. & H. No. 1).....Haydn
Concerto in F minor, No. 4, for piano..Scharwenka
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau"...Smetana

Mr. Scharwenka has now played twice with the Boston Symphony orchestra in this city. It was on Feb. 7, 1891, that he played his first concerto. The one he played yesterday afternoon was his fourth, and during the performance some wished—and they were friendly disposed toward this excellent musician, celebrated teacher and genial man—that he had remained faithful to his first love.

The fourth concerto, F minor, is in three movements. The first is long and elaborately constructed, but as a whole it is not conspicuous for freshness of ideas, either in thematic material or in the development. The second and third movements will undoubtedly delight audiences for some time to come.

The opening of the second, an intermezzo, with its archaic flavor and piquancy, at once pleases by its prettiness, but after the middle episode, its return does not make the same effect; yet the return was inevitable, according to the laws of orthodox construction. Is it possible then that the prettiness of the first section so quickly fades?

The third movement after a dirge-like introduction has the character of a tarantella, and there is a motive that an operetta composer might well envy.

As a whole, the concerto contains little except passages of prettiness and piquancy. In spite of the carefully worked development of thematic material in the first movement, there is little that stirs the hearer, little that is truly emotional expressed in an original or individual manner.

The word, "reminiscent," applied to music, does not always convey a just idea. That which excites memories of music written before is often a resemblance in mood, due to harmonic progressions and orchestral coloring. There are pages in this first movement that are thus reminiscent, and there are moments when it is impossible for the hearer not to think of Wagner and of lesser composers.

Mr. Scharwenka has changed little in appearance since he last visited Boston, but his playing is more staid and at times tentative. There was not the old-time dash, the glittering brilliance; nor was this to be expected. It is enough to say that Mr. Scharwenka gave a dignified performance; that he played modestly; that after the second movement he was loudly applauded and at the end recalled several times.

The purely orchestral program does not call for extended notice. The overture by Handel contains a slow movement distinguished by the pomp peculiar to that composer, and a fugue that is like countless pages written by him and others of his period—correctly put together and uninteresting.

Haydn's symphony in E flat major has been played at these concerts three times, and not only twice, as stated by the program book. It is conspicuous for the gayety of its second theme in the first movement, the variation for the solo violin in the Andante, and the finale, which used to be a favorite with our maiden aunts who were addicted to playing arrangements for four hands—and, indeed, this finale is thematically charming.

Smetana's "Moldau" wears well. The opening is still a fine example of "water music."

The program for next week will include Wagner's Prelude to "Lohengrin," Strauss's "Don Quixote," Beethoven's piano concerto, played by Mr. Busoni, and Busoni's suite from the music to Gozzi's "Turandot."

JOURNAL—SUNDAY
FEBRUARY 12, 1911

Symphony Concert

Ferruccio Busoni, the distinguished composer and pianist, will be represented on this week's Symphony program in both capacities, for he will be the soloist, playing the seldom-heard concerto in C minor for pianoforte by Beethoven, and his own suite for orchestra. "Turandot" will have its first performance in Boston. The complete program is as follows:

Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Don Quixote".....Strauss
(Violoncello solo, Mr. Warnke; viola, Mr. Ferir).
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C minor, No. 3, Op. 37.....Beethoven
"Turandot", suite for orchestra.....Busoni
(First time in Boston)

The Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra, led by Mr. Fiedler, will give a performance of Pierne's "Children's Crusade" next Thursday night. The Cecilia, conducted by Mr. Lang, brought out this work in Boston Feb. 26, 1907, when the three chief singers were Mrs. Cabot Morse, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold and Frank Ormsby.

Pierne's cantata did not take the prize offered by the city of Paris in 1904, for that prize was awarded to Charles Tournemire for his "Sang de la Sirene," but the jury thought so well of Pierne's work that it urged a public performance of it at the expense of the city. Paris voted a sum of £3000 to defray the expenses and the performance took place in the Chatelet Theatre on Jan. 18, 1905. There were 500 singers and players, and among the singers were over 200 children from the municipal schools.

The libretto was arranged for Pierne by Marcel Schwob from his little book, "La Croisade des Enfants," published in 1896. This little volume of exquisite prose has a preface in Latin which may be paraphrased as follows: "About the same time children without guide, without leader, ran together from all the country places and towns of every region with eager steps toward lands beyond the sea, and when it was asked of them whither they hastened, they answered: 'Toward Jerusalem, to seek the Holy Land.' * * * To what they came is as yet unknown. But the most who, returning, were asked the reason of their journey, said they did not know. And about the same time naked women ran about through fields and towns, saying nothing."

For the libretto, Schwob, who died in 1905, about a month after the first performance of the cantata, gave as the argument quotations from the chronicles of Albert de Stade, Jacques de Voragine and Alberic des Trois-Fontaines. Alberic was a monk of the 13th century, who chronicled the remarkable events in the history of the world from its creation till 1241. Jacques, also of the 13th century, became archbishop of Genoa. He wrote chronicles and sermons and "The Golden Legend," which has been characterized as "a masterpiece of imbecile extravagance," but he was extraordinarily humane and charitable to the poor, and it is said that he was the first to translate the Bible into Italian, but his version was not published.

These quotations are as follows: "About that time many children without leader and without guide flew as fast as they could and ardently from our towns and cities toward lands beyond the sea. And when they were asked whither they were going they answered: 'To Jerusalem in search of the Holy Land.' They carried wallets and walking staves and bore a cross on their high-collared short-sleeved seagowns. And some came from as far as Cologne. They arrived at Genoa and embarked in seven great ships to cross the sea. And a storm arose and two vessels were sunk; and all the children on these two ships were engulfed. And when any one asked those who returned the reason of their journey they answered: 'We do not know.'"

It was in 1209 that His Holiness, Innocent III., appointed John de Bren, a French gentleman, to be King of Jerusalem.

"In the beginning of his reign," said the worthy and learned Thomas Fuller in his "excellently composed" History of the Holy War, "this accident (whether monstrous or miraculous) fell out (1213); in France a boy (for his years) went about singing in his own tongue:

Jesus, Lord, repair our loss;
Restore to us thy holy cross.

"Numberless children ran after him, and followed the same tune their captain and chanter did set them. No bolts, no bars, no fear of fathers or love of mothers could hold them back, but they would to the Holy Land to work wonders there; till their merry music had a sad close, all either perishing on land or drowned by sea. It was done (said my author) by the instinct of the devil, who, as it were, desired a cordial of children's blood to comfort his weak stomach, long cloyed with murdering of men." This author, from whom Fuller quoted in 1639, was Matthew of Paris.

The volume, "La Croisade des Enfants," is a very different thing from the libretto prepared for Pierne, and much more beautiful. The story of the adventures of the children is told in turn by a wandering beggar-clerk, a leper, Pope Innocent III., three of the little children themselves—Nicholas, Alain and Denis—Francois Longuejoue, clerk, a Kalandar, little Allys, and at last Pope Gregory IX. The book has been translated into English by Mr. Henry Copley Greene of this city.

In the libretto there is no leper—and the leper's story is perhaps the most affecting of the narrations. Pope Innocent III. declares that this crusade is not a pious work. No Kalandar, seeing the children, prostrates himself, strikes the ground with his forehead and praises the Lord with a loud voice. No Gregory IX. accuses the sea of having devoured the children whom he had not known. The characters are Allys, Allain, a mother, the Narrator, an old sailor and four women. There is also a voice from on high.

The first section of the cantata is entitled "The Departure" (Mr. Chapman, the translator of the libretto, prefers the word "forthsetting." Now, "forthsetting" comes from the obsolete verb to forthset, to set forth, to present to view, to display. The French title is "Le Depart." If Mr. Chapman wishes some other word than "departure" he might have used "forthgoing" or "setting out." "Forthsetting" is affected and erroneous.) The scene is in a Flemish town. Women run about and call on the inhabitants to awake and journey to Jerusalem. Allain, born blind, hears the voices and obeys the call. Allys tells him she will lead the way.

Part II. "The Highway." The children are on their way to Mt. Olivet to pluck the flower from off its tree. They sing the song "Mt. Olivet," an old French tune, which, handed down orally, is found in a manuscript of 1460.

Part III. "The Sea." The children sing to the Mediterranean a chorus based on an old Provencal Noel. (It is to be found in Tiersot's "Noels Francais." There is a chorus of sailors. The children pick up star fishes and fancy they are stars that have been drowned. A sailor tells them of a great and blue star created the night the Lord was born. This star watched over the cradle and followed him when he did walk abroad. When the body of the Lord was pierced the star turned red, tears of blood fell from it, fire dropped from it like rain. When the Lord died the star fell into the sea and was drowned. The narrator at the beginning of this part sings:

Crystal waters clear, pure and holy!
Thou receiv'st that river divine,
Where Saint John did cleanse mankind from evil.

Unfortunately the river Jordan does not empty into the Mediterranean, but into the Dead sea, and the depression of that sea without a port has been estimated as 1316 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. Yet Marcel Schwob was a singularly learned man.

Part IV. "The Saviour in the Storm." A storm arises and frightens the children, but Allain sees the Lord and, blind, leads the others to God.

The singers will be Mmes. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Edith Chapman Goold, Frances Dunton Brown, Alice Bates Rice, Laura F. Eaton, Bertha Cushing Child, Emily Wentworth Carter and Messrs. Clement, Cunningham and Cartwright. In addition to the regular chorus of 175 voices of the Cecilia. There will be a children's chorus of 100, which has been trained by Prof. Hadley of Somerville. The full strength of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be employed.

Edmond Clement will sing for the first time here in concert. He was born in Paris in 1867; he studied at the Conservatory and in 1889 took the first prize for singing as a pupil of Warot. He made his debut at the Opera-Comique as Vincent in "Mireille" Nov. 29, 1889, and was at once praised for his beautiful voice, taste, youthful ardor and vocal skill. Since then he has been one of the chief glories of the Opera-Comique. He has sung there in many operas, "Mignon," "Lakme," "Don Juan," "Falstaff," "La Vivandiere, "Phryne," "Don Pasquale," "Fra Diavolo," "La Dame Blanche"—the list is a long one. He came to New York as the chief tenor of the French contingent of the Metropolitan Opera House last season, and when the Metropolitan abandoned French opera for the season of 1910-11 he returned for concert engagements and a few operatic performances. It has been said of him in New York by the leading critics that he is the most artistic tenor that has visited America for many years, a singer to be classed with Mr. Bonci and with Jean de Reszke in his prime, for while his voice is of purely lyric quality and unlike that of Mr. de Reszke, not suited also to heroic roles, he sings with a rare perfection of art.

Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey is among the leading American concert sopranos and she has sung in opera in London. Mrs. Chapman-Goold is well known here. She sang in the first American performance of "The Children's Crusade" in New York, Dec. 4, 1906. Mr. Cunningham sang here as far back as Nov. 19, 1903, when he was a member of Mme. Patti's concert company.

CORINNE RIDER-KELSEY
SOPRANO

EDMOND CLEMENT TENOR

BOSTON JO URNAL
FEBRUARY 16, 1911

In Symphony Hall tonight the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra will give the second of the series of three concerts which they are to give this winter, the work being Gabriel Pierne's "Children's Crusade." Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown, Edmond Clement, Claude Cunningham, Earl Cartwright, Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child and Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter will assist.

POST, THURSDAY
FEBRUARY 16, 1911

CECILIA SOCIETY AND SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

In Symphony Hall tonight the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second of the series of three concerts which they are to give this winter, the work being Gabriel Pierne's "The Children's Crusade."

The concert will begin at 8 o'clock sharp, and the list of soloists is as follows: Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown, Edmond Clement, Claude Cunningham, Earl Cartwright, Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child, Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter.

GLOBE—TUESDAY
FEBRUARY 14, 1911.

The Cecilia society and the Symphony orchestra will have a full rehearsal under Max Fiedler of "The Children's Crusade" tomorrow night in Symphony hall. All the soloists will be present.

RECORD, TUESDAY
FEBRUARY 14, 1911

CECILIA SOCIETY AND SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

The Cecilia society and the Symphony orchestra will have a full rehearsal under Max Fiedler of "The Children's Crusade" tomorrow night in Symphony hall. All the soloists will be present.

[160]

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1

Pierne's "Children's Crusade" was here some time ago by the Cecilia Society and gained more favor than any novelty given in Boston in recent years. The performance of Tuesday night will be far more interesting since the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform the exceedingly intricate orchestral part, and the society of 175 voices will be assisted by a children's choir of 100, trained by Professor Hadley of Somerville.

Edward Clement, the principal soloist, was chief French tenor at the Metropolitan last season. He won an enviable reputation as an artist as well as a singer. Corine Rider-Kelsey, the leading American concert singer, and Mrs. Edith Chapman Gould will sing the chief female parts, Claude Cunningham will sing the bass part of the Old Sailor, and other soloists will be Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown, Mr. Earl Cartwright, Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child, Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter.

Ferruccio Busoni, the distinguished composer and pianist, will be represented on this week's program in both capacities, for he will be the soloist, playing the seldom-heard concerto C minor for pianoforte by Beethoven and his own suite for orchestra "Turandot" will have its first performance in Boston. The "Turandot" suite was played in New York last year by the Philharmonic Society with much success. The Beethoven concerto will come almost as a novelty for it has not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1888 when it was played by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. Mr. Fiedler has placed on this program Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." Taken all in all, the performance of this interesting work was the finest achievement of the orchestra last season when it was included in the twenty-third program. This year, as last, the solo violoncello will be played by Mr. Warnke and the solo viola by Mr. Ferir.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Ferruccio Busoni, the distinguished composer and pianist, will be represented on next week's program in both capacities, for he will play the seldom-heard concerto in C minor for piano by Beethoven, and his own suite for orchestra "Turandot" will have its first performance in Boston. The "Turandot" suite first performed in Berlin in 1904, was played in New York last year by the Philharmonic Society with much success. Beethoven's concerto has not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1888, when it was played by Mrs. Beach. Mr. Fiedler has placed on this program Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." The performance of this great work was perhaps the finest achievement of the orchestra last season. This year, as last, the solo violoncello will be played by Mr. Warnke and the solo viola by Mr. Ferir.

CORINNE RIDER-KELSEY
SOPRANO
PHONY-CECELIA

EDWARD CLEMENT
FRENCH TENOR
WITH CECELIA AND BOSTON OPERA

BOSTON SUNDAY POST
FEBRUARY 12, 1911

Cecilia and Symphony to Perform "The Children's Crusade"

The performance of Pierne's musical legend "The Children's Crusade," which will be given in Symphony Hall next Thursday evening, will be the second of the three concerts given by the combined forces of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Max Fiedler as conductor. The work is one of proven popularity here. With the new dispensation which has brought together the Symphony Orchestra and the Cecilia Society, the performance should be one of extraordinary merit.

In this performance Edmond Clement, the French lyric tenor, will make his first concert appearance here. He came to New York last year as the principal tenor of the French division of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and when the Metropolitan abandoned French opera for this season Clement returned to America for concert appearances and a few operatic performances.

The principal women singers will be Corinne Rider-Kelsey, foremost of American trained sopranos, and Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, who has already been heard here in Pierne's work. The basso, the Old Sailor, will be Claude Cunningham. The other solo singers will be Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown, Mr. Earl Cartwright, Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child, Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter. In addition to the regular chorus of 175 voices of the Cecilia Society, there will be a children's chorus of 100, which has been trained by Professor Hadley of Somerville, who is so successful in this sort of work. The full Symphony Orchestra will accompany.

Symphony

Ferruccio Busoni, the distinguished composer and pianist, will be represented on the programme of this week's pair of Symphony concerts in both capacities, for he will play the seldom-heard Concerto in C minor for pianoforte of Beethoven, and his own Suite for orchestra, "Turandot," will have its first performance in Boston. The "Turandot" Suite was played in New York last year by the Philharmonic Society with much success. The Beethoven Concerto will come almost as a novelty for it has not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1888, when it was played by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

Mr. Fiedler has placed on this programme Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," the performance of which was the finest achievement of the orchestra last season, when it was included in the 23d programme. This year, as last, the solo violoncello will be played by Mr. Warnke, and the solo viola by Mr. Perir.

ADVERTISER.
FEBRUARY 16, 191

MUSIC NOTES.

In Symphony Hall tonight the Cecilia society and the Symphony orchestra will give the second of the series of three concerts which they are to give this winter, the work being Pierne's "The Children's Crusade."

The Symphony orchestra is away the coming week on its fourth Southern trip. Concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn and the third and last concert of the season in Hartford Feb. 27. Mr. Warnke is to be the soloist in Philadelphia, Mr. Schroeder in Washington, and Mr. Busoni in the other cities.

SUNDAY GLOBE

"The Children's Crusade" by the Cecilia Society.

Gabriel Pierne's "The Children's Crusade," from the fantastic and exquisite prose romance of Marcel Schwob, will be performed by the Cecilia society on Thursday evening at Symphony hall. This will be the third concert under the existing alliance of the Cecilia and Symphony orchestra, and the common directorship of Mr Fiedler.

This work was produced in Paris in 1905, under the direction of Edward Colonne. It was performed by the Cecilia society for the first time in Boston, Feb 26, 1907.

A feature of the performance this week will be the first appearance in concert in this city of the distinguished French tenor, Edward Clement, about whom there is further mention in this paper in the announcements for the week at the opera.

M. Clement enjoys the rare trait of having attained to marked eminence in Paris, as a recitalist and singer of songs and choral works. There his prestige as a concert singer is quite as noteworthy as it is as a singing-actor on the stage of the Opera-Comique, which he has graced for a score of years.

He has already appeared in a program of songs in New York this season, and for the apt and expressive use of his voice and for the finesse of his diction andstyle.

The principal women singers will be Mrs Rider-Kelsey and Mrs Edith Chapman Goold. Mrs Kelsey has already been recognized in Boston as a concert singer of the first rank. She appeared in this city at a concert of the Cecilia society Dec 12, 1905, in the following works: Bruckner's "Grand Te Deum," Debussy's "Blessed Damozel," and Coleridge-Taylor's "Departure of Hiawatha," and at a concert of "The Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn society, Dec 25, 1907. Mrs Goold sang in Pierne's cantata at its first presentation here.

The other singers will be Claude Cunningham, to take the part of the Old Sailor, Mrs Frances Dunton Brown, Earl Cartwright, Mrs Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eston, Mrs Bertha Cushing Child and Mrs Emily Wentworth Carter.

As before, there will be a chorus of 100 children from the schools of Somerville, who have again been trained by Prof Hadley. The full symphony orchestra will be employed. The concert will begin at 8.

Busoni This Week's Symphony Soloist.

Ferruccio Busoni, the distinguished composer and pianist, will be represented on this week's Boston Symphony program in both capacities, for he will be the soloist, playing the seldom-heard concerto in C minor for piano by Beethoven, and his own suite for orchestra, "Turandot," will have its first performance in Boston.

The suite was played in New York last year by the Philharmonic society with much success. The Beethoven concerto will come almost as a novelty for it has not been heard at a Symphony concert since 1888, when it was played by Mrs H. H. A. Beach.

Mr Fiedler has placed on this program Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote." This year, as last, the solo 'cello will be played by Mr Warnke and the solo viola by Mr Ferir. The prelude to "Lohengrin" will open the concert.

BOSTON JOURNAL

FEBRUARY 17, 1911.

SOMERVILLE PUPILS SING WITH CECILIA

Delightful Performance of "The Children's Crusade" Is Given.

Somerville school children were a prominent factor in the beautiful performance of Gabriel Pierne's musical legend. "The Children's Crusade," at Symphony Hall last night. It is not often that children have the opportunity to appear in public in the company of such noted organizations as the Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra. But these Somerville choristers, mostly girls, enjoyed that honor last night and acquitted themselves handsomely.

The legend is one of the most touching works in the concert catalogue. It is the story Marcel Schwob has based on the pathetic uprising of children in the thirteenth century to accomplish the task that the earlier and elder crusaders had attempted with failure. Pierne has set the story to sympathetic music and last night this same spirit of tender, pious sympathy pervaded the performance. The simple, characteristic chorals of the children are naturally leading features of the legend. Simple as they are they require considerable musical and emotional ability and these requirements were met commendably last night by the juvenile chorus from the Somerville schools.

The Cecilia Society and the Symphony Orchestra also had the assistance of Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown, Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham, who were soloists, and Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child and Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter, who represented the four women that encourage the young crusaders. The singing of Mrs. Rider-Kelsey and of Mr. Clement was especially remarkable for its grace and unaffectedness. Malcolm Lang was the organist. Max Fiedler conducted in his most successful manner.

An audience that filled nearly every seat in the hall found the performance delightful. The applause only partly expressed its deep-felt appreciation. Many remained for a moment to applaud S. Henry Hadley, who trained the children.

THE BOSTON HERALD, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1911.

PIERNE'S MUSICAL STORY PERFORMED

Cecilia Society and Symphony Orchestra Unite in "Children's Crusade."

CHORUS OF SCHOOL PUPILS

Mmes. Rider-Kelsey, Goold and Brown and Messrs. Clement and Cunningham Soloists.

By PHILIP HALE.

Gabriel Pierne's "Children's Crusade" was performed last night in Symphony Hall at the second concert of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra. The solo singers were Mmes. Rider-Kelsey, Chapman Goold and Dunton Brown and Messrs. Edmond Clement and Claude Cunningham. The music of the Four Women was sung by Mrs. Rice, Miss Eaton, Mrs. Child and Mrs. Carter. There was a chorus of children from the schools of Somerville under the training of S. Henry Hadley. Malcolm Lang was the organist. The performance was under the direction of Mr. Fiedler.

Pierne's dramatic legend undoubtedly owes its popularity to the pathos of the subject. The crusading children are not merely described; they are before the audience; they sing their simple, naive songs of faith, hope, trust, and also terror. The best of Pierne's music is given to these children. In any adequate performance the success of the work will be due to their voices. When they are not singing, the interest flags as a rule. There are some fine orchestral pages, but the music given to the Narrator is ineffective, at times tedious, even when sung by a tenor like Mr. Clement, and the children, Alain and Allys, in the first part of the legend are sadly sophisticated so far as their musical expression goes. This first section, by the way, is the weakest portion of the work. There is little true dramatic contrast between the children aroused by the voices and the parents that would hold them back from the mad adventure. Mrs. Kelsey and Mrs. Goold made much of the music allotted to them. This cannot be said of the female quartet, for the supernatural exhortation was sung with quavering voices as though the heavenly counsellors were themselves in doubt as to the wisdom of their exhortation.

The remaining sections have much more character. The song of the children as they journey on the highway is charming, and the whole scene, with its solos for oboe, flute and violin, is the most musical and poetic of the work. These solos were admirably played. Mr. Longy, for example, surpassed even himself. It was a pity that the ending was marred by an unaccountable accident, but the effect of the whole was not disturbed.

Just as Pierne failed to express the supernatural in the opening of his legend, so his imagination deserted him when he was called on to set music to the story of the star that followed the Saviour and fell from heaven and was drowned in the sea when the Saviour died. The storm scene is broadly pictorial and the introduction of the "De profundis libera nos" is impressive, but the final choral writing is merely scholastic and perfunctory—as are certain choruses that precede.

The performance on the whole was a very good one. Mrs. Rider Kelsey sang with purity of tone and true expression. She often gave significance to that which was inherently insignificant by the beauty of her voice and art. Mrs. Goold, who has been heard here before in this legend, sang sympathetically. Mr. Clement was heard here for the first time in concert. He sang in English, and his distinct enunciation in a language foreign to him might well be a lesson to even experienced singers trained in English from their youth up. The music of the Narrator is unthankful, and what dramatic force it had last evening was imparted to it by the singer. Unfortunately for the full display of Mr. Clement's art and sentiment, there are no truly lyrical passages in the part. Mr. Cunningham also had a thankless task.

Mr. Hadley is to be congratulated heartily on the results obtained by the children under his training. The Cecilia chorus sang with more precise attack and greater variety of expression than at the first concert. The orchestra at times needlessly overpowered the voices, but on the whole its performance was a feature of the concert. There was a large and appreciative audience.

mediate measures between the strophes of the melody by ineffable beauty of tonal diminution—Mr. Proctor procured another effect that was far removed from that of a commonplace interlude, of measures intended only to give the singer breath. The first movement was played in the heroic manner. In the Funeral Maroh there was no suggestion of boisterous and spectacular lamentation, and the famous air of the trio was sung with admirable simplicity. The Finale, one of the most wonderful pages in the literature of the piano, was maintained "sotto voce" throughout, and there was the thought of De Quincey's wind "that might have swept the fields of mortality for a thousand centuries." We have all heard this Finale when it might have been taken for a tone-picture of a storm at sea. All in all, this performance of the sonata was of a very high order.

The Rhapsody by Brahms might have been played in a more demoniacal spirit. There was a brilliant performance of Sgambati's Toccata and the arrangement of Strauss's waltz. The two pieces by Debussy, and they were among the best of his compositions for the piano, were treated in an exquisitely impressionistic manner. Mr. Proctor added a little known Rigaudon by MacDowell to the program in answer to the demand of an audience which, deeply interested throughout, showed frequently its appreciation.

Mr. Proctor has now a style that is his own. Its chief qualities are lucidity, proportion and what might be called poetic sanity. It is free from exaggeration and sentimentalism. The intelligence displayed is not merely pedagogic. There is warmth, there is elasticity, and, when there is a call for it, there is passion. His performance is characterized by purity of taste. And Mr. Proctor can be brilliant when a composer writes brilliantly. Brilliance is as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals when there is no thought behind it, when there is no controlling mind; and in these days when technic is made easy, even for the rich, it is so easy to be brilliant—and nothing else!

MONITOR, BOSTON,

FEBRUARY 17, 1911.

"CHILDREN'S CRUSADE."

Listeners must take Pierne differently from a cantata writer of the old school, just as they must take Debussy differently from an opera maker whose methods are those of former days, or are those of former days with only mechanical, non-essential changes. Study Pierne and Debussy for the characteristic which differentiates them from their predecessors, and even from their contemporaries in other countries than France. The difference, as we might expect, is a general artistic one and not simply a musical one.

Composers have always written as though there was a certain inviolable law of contrast which must be observed to make music effective; and this law, they imagined, applied to music in common with all other arts. Now Pierne and Debussy have wholly discarded the idea of systematic emotional contrast. They have striven to bring all their expression to a sustained level, and in doing so they have given their work a quality which analysts like to describe as atmospheric.

Howsoever we denote the Pierne and Debussy musical effect, it is the significant triumph of the composing art in the present generation. It may or may not be an abiding success, but it is a leaping clear of a restriction, it is setting at naught a very old and persistent formula.

A review of the Cecelia and Symphony presentation of "The Children's Crusade" can not be a distribution of especial solo and choral honors, as a review of many a cantata of the old school may be; for to give distinction to one or another part of the performance would be to admit that either Pierne failed in his purpose, or that Mr. Fiedler and his singers and players failed to grasp it. All did well—the Cecelia men and women, the Somerville school children, the Symphony artists, Mrs. Rider-Kelsey, Mr. Clement and all the other soloists—or else nobody did well. Did any one go to the concert prepared to hear the orchestral foundations of the earth tremble under the march of the crusading children of Flanders? Did any one expect, as the outcome of the exploit, that Mr. Hadley's 150 scholars would be engulfed in a storm of fiddlers and trombones?

How remotely the music pictured the program, to those who looked for the usual cantata descriptions! There was not an extraordinary difference in tone volume between the pastoral scene where the children three were discovered walking in the spring sun and the tornado and shipwrecks on the Mediterranean which terminated the adventure. More than that, there was not enough solo distinction in the characters to make it worth while mentioning any one of the assisting artists before another.

GLOBE—FRIDAY FEBRUARY 17, 1911

CHILDREN'S CRUSADE.

Given by the Cecilia and Symphony Orchestra.

M Clement, Mmes Rider-Kelsey and Goold Are Soloists.

Gabriel Pierne's musical legend, "The Children's Crusade," was performed at Symphony hall last night by the Cecilia society and the Boston Symphony orchestra. Max Fiedler conducted.

These were the soloists: Alain, Mrs Corinne Rider-Kelsey; Allys, Mrs Edith Chapman Goold; the narrator, Edmond Clement; an old sailor and the voice from on high, Claude Cunningham; a mother, Mrs Frances Dunton Brown; the voices of the four women, Mrs Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura F. Eaton, Mrs Bertha Cushing Child and Mrs Emily Wentworth Carter.

There was a chorus of children from the schools of Somerville which had been trained by S. Henry Hadley. Malcolm Lang was the organist.

The Cecilia sang Pierne's work four years ago this month for the first time in Boston. The performance last night was the second. The features were the singing of Mr Clement, Mrs Rider-Kelsey and Mrs Goold and of the chorus of children.

Pierne's music does not call for extensive comment at this time. Judgment of this music must first look to the text adapted from the imaginative and exquisite prose legend of Marcel Schwob, and translated into English by Henry G. Chapman.

The story is one both of historical fact and fancy, light, picturesque and deeply piteous by turn. The dramatic motive lies in the pretty, but disastrous fanaticism which spread rampant among these babes, and impelled them to undertake the impossible journey to the holy land for the equally chimerical task of regaining the savior's tomb, only to perish miserably by the way, or to be sold into horrible slavery.

Here is no demand for music of the conflict of human passion, or of the mature strength of religious belief. It has to do with the caprice and the pathos of childhood.

Pierne has attempted to characterize the pretty fancy of the children by use of a quaint and naive theme, which is not without effect, but tends toward monotony by repetition. It is principally in the music of the children, however, the strength and vitality of the work lies.

The three principal solo voices are given more of semideclamation than of melody. Much of it is without distinction and neither demands emotional ability of the singer nor serves to reveal it.

The tenor has a fine lyric passage in "The Sea." These pages, both for the voice and the orchestra, are among the best in the work. Pierne saw the picture of the expanse of water and felt the broad swell of its billows. His music here evinces superb imagination.

The performance of this as of other portions of the work was disappointing because of rigid and unsympathetic conducting. The slow orchestral introduction was taken too fast, the phrases were abrupt and were lacking in breadth. There was no suggestion of the ponderousness, vastness or quietude of the deep. When the solo voice began, the possibilities of the repeated figure, which suggests graphically the rocking of the waves, were wholly ignored. It was conducting devoid of plasticity or illusion.

The Cecilia cannot depend upon notable soloists to make its concerts succeed. The whole ensemble last night, except the singing of the children, indicated the lack of thorough preparation upon the part of both chorus and orchestra. Furthermore, it suggested that the conductor was trying to bring the performance through by heroic compulsion and to produce the notes irrespective of tempi, nuance or emotional value.

Mrs Rider-Kelsey and Mrs Goold sang their music with surety and with marked beauty of tone, and Mr Cunningham delivered well the fisherman's air, a sincere and expressive piece of writing.

Mr Clement had but little opportunity to display the delicacy and finesse of his art, but he revealed his mastery of song. His English diction was exceedingly praiseworthy.

The fresh young voices of the children were a delight. Their enunciation was extraordinarily clear. It set their seniors a wholesome lesson. They made their difficult entrances correctly. Symphony hall was filled and there was applause at intervals during the performance and at its close.

POST, FRIDAY,

FEBRUARY 17 1911

"CHILDREN'S CRUSADE" AT SYMPHONY HALL

The "Chidren's Crusade" has become popular in this city, and with reason. Other composers have set themselves as attractive tasks, but Pierne has set the beautiful tale outlined by Marcel Schwob with singularly fortunate effect.

The performance was a considerable improvement upon that of Bantock's "Omar Khayyam" earlier in the season. The soloists were without exception efficient. Mrs. Rider Kelsey is an excellent singer. Mrs Goold was fortunate in her delivery of the lines of Allys. Mr. Clement, the Narrator, sang with authority and the most praiseworthy musicianship. There was still the evidence of a need of more rehearsals, of the understanding which should be not comparative, but absolute, between orchestra and chorus, but the singing of the chorus was often brilliant. The school children, trained by Mr. Hadley, gave an excellent performance, and certain passages were played by the orchestra with a finish vitality rare for such occasions. There was a large and applausive audience.

[161]

RIDAY
17, 1911

USADE.

ilia and estra.

Kelsey and
s.

gend, "The erformed at the Cecilia mphony or-cted.
in, Mrs Co-
Mrs Edith r, Edmond
the voice ngham; a Brown;
Mrs Alice ton, Mrs rs Emily

ren from hich had
ey. Mal-

ork four rst time st night vere the ler-Kel-horus of for exdgment

e text nd ex-Schwob,
Henry

storical and ramatic sastrous rampant ed them rney to merical tomb,
e way,
very of the
of the ller. It and the ustere ern by which toward princidren, lity of es are than as ctions otion to ng e Pi d music other pointthetic ntro-rases adth, pon-

f the the which was illunotasuc-

ght,
ren,
awa-
and sted ring roic notes emo-sang with

Sunn's
e of nity of ed-

ren ong ion ces ood
's
-
w econg ion ces ood
's
-

Y,

911

ADE" HALL has become son" reason.
themselves
o has set Marcel" fortunate

siderable Santoor's
he season.
exception an excel-fortunate
of Allys. sing with seworthy ill the earsals.
ould be between singing
The ladies,
and the rare large a

GAZETTE, FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 19

'CHILDRENS' CRUSADE'

By EDITH BURNHAM.

"The Children's Crusade," Gabriel Pierne's music legend, was the work presented last evening by the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Fiedler as conductor, at this its second concert of the season. The soloists were: Mme. Rider-Kelsey and Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown, sopranos; Mr. Edmond Clement, tenor; Mr. Claude Cunningham, bass. A quartet, Mrs. Alice Bates Rice, Miss Laura E. Eaton, sopranos, and Mrs. Bertha Cushing Child and Mrs. Emily Wentworth Carter, altos, sang the music of the "Four Women."

A pretty legend, full of poetry, sentiment and spiritual beauty, it lends itself freely to musical interpretation. The legend of how these children of the Crusade, hearing voices from heaven telling them to seek the Christ, followed the voices with a child's trust and at last came into the wonderful light of his presence, is based on several historical legends; but interwoven in it are touches of imaginative poetry, such as that of the children, when coming to the Sea, and expecting it to part for them, instead were shown all its wondrous beauties by the Old Sailor and heard from his lips the story of how the star which gleamed over the place of Christ's birth, when he was nailed to the Cross changed from its celestial blue to a deep blood red, and when Christ died, tears of blood fell from the star and it was drowned in the sea.

The music of Part 1 is not so highly descriptive as of the later parts. It is not till Part 2, the scene on a broad highroad, when the chilren are marching and singing on their journey, that the composer thoroughly expresses the symbolism. Here the prelude is full of flowering beauty, the solo violin—last night played by Mr. Witek, weaving it into garlands which the children are to lay before the Christ. The march music, with its odd alternate 3-4 and 2-4 time, has a joyous uplift in it. But most descriptive is the sea music, as with moaning and undulations it laves the shore and fills with awe and wonder the listening ear, while delicate strains picture the spangled beauty of the shore and the glistening strand. The orchestra played this music with a view to all its shades and grades of beauty, as they did also the tremendousness of the storm music of the concluding part.

Mme. Kelsey, singing Alain, the blind child, who timidly and falteringly following his sister and mates in the search of the Christ, yet was the first to see Him, sang with effectiveness the plaintive words of the trusting child. In its lower register Mme. Kelsey's voice is expressive and well colored. It was somewhat less satisfying in the upper register.

Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold, singing Allys, gave a full, free utterance to her music which was pleasant to hear. Breadth of tone characterized most of her singing.

Mr. Clement, as the Narrator, gave to his role the distinction of finish, interpretation, mold and shading. He is an artist of exceedingly fine and delicate perception, and his voice is responsive to the finest of these perceptions.

Mr. Cunningham sang the Sailor's story.

The children's choruses, trained by Mr. S. Henry Hadley, were a delight in freshness and spontaneity, and were too accurate in tonality and musical text.

The chorus itself sang with fine tone quality, but inflexibility and restrained expression characterized its work as a whole.

HERALD, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1911.

BOSTON HEARS BUSONI'S MUSIC

Part of a Too Long Program of 16th Rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra.

PIANIST IS THE SOLOIST

Plays Extracts from Suite from the Music to Gozzi's "Turandot."

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 16th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler conducted. Mr. Busoni was the pianist. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Lohengrin".....Wagner
"Don Quixote": Fantastic Variations..... Strauss
Concerto No. 3, C minor, for piano.....Beethoven
Extracts from the Suite from the music to Gozzi's "Turandot".....Busoni

Only four of the eight movements from Busoni's suite was played, and as the concert was too long. The Prelude to "Lohengrin," beautiful as it is, might well have been omitted.

Busoni's music was played for the first time in Boston, and it would only have been fair to him if the whole suite, with its contrasts, had been heard. As it was, marches succeeded each other, and as all the music was necessarily exotic in character, the monotony of the march movement was without relief. The "Nocturnal Waltz," "Dance and Song," "In the Women's Apartments" and the march, "Altoum," were not played.

This music was written by Mr. Busoni for Gozzi's dramatic fable "Turandot," known to some through Schiller's version, a "tragi-comic fairy tale."

The story is of a beautiful and haughty princess in China, who did not wish to wed, and so her suitors were given three riddles to guess. Many thus lost their heads, but at last the Oedipus appeared. Mr. Busoni has said that the themes of his score are borrowed from Oriental melodies, and he therefore believes that he has improved upon "conventional theatrical orientalism."

Music that is composed for the theatre often loses half its effect when played in a concert hall. This is true even of Bizet's suites taken from the music to "L'Arlesienne" and of Faure's suite, derived from his music to "Pelleas and Melisande." It may be said of Busoni's music, heard yesterday, that it is distinguished chiefly by its entertaining instrumentation and its oriental atmosphere. This music might justly be called amusing. It was a mistake to produce it when "Don Quixote," a series of variations, was played at the same concert; but the composer was present as the soloist and the opportunity to pay him a compliment was therefore not neglected. It might be well before the season closes to perform the whole suite. Yesterday Mr. Busoni was called out after the "Turkish finale" and warmly applauded.

He had already given pleasure by his performance of Beethoven's concerto in C minor, which had not been played here for many years in any important concert. The concerto is a favorite with [illegible] pianists, possibly on account of the finale, which is delightful from beginning to end as an example of Beethoven in light and playful mood, showing a gaiety that is at once contagious. Mr. Busoni's performance of the first two movements was characterized by fluency, a fine sense of proportion and a faultless and highly polished mechanism rather than by warmth and spontaneity. Yet it should be remembered that only the middle movement calls for any marked expression of sentiment, and the sentiment of this Largo is contemplative, not deeply emotional or passionate.

The performance on the whole was a fine exhibition of highly developed and well controlled technic. Yet there is this to be said: Mr. Busoni did not attempt to modernize the music in any manner. He let it speak in its own way, with its archaisms, its old formulas. When the language of Mozart was heard in Beethoven's music; the pianist was Mozartian in the interpretation. There are a few passages in the concerto that hint at the greater Beethoven, as in the coda of the first movement and in the still-effective and at that time surprising enharmonic change in the finale. These passages were brought out by Mr. Busoni unostentatiously, but in memorable fashion. The most salient feature of his performance was the brilliance of the last movement.

It was a great pleasure to hear "Don Quixote" again, for it contains some of Strauss's noblest and inspired music. There are few more eloquent pages than those in which Don Quixote is supposed to reason concerning the ideal and those that portray his death. These pages are enough to put Strauss with the immortals. Yet there are some who ignore this music and dilate on the "absurdity" of imitating sheep and employing a wind machine. They seek for eccentricity and that which is bizarre and have no ears for the strains of solemn and pathetic beauty.

The performance was on the whole one of the most noteworthy of the season. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler was occasionally didactic in his interpretation, as though he wished to explain this or that variation to the audience, but in view of the general and great merit of the performance this objection might well be considered hypercritical.

Mr. Warnke's interpretation of the violoncello part was masterly in every way. The technical difficulties were surmounted with ease; the tone was varied and beautiful; the different sentiments were fitly expressed, and the music of the death scene was played with true emotion. Mr. Ferir in tone and interpretation stood side by side with Mr. Warnke, and the orchestra played magnificently.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of the rehearsal and concert March 3 and 4 will be as follows: Mandl, Overture to a Gascon Comedy (first time here); Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuomela" (first time here); Berlioz, "Childe Harold" Symphony; Weber, overture to "Euryanthe." Mme. Kirkby Lunn will sing an aria and a group of songs.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN-
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1911.

The Symphony Orchestra will be away the coming week on its fourth Southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn and the third and last concert of the season in Hartford on Monday evening, the 27th. The interesting feature of the trip will be the performance of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven in Baltimore with the assistance of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, and a quartet consisting of Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso. This work was give a year ago this month in Baltimore with such success that there was a decided demand for its repetition this season. Mr. Warnke is to be the soloist in Philadelphia, Mr. Schroeder in Washington and Ferruccio Busoni in the other cities.

ADVERTISER, [illegible] MORNING, FEBRUARY 17, 1911.

"CHILDREN'S CRUSADE" SPLENDIDLY GIVEN

CECILIA SOCIETY AIDED BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Pierne's Work Is a Strong Addition to Modern Repertoire and Will Bear Repeating.

By Louis C. Elson.

Just as austerity and bitterness is D'Indy's chief musical asset, innocent naivete and simplicity is the principal stock in trade of Pierne. Yet with a sophisticated simplicity that often becomes affectation, there is much that is really new in his work and it sometimes strikes that individual note, which all modern composers are striving and straining for, and which is held to be the ear-mark of genius, and there is a stupendous amount of modulation in the accompaniments.

It was a very silly event, the Crusade of the Children in the Middle Ages, but it was poetic enough to make a very good story and to inspire good musical treatment. Nor must the reader think, because Pierne sometimes seeks childish simplicity, that his score is simple. As above said, there are bold and difficult modulations in profusion in its pages and in the storm scene there are some very broad and heavily-scored orchestral effects.

The work succeeded in France so well that a juvenile appendix was made, which Boston narrowly escaped from,—"Children at Bethlehem",—in which the shepherds of the night of the Nativity are conveniently turned into children, and even the ass in the stable near the Savior's manger, vocalizes in high masculine register; the first time in history that an ass has been a tenor, although perhaps not the first time that a tenor has been an ass.

Pierne was pupil of Massenet and of Cesar Franck. From the first he seems to have imbibed a sensuous and melodic style, and from the latter solid counterpoint and a certain dignity of utterance. Remembering the details of the 13th century mania, the children wandering aimlessly to and fro, their expectation of a repetition of the Red Sea miracle to enable them to cross the Mediterranean, the furnishing of ships by awe-struck cities, the shipwreck of some of these, etc., etc., one can readily see that there are abundant opportunities for musical contrasts here afforded. The sweet choruses of the children, the fury of the storm, the chorus of the sailors, the pleading of forsaken parents, would certainly supply all that any reasonable musical librettist could demand, and the forlorn and foolish return of the survivors, although historic, can be (and is) conveniently cut out, and replaced by triumph.

The work is in four parts: Part I pictures the inception of the crusade and the setting out; Part 2 pictures the journey; Part 3, the arrival at and the voyage on the sea; Part 4, the storm at sea and the Savior coming to the aid of the pilgrims.

Part 1 is decidedly modern in its chromatics and in the adult choruses of paternal and maternal character. It is no exaggeration to say that this and the fourth part came almost as a revelation last night, in spite of the fact that we had heard the work four years ago. It needed the Symphony orchestra to bring out the instrumental beauties in these portions of the work, even if the adult choruses were no better than in the excellent old days.

The two chief female parts are those of Alain, a blind boy who hopes to receive his sight in Jerusalem, and his sister Allys, who leads him on his quest. Both of these are sopranos. As alto voices are somewhat rare in France, Pierne does not demand such a soloist in this work. Mrs. Edith Chapman Goold sang exceedingly well in the part of Allys, but Mrs. Corinne Rider-Kelsey occasionally showed effort in the role of Alain. There is also another soprano part, that of the mother, which consists of a single number,—"And at Night I Used to Wake,"—which was sung by Mrs. Frances Dunton Brown.

Pierne naturally calls for a chorus of children in this work, but permits it to be replaced, when necessary, by female chorus. Last night there was an excellently trained children's chorus, and the incisive treble voices were very effective in the ensembles, contrasting finely with the adult choruses and giving a realism to the work which a female chorus could not have done. The mediaeval march-tune of the second part, with its constant alternation of 3-4 and 2-4 rhythms, gave the finest display of the juvenile voices, and this was the strongest memory that we carried away from the performance, but in every detail the children's work was sure and effective. It was a chorus of Somerville school children and their training reflected great credit on Mr. S. Henry Hadley, who had taught them.

The "halleliujahs" of the children at the very end were full of charm. Pierne does not follow history here,—it would have been a very weak anti-climax to have pictured the weary stragglers returning home,—but the work ends in an exaltation of celestial triumph. In spite of this grandiose ending Part II is to us the most successful portion of the cantata. Interwoven with the mediaeval march, there is a naively simple bit of three-part harmony (chorus) which pictures the children weaving garlands of flowers on their way, and here there is a real and effective simplicity that is altogether charming. The changes of rhythm and the quaint modulations here were bravely conquered and were all taken with surety, while the obbligato effects of violin, oboe and flute were notable instrumental touches. All in all, the children's chorus was the most remarkable feature of last night's performance.

In Part 3 there is another bit of musical mediaevalism in an old "Noel," in which the children's voices contrasted well with the chorus of adults, but Part 3 seemed somewhat tame coming after the really inspired Part 2, yet it has some beautiful portions too.

We have dwelt so much upon the children's choruses that we are doing injustice to the vocal work of the adult choristers. In Part I the mixed choruses of parental solicitude contrasted well with the treble work. The male choruses of sailors were also spiritedly interpreted, but they were not so original in their ideas as the choruses described above. Part I seemed to us altogether the most artificial portion of the work.

In the choruses the lack of poetic words did not stand out glaringly, but in some of the solos the unpoetic translation was sometimes a very noticeable defect. Mr. Henry G. Chapman has done much better work than this in other volumes. The song about the origin of the starfish is not a very valuable contribution to the science of ichthyology, but it was well sung by Mr. Claude Cunningham. The best part of the marine pictures, in spite of the excitement of the storm, was the portrayal of evening at sea, with its long diminuendo suggestive of the ships sailing away into the hazy distance.

The orchestra, however, made much of the storm-picture and much better than the conventional tempest was the contrast brought out in the appearance of the Savior. The solos, too, at this part, where Alain has his sight restored, were effective in a high degree. The unaccompanied (seraphic) female chorus had some difficult modulations which were finely interpreted, and the gradual working-up from the "De Profundis" to the final shouts of triumph made a climax that was as powerful as any we have recently heard.

The chief male solo part has not yet been spoken of. The story is welded in the old sacred style by a "narrator," somewhat like the "evangelist" in Bach's Passion music. This part was taken by the eminent French tenor, M. Edmond Clement, who had appeared the preceding night in Massenet's "Manon" at the Boston opera house. This gentleman is evidently both versatile and musical. He sang in English with an enunciation that was uncannily clear and precise.

M. Clement's work was artistic throughout. We ought to speak an especial word of the duet work of Mmes. Goold and Rider-Kelsey. Their first duet, culminating in chorus work and interwining with it, was very effective. The odd accompaniment with quaint pizzicato effects added much here. The concerted effects of the female solo quartette, Mmes. Rice, Child, Carter and Miss Eaton, also deserve commendation for good ensemble.

In summing up we can say that Pierne's "Children's Crusade" is a strong addition to the modern repertoire. It is unequal, and both the first and third parts could be condensed to advantage. It was well worth while doing it again, for the previous performance, under Mr. Lang, although vocally excellent, did not have anything like the orchestral support that was present last night. The new partnership of Cecilia and Symphony orchestra is working splendidly, and is likely to give Boston some performances such as it has never had before. We have had exquisite choral performances under Mr. Lang, with the Cecilia society, in the past, but Mr. Fiedler not only has a much finer orchestra under his control than Mr. Lang ever possessed, but he is remarkably successful in conducting, and especially with orchestral forces. His conducting last night had very much to do with the success of the poetic and brilliant French work. Therefore the motto of the newly wedded organizations may well be—"Vivat, Crescat, Floreat!"

RECORD, FRIDAY
FEBRUARY 17, 1911.

'CHILDREN'S CRUSADE' WELL GIVEN

From Louis C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser

It was a very silly event, the Crusade of the Children in the Middle Ages, but it was poetic enough to make a very good story and to inspire good musical treatment.

The chief male solo part has not yet been spoken of. The story is welded in the old sacred style by a "narrator," somewhat like the "evangelist" in Bach's Passion music. This part was taken by the eminent French tenor, M. Edmond Clement, who had appeared the preceding night in Massenet's "Manon" at the Boston opera house. This gentleman is evidently both versatile and musical. He sang in English with an enunciation that was uncannily clear and precise.

M. Clement's work was artistic throughout. We ought to speak an especial word of the duet work of Mmes. Goold and Rider-Kelsey. Their first duet, culminating in chorus work and interwining with it, was very effective. The odd accompaniment with quaint pizzicato effects added much here. The concerted effects of the female solo quartette, Mmes. Rice, Child, Carter and Miss Eaton, also deserve commendation for good ensemble.

In summing up we can say that Pierne's "Children's Crusade" is a strong addition to the modern repertoire. It is unequal, and both the first and third parts could be condensed to advantage. It was well worth while doing it again, for the previous performance, under Mr. Lang, although vocally excellent, did not have anything like the orchestral support that was present last night. The new partnership of Cecilia and Symphony orchestra is working splendidly, and is likely to give Boston some performances such as it has never had before. We have had exquisite choral performances under Mr. Lang, with the Cecilia society, in the past, but Mr. Fiedler not only has a much finer orchestra under his control than Mr. Lang ever possessed, but he is remarkably successful in conducting, and especially with orchestral forces. His conducting last night had very much to do with the success of the poetic and brilliant French work. Therefore the motto of the newly wedded organizations may well be—"Vivat, Crescat, Floreat!"

[162]

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE CECILIA AND THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Second Concert in Which Their Association Bears Excellent Fruits—"The Children's Crusade" Sung Again in Sensitive Performance—The Beauty and the Piteousness of the Singular Music—Mr. Proctor's Concert — English and Operatic Texts Again—News of the Opera Houses —An Interesting Fragment from Chabrier

IN the performance of "The Children's Crusade," last night, the association of the Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra brought forth fruits meet from such co-working. The orchestra, reduced in numbers but still sufficient for the requirements of the music, and better ordered in force of tone, did not overwhelm the choir, as it tended to do at the first joint concert. The choir itself was more secure in its share of "The Children's Crusade" than it was in its parts in "Omar Khayyam," though here and there a hesitating attack or a wavering phrase suggested the advantage of more and stricter rehearsal. Mr. Fiedler has evidently discovered that a choir like the Cecilia is not a body of practised experts like the Symphony Orchestra, and he paid more heed last night to the guiding of it and to the fusion of its voices with the voices of the band.

The conducting of such choral societies is, after all, a kind of specialization; Mr. Fiedler is new to it; he has much and other work to do; and perhaps the wonder is that he accomplished as much toward balanced and expressive performance as he did yesterday. Romantic music, however, usually stimulates him and the music of "The Children's Crusade" is romantic. The children's voices count for much in it; their singing, their presence even, give the music and the narrative much of its interest, singularity and touching appeal. They were numerous last night and the young girls with their be-ribboned heads were an unusual and pleasant sight to see between the familiar ranks of the Cecilia and the orchestra. They came from the Somerville schools; Mr. S. Henry Hadley had trained them to an admirable ease in their music and a surprising feeling for it. And he had done this without losing the essential quality that Pierné asks of the children's parts in his legend—the slightly monotonous and sexless timbre of childish voices and the queer wistfulness that to sensitive adult ears is in them.

The association of the orchestra and the choir is again blessed in their ability, with their joint resources and prestige, to summon assisting singers of rank and fitness. "The Children's Crusade" requires three such, and they were well chosen last night—Mr. Clément for the music of the Narrator, and Mrs. Rider-Kelsey and Mrs. Goold for the music of the two individualized children, which they have often sung together. For the secondary parts of the Mother and the Sailor, Mrs. Dunton-Brown and Mr. Cunningham were as efficient, and the quality of the four women's voices in the call from heaven and in the distant song of the marching children was touching to hear, though they might have been secured with their music and with each other. Mr. Clément sang in English intelligibly and expressively, as the way is with singers who, like him, have mastered the art of diction in their own language. His voice was in far better condition than it was on Wednesday night at the Opera House, and he seemed to sing the better for his stimulating surroundings. His tones were steady, they were beautifully rounded; they seemed to flow from phrase to phrase, and his singing of the apostrophe to the sea was a little masterpiece of proportioned and mounting musical design and emotional and pictorial expression. His intelligence, his poise, his aristocratic ways and standards in all that he does make his singing a strange and intoxicating pleasure after the persistent commonness of Italian song with which this town has been surfeited. Mr. Clément sings not only with the acquired artistry of the voice, but also with the artistry that is born of a finely tempered mind and spirit. For his companions, Mrs. Goold's high, clear, light voice has exactly the timbre that Pierné's music for the child, Allys, requires. It gives it emotional quality, but not the quality of mature or sexed emotion. She sings with a child's mind and feeling. Mrs. Kelsey is more the expert and admirable concert-singer, lending the beauty of her voice, her skill in song and her sense of imaginative expression to the music of the blind child, Alain. He is the rhapsodist of the piteous little flock; and rhapsodists know no age. His visions were in Mrs. Kelsey's tones, so finely spun in their upper range, so full and even in their lower. There was, of the two women and indeed of the other solo singers, no more to ask.

It is hard to appraise Pierné's music. There is no need, perhaps, to appraise it. Never was writer of choral music more fortunate in the choice of his subject, in the mood and the quality of his text. A "musical legend," Pierné and his collaborator Schwob call their re-telling of the half-historical, half-pictoral tale of the children who, under call of voices earthy or mystic, set forth to the redemption of the Holy Sepulchre, of their faring along the highways till they came to the sea, of the ships that swallowed them; of the merciful waters that in storm took them. Or else the slave-markets and the close-barred windows of Moorish harems held them. Pierné and Schwob have cast aside all the miserable deception that sent the children a-crusading, all the vile trickery, sordid trafficking, and adult cruelties that beset them, all the miseries and tortures of the end. Out of chronicle and legend, they have distilled and sublimated the beauty and the fragrance, the wistfulness and the piteousness of the tale. Sometimes they write their text and music as with the minds and the hearts of children. Sometimes they hear and see the childish troop with adult but understanding and sympathizing eyes. In the music is the beauty of the delusion to the children that cherished it, and the pathos of it to us that know and pity. In the music is the picture of the young-eyed, eager host, streaming between the spring fields, finding a fancy in every flower of the meadows, a heavenly voice in every rustle of the spring breeze in the spring leafage. They come to the sea and in the music are the infinite wonder and magic of it to sensitive childish imaginations. The sea-folk watch and marvel, and they tell the children, for crown of all the fancies, how the star-fish are but the stars that fell into the sea in grief for their crucified Lord. The storm breaks upon the fleet and out of its blackness, the heavens, breaking too, take the children into their light.

Through all this text and music, Schwob and Pierné keep the searching piteousness of the tale—the piteousness of innocence enraptured and deluded, the piteousness of childhood so trusting, so helpless, so disillusioned until Heaven comforted them. To hear is to feel until the listener cares not for the details of the music or the performance that have wrought the emotion, hardly heeds them, weighs not for a moment their relative worth. They bring the answering, the possessing emotion and they need do no more. What matter if the mere adults are poorly characterized. And in the telling of the tale, text, music, the orchestra too last night, draw and color and animate the pictures of the childish troop streaming between the fields in the springtime and rapt between the soft blues of skies and waters at the myriad marvels of the sea. The loveliness of the images effaces every other impression. In them are the poetry and the pathos of sensitive and imaginative childhood; around them is the glamour with which middle age would wrap them. Again there is no thought of the musical means, and no regret even for something that barely escapes a commonplace choral apotheosis. Pierné has written very lovely, very piteous music, and there was no other to write of the crusade of the children.

H. T. P.

BOSTON JOURNAL
FEBRUARY 18, 1911.

BUSONI IS SOLOIST AT THE SYMPHONY

Remarkable Program Holds Large Audience Enthralled.

This week's Symphony concerts may be described as marking the climax of the season. With a soloist of the magnitude of Ferruccio Busoni, and with two such orchestral numbers as the prelude to "Lohengrin" and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" leading the program, the attractions proved sufficient yesterday afternoon to put up the "No More Seats" sign early. The outlook is that the same enthusiastic conditions will prevail tonight.

Busoni comes this time not only to play Beethoven's third piano concerto, but also to hear the first performances in Boston of his suite for orchestra, taken from the music that he wrote for Gozzi's "Turandot." He played the concerto with rare breadth and beauty of style, with the utmost skill and sympathy. However his personality may strike the spectator, his playing deserves to be described as unaffectedly impressive. The impression it gives is that of a brilliant and powerful artist, who, while not utterly sinking his individuality, at the same time shows all the characteristics of the true interpreter. His playing evoked hearty applause that lasted until he came back to bow several times.

Busoni's suite also held the interest of the audience, though it was the last number on an unusually long program.

Turandot is a Chinese princess who sends to his death every suitor who cannot answer three riddles which she propounds. Prince Kalaf, an exile, eventually wins her. The story invites high oriental coloring, which the composer has not been loath to furnish. One of the themes is an adaptation of a Chinese melody and another is said to be the oldest known Arabian song. The suite was enjoyed, and unquestionably the enjoyment would have been keener if the hour was not so late.

Strauss's wonderful tone picture, "Don Quixote," was sympathetically played by the orchestra. The soloists, Mr. Warnke and Mr. Ferir, who interpreted the music representing Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, won special applause for themselves. Wagner's lovely "Lohengrin" prelude put the audience in fine humor that lasted all the afternoon.

SUNDAY GLOBI
FEBRUARY 19, 1911

Fourth Southern Trip of the Symphony Orchestra.

The Symphony orchestra will be away this week on its fourth southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn and the third and last concert of the season in Hartford Monday evening, Feb 27.

The interesting feature of the trip will be the performance of the ninth symphony of Beethoven in Baltimore with the assistance of the Baltimore oratorio society and a quartet consisting of Mme Corrine Rider-Kelsey soprano, Miss Janet Spencer contralto, Mr Daniel Beddoe tenor and Mr Claude Cunningham basso.

This work was given a year ago this month in Baltimore with such success that there was a decided demand for its repetition this season. Mr Warnke is to be the soloist in Philadelphia, Mr Schroeder in Washington and Ferruccio [illegible]

THE MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

A STIMULATING SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Remarkable Playing of the Orchestra —Strauss's "Don Quixote" Performed Again to Admiration—The Prelude to "Lohengrin" for Mr. Fiedler's Better Wagner—The Gay and Fanciful Busoni of the "Turandot" Music, and the Cool, Impersonal, Detached Busoni of Beethoven's Early Concerto—"Tosca" with a New Tenor at the Opera House

THE first half of the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon, was "Richardian" and the second half "Busonian." That is to say, the first two pieces were of the two composers that some Teutonic wits like to call Richard I. and Richard II. From Richard Wagner came the Prelude to "Lohengrin," and Mr. Fiedler conducted in it with an imagination that he hardly brings to fragments of the latest music-dramas, while the strings and the horns made the music beautiful, for its tonal quality, to hear. From Richard Strauss came "Don Quixote," the masterpiece that Mr. Fiedler restored to the concerts last spring and that, after six years of neglect, richly deserved the present repetition. The conductor and his men played the variations with a perfect clarity, through which shone the ironic, the pictorial, or the characterizing quality that Strauss would give them. They made the introduction characterization in tones; they wrought the pitying tenderness of the end. If the performance had not quite the élan of last spring, when conductor and orchestra were highly keyed to their task, it unfolded the mental power, the emotional beauty, the supple fusion of means and ends, that make "Don Quixote" of the heights of music in our time. The rest of the concert, which filled the full two hours, was Mr. Busoni's. As pianist, he revived Beethoven's concerto in E minor, which he played with the perfections of an entirely comprehending and an entirely cool detachment. He sat Sphinx-like before the pianoforte. He seemed less a man than a sublimated musical mechanism doing its perfect work. As composer, he and his audience heard four pieces from his incidental music to Gozzi's fantastic Chinese comedy, "Turnadot." They were so original, interesting and amusing that those who smiled over them regretted the omission of the other four. Mr. Busoni is not a glorified mechanism when he composes. He feels, imagines.

The second balcony held its hundreds, who had come to hear Mr. Busoni and perhaps "Don Quixote." The expert, between the pieces and the intermission, chattered as their way is, of composers, pianist and conductor, and drew their comparisons between the performance of "Don Quixote" last April and the performance that they had just heard. They weighed Mr. Busoni as virtuoso; they were gay over his oriental music. Yet nobody had a word for the orchestra. It, as usual, was taken for granted. Yet the band of the Metropolitan, virtuosi, too, and practised in operatic music, and the orchestras of the great German opera houses with their superlative union of tone and expression, could hardly have surpassed the performance of the Prelude to "Lohengrin." The strings were as finely-voiced as the music, they were luminous as the track on which the Grail descends to earth and then mounts to Heaven. They were as ethereal as Wagner's tender imaginings. The euphony of their tone was softly radiant. The horns added their mellow, flowing voices. The brass followed with its rich sonorities. The middle passage of the strife of earth has been played with more tumult, but with less impassioned tonal splendor. Wagner, in pages of wordy rhetoric tells how he would have the Prelude to "Lohengrin" music of vision. The band yesterday saw it with and for him.

The orchestra passed to "Don Quixote." The mere technical exactions of ultra-modern music, they accomplished in it as they usually accomplish them. Their hearers, unless they knew the score, were probably unaware that these difficulties existed. They accomplished, besides, another and a finer thing. Strauss in his variations would suggest in tones the ten episodes of the Knight and his esquire that the programme specifies. (For "Don Quixote" is honest "programme music" that assumes rightly that the listener knows the programme.) Strauss unfolds, characterizes, distinguishes these episodes both by large and expressive mood and by adroitly vivid details. Intricate indeed is the warp and woof of the music, freely as it seems to run; yet the orchestra and Mr. Fiedler caught each of these details, made them audible to the audience, gave them each its due significance, and yet never once distorted the whole fabric of the music or stayed its course. And when the moment came, as in the Knight's speech about honor and glory, as in his night vision, as in the piteous music of his death, they attained to the glowing or the poignant beauty of tone that is of Strauss's purpose. Here were the feats of an orchestra that adds to virtuosity imagination; that is capable of mood and passion. It seemed, again, to be at play with Mr. Busoni's gay music; yet it is music that is queerly baffling to play, and remote in its Oriental substance and rhythms from familiar courses. Mr. Busoni sought a tang in it. The orchestra amplified his suggestion.

They are fortunate who can hear "Don Quixote" or write of it temperately, whether to praise or blame. Those that will have none of the music seem to bear it a sort of personal hatred. Those that thrill to it may hardly speak of it without a personal emotion. It is not that Strauss has taken the dryest, barest, and most hackneyed of musical forms—"Introduction, Theme with Variations, and Finale," as the pseudo-[illegible] wrought into it [illegible] alive in it, the figure of Cervantes's Knight, the tale of his adventures, the tender transfiguration of his death, as the composer has read, imagined, and felt it. It is not that here is music that is obedient to every law of established form, yet makes that form, supple or vivid to its purpose, so that musical development, the reflected image, and the delineative and the emotional purpose of both go hand in hand. It is not that "Don Quixote" is a masterpiece of orchestral skill and orchestral imagination. There indeed is one of its lesser titles to place among the finer musical achievements of our time. The greater titles lie in the impassioned beauty, when sound glows with emotion as coals glow with their heats, of the music in which the Knight keeps his nocturnal vigil by his arms and dreams the dreams of an idealized chivalry; in the noble eloquence of the passage in which he speaks to Sancho of honor and chivalric obligation; in the delineative image of the passage in which the cherished fancies of the reading Knight become as ghostly phantasmagoria and he is mad; in the pity, the tenderness, the quiet exaltation in which he makes a good end. For as he died, he knew that his chimeras were but the apparitions of ideals and knew that it was good to pursue such figments and to be loyal to them, though men laughed.

All this is one side of "Don Quixote"—the side on which Strauss has written some of the most beautiful, the most passionate of all his music. The other is the side of the variations that record the adventures—the ironic side. For Strauss sees and feels them and makes his hearers see and feel them not as mere fantastical humors for the passing smile of the detached bystander, not as mere musical narrative for the momentary interest of the hearer. The Knight believed and trusted and despaired, and in Strauss's music more than once is the pity of his moods. The Knight knew not that his delusions were delusions, but Strauss and we through him may feel the irony of his plight—not to mockery but to sympathy. The variations are alive with the vivacity of delineation and suggestion; but from moment to moment comes the undertone that quivers as it tells. The music is transmuting music; it is of Don Quixote as Cervantes limned him and Don Quixote as our generation, by the intellect, the imagination, the emotion of Strauss, sees him. The music more idealizes as it depicts.

Mr. Busoni was more interesting as a composer yesterday than he was as a pianist and there is more interesting music in these days than Beethoven's concerto in C minor. It is formal in the eighteenth-century fashion, though Beethoven's hand has begun to make those forms a little more full-bodied and pliant. It runs an amiable course, making animated and pleasantly shaded tracery of sound through the first movement, singing musingly and straightforwardly through a second, and then running gracefully and gayly forward to the end. The pianoforte sings; the pianoforte ornaments; once in a while, it catches the tones of the eloquent voice that Beethoven was to give it. There is little mood in music and as little individuality as was possible to so vigorous a temperament as even the youthful Beethoven's. It is a classic by grace of its place among his "collected works." Mr. Fiedler was wise to cut it and no doubt Mr. Busoni played it in the true vein. The performance was flawless in its clarity, its precision, its proportioned flow. The sense and the control of design in it was of Mr. Busoni as pure intellect. The quality of tone, the graduation, the pace, the polish of it were as immaculate of it. The sublimated mechanism of it all was of Mr. Busoni, the speckless virtuosi. He never overdid, or underdid, and the poise of the performance was as perfect as its sublimated mechanism. It was also as cool and detached as it could well be. There was not a personal emotion, mood, or suggestion in it. An eighteenth-century audience would have taken its cool, poised, detached pleasure in it. But we, as Molière said for his own time, are the people of today—a nervous, emotional lot. Does Mr. Busoni succeed with us because when he chooses as pianist he can be so "different"?

As composer, Mr. Busoni was not at all impersonal or detached. In fact, he was very gay, fanciful and generally amusing. Now, Turandot was a cruel and haughty princess of China, who set her suitors riddles to guess. When they failed to guess them, as they usually did, she passed them over to the executioner, when one did guess them and propounded her a riddle that she could not guess, pride struggled with admiration; passion was born of both and they lived happily, presumably guessing riddles ever after. Gozzi in the highly artificial Venice of the eighteenth century made a highly artificial comedy with of all this; and Schiller adopted it. To the original play, Mr. Bursoni wrote his incidental music, and since the comedy is seldom acted promptly made it a concert-suite. Out of the eight numbers, Mr. Fiedler chose a sort of pictorial prelude; the music of the chief sonata, pitty-pattying about; the music of the proud and glamourous and passionate and exotic Turandot and highly colored and joyous finale. He denied us the music that echoes out of the woman's chamber or of Turandot hovering by night around the suitor's bed on the chance that he murmur the name and estate that he conceals. The more the pity; for the music was very amusing to hear, and it could evidently turn sensuous. Mr. Busoni has chosen his Oriental melodieh, adhered to them, decked them in insistent oriental rhythms, clothed them in chinking progressions, and arrayed them in bright orchestral colors. The music is exotic to the [illegible]; it cheerfully makes its own way in its own fashion. It brings Oriental atmosphere and to spare; it has its flashes of humorous characterization over the eunuch, a moment of passion, pride and fate were Funandot. The rest was gay, and modern music so seldom is.

H. T. P.

[163]

BOSTON POST,
FEBRUARY 18, 1911

"DON QUIXOTE" BY SYMPHONY

Brilliant Performance of Strauss' Tone Poem

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the 16th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall: Prelude to Lohengrin, Wagner; tone poem, "Don Quixote," Richard Strauss; piano concerto in C minor, Beethoven; Suite for orchestra, from incidental music to Gozzi's fairy tale, "Turandot," Ferruccio Busoni. Mr. Busoni was also soloist of the occasion.

The feature of this concert was the performance of Strauss' tone-poem, a performance of extraordinary eloquence. Every detail of the score, though held exactly in its proportion to the whole, was exposed with a clearness that was microscopic, and every one of those incredible details was electric with meaning. The orchestra itself might have composed the music!

The performances of the soloists were of very exceptional quality. Mr. Warnke gave a memorable reading of the 'cello part, and Mr. Ferir, the first violist, distinguished himself equally. For that matter, there were many instrumentalists yesterday whose names are not known to fame, who merited the most honorable mention. It was not without justice that Mr. Fiedler, after being repeatedly recalled, compelled first his soloists, and then his men to bow with him.

Mr. Busoni played the Beethoven concerto in a perfectly masterly manner. The concerto is old, but it was good to hear it once more, or it would have been good if Mr. Busoni were not unfortunately one of those people who are capable of doing whatever they can conceive. The pianist's technical mastery was as irritating as his solid musicianship, his immovable authority. He can color his tones, but he prefers to draw in black and white. He could, one imagines, be a magician of the keyboard, but he prefers to "do stunts."

Busoni, the composer, explained when the "Turandot" music was performed in New York, that he employed real oriental tunes, taken from collections, in order to obtain genuine "local color." Mr. Busoni's orchestration is even more annoying than his playing. It is hard, and solid, and brilliant and noisy. The material is mixed with a scientific hand. Sometimes it sounds well, but oftenest it strikes sounds like a concoction, a recipe. The pianist was applauded for his playing, and recalled. The composer was obliged to return to the stage after the performance of the suite, and bow his acknowledgments.

RECORD, SATURDAY,
FEBRUARY 18, 1911

BUSONI, SYMPHONY SOLOIST

From Louis C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser

Then Beethoven, like a poultice came, to heal the wounds of Strauss. Ferruccio Busoni is the lion of the pianoforte. But he proved on this occasion that he need not always be leonine. The Beethoven C minor concerto was certainly a conservative choice for a debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra. We wish that he had chosen that finest of all concertos, Beethoven's G major, the fourth. But he certainly made the classical C minor concerto as effective as we have ever heard it. Nothing was exaggerated, nothing made bombastic. Even the cadenza which he chose, in the first movement, was the comparatively simple one which Beethoven himself composed. The clean, clear form of the work was balanced in masterly fashion, and the ensemble was as near perfection as we may ever hope to hear it.

All through the performance one felt the sense of surety; one knew that the artist was well within his powers. The largo, with its broad stateliness of emotion was given with becoming dignity, although one could not avoid recognizing a relationship between it and Gounod's "Salve Dimora." But as we felt sure that Beethoven had not taken it from the opera of "Faust," this did not disturb our serenity.

The final rondo was crisp and dainty, and was given in the most unaffected manner possible. In short everything was authoritative in this performance and its classicality was all the more pronounced because of what had preceded and what was to follow it. The pianist was recalled several times with spontaneous heartiness.

GLOBE, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1911

AT THE SYMPHONY

Busoni Heard as Pianist and Composer.

Brilliant Orchestral Performance of Strauss' "Don Quixote."

The program of the 16th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Prelude to "Lohengrin"; "Don Quixote," by Strauss ('cello, Mr Warnke; viola, Mr Ferir); Beethoven's piano concerto No. 3, C minor, op 37, Mr Busoni soloist, and four movements from Mr Busoni's suite "Turandot," originally composed as incidental music to Gozzi's fairy play.

This suite was performed for the first time in Boston. Unfortunately the program had continued for two hours when it began, and the audience was restive. The senses of both players and hearers would have been keener had it begun the program, and Mr Strauss need not have suffered embarrassment in following with his "Don Quixote."

Turandot was the name of a Chinese princess. Smitten by her great beauty, it is said that scores of youths desired to win her. Wooers were not forbidden, but all must subscribe to a test not unknown in legends of one beautiful princess—always a princess—and a platoon of sighing swains, namely, the winner must guess three riddles propounded by the princess. If he should fail, ergo, off went his head.

Mr Busoni's suite is in eight numbers or episodes. The first is the city gate, with the grinning heads of those who guessed badly perched high as ghastly warning. The second is dedicated to Truffaldino, a gentleman whose function it was to oversee the doings of the eunuchs. The third is the pompous entrance of the emperor into the hall, and the fourth that of the princess herself. The fifth affords a glimpse into the women's apartments, while in the sixth we hear within the chambers of Turandot the sound of harps and flutes, of women's voices and of dancing.

The riddle has been solved by Kalaf in the seventh, but Turandot is reluctant and obstinate. Kalaf retaliates by offering to withdraw his claims if Turandot will guess his name correctly. In the eighth he is guarded and in his sleep he murmurs "O, unhappy Kalaf." The princess reconsiders and after masquerading in mourning in playful vengeance, is guided by her heart and accepts the first conditions of the wager.

The first, second, fourth and last episodes were performed yesterday. In these was suggestion of the orient in the choice of mode, melody and rhythm. The theme of Turandot's march is said to be an adapted Chinese melody. Turandot enters to a colorful and impressive accompaniment to womanly caprice, cruelty and passion, and the composer's preference for music of sensuous beauty is well known. The new piece was well played and elicited applause for Mr Busoni.

In his list of works Beethoven's C minor concerto, with the "Eroica" symphony, the "Pathetique" sonata and other compositions, falls before 1803, or in what has been termed the first of the three periods of his activity. The concerto reveals an economy in modulation and a strict regard for form. The last movement is held definitely to forecast the approaching transition into the second period, but there is lacking the sweep of vision, the masterful versatility and resource in the treatment of his subject, and the profound and tragic seriousness of style which identified later works as by the signature of his own hand.

Mr Busoni approached the Beethoven with respect and reverence. He played with a clear sensing of symmetry and proportion which might have allotted movement, period, phrase and figure its just, predetermined and unswerving value, and would do so again. His playing creates the impression of abstruse mentality and of omnipotent and dauntless technic. There were moments of softness when beauty of tone and an emotional thought crept in. Mr Busoni was recalled four times.

The feature of the program, aside from its merciless and unfortunate length, was the performance of the "Don Quixote." The playing of the orchestra was as the playing of a masterful artist imbued with the technic of a virtuoso and the imagination of a poet. Mr Fiedler conducted with indisputable and welcome sympathy and insight, as well as with initiative. Mr Warnke and Mr Ferir played creditably, and Mr Longy's incomparable art was revealed.

Here Strauss is not merely the stupendously clever technician. He has made the visionary knight an aspiring romanticist and not a caricature. He has written with a noble seriousness as well as with genial humor.

HERALD, BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 19, 1911.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ON TRIP

The Symphony orchestra is away the coming week on its fourth southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and the third and last concert of the season in Hartford on Monday evening, the 27th. The interesting feature of the trip will be the performance of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven in Baltimore with the assistance of the Baltimore Oratorio Society and a quartet consisting of Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Miss Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe and Claude Cunningham. This work was given a year ago this month in Baltimore with such success that there was a demand for its repetition this season. Mr. Warnke will be the soloist in Philadelphia, Mr. Schroeder in Washington and Ferruccio Busoni in the other cities.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI SYMPHONY SOLOIST

SCORES SUCCESS AS PIANIST AND COMPOSER

Four Marches From His "Turandot" Suite Were Excellently Played by the Orchestra.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Wagner.—"Lohengrin" prelude.
Strauss.—"Don Quixote." Theme with variations.
Beethoven.—Piano concerto in C minor. No. 3. Pianist, Ferruccio Busoni.
Busoni.—"Turandot." Suite for Orchestra.

Modern in almost every part was the programme of yesterday afternoon, with only a rather conservative piano concerto to hold it within bounds. Yet, in spite of its modernity, there was nothing very vague or very perplexing about the concert. It showed that even the radicals of music can speak intelligibly, if they will. Of course there was nothing mystifying about the "Lohengrin" prelude. That critics should ever have held this music to be extreme, or forced, remains incredible to the suffering reviewer of the present. It is melodic, expressive, and as full of good resolutions as a New Year's day. That our orchestra played this excellently goes without saying. It was a good "antipasto" to the more indigestible dishes that were to follow.

In "Don Quixote" we had two excellent soloists who pictured the knight and his esquire beautifully. Mr. Warnke played the violoncello obbligati and Mr. Ferir the viola ones perfectly. The interpretation of "Don Quixote" was a splendid one. Whenever there is a great Strauss work to be given, and Mr. Fiedler wields the conductor's baton, one may be sure of a great musical treat. Therefore the bleating of the sheep, the whistling winds that fanned Don Quixote's aeroplane, the quaintly demure bassoon discourse of the two monks, and many other points, deserve commendation and enthusiasm. But not even the excellent orchestra and the superb reading can quite reconcile us to the ramblings of the work or convince us that absolute genius is speaking in its tones. It is intensely interesting as a study of instrumentation and bold modulation. Certain very fitting points have been evolved from the great intellect which Richard Strauss undoubtedly possesses. It is a most poetic touch to simplify the theme of Don Quixote as his mind grows clearer; it is very fitting, too, to have the hero individualized upon an instrument—the violoncello—and to have Sancho Panza represented upon another—the viola. One would never have thought, however, of putting the burly esquire upon this instrument, for the viola is the instrument of dreamy melancholy and brooding. The bassoon or even the contra-bass would have seemed more fitting to Sancho, but the end justifies the means, and the result is not ineffective.

We were glad to see both Mr. Warnke and Mr. Ferir called out after the performance, for their difficult parts were the most effective portion of the various obbligato effects with which this composition bristles. Only the solo work of the finale is somewhat diffuse. Don Quixote dies a lingering death, without, like Charles II., apologizing for it. There was much applause at the end of the variations and the excellence of the performance may account for at least some of this.

Then Beethoven, like a poultice came, to heal the wounds of Strauss. Ferruccio Busoni is the lion of the pianoforte. But he proved on this occasion that he need not always be leonine. The Beethoven C minor concerto was certainly a conservative choice for a debut with the Boston Symphony orchestra. We wish that he had chosen that finest of all concertos, Beethoven's G major, the fourth. But he certainly made the classical C minor concerto as effective as we have ever heard it. Nothing was exaggerated, nothing made bombastic. Even the cadenza which he chose, in the first movement, was the comparatively simple one which Beethoven himself composed. The clean, clear form of the work was balanced in masterly fashion, and the ensemble was as near perfection as we may ever hope to hear it.

All through the performance one felt the sense of surety; one knew that the artist was well within his powers. The largo, with its broad stateliness of emotion was given with becoming dignity, although one could not avoid recognizing a relationship between it and Gounod's "Salve Dimora." But as we felt sure that Beethoven had not taken it from the opera of "Faust," this did not disturb our serenity.

The final rondo was crisp and dainty, and was given in the most unaffected manner possible. In short everything was authoritative in this performance and its classicality was all the more pronounced because of what had preceded and what was to follow it. The pianist was recalled several times with spontaneous heartiness.

And now, having made a triumph in one character, Busoni sought to conquer in another field. Four marches from his "Turandot" suite were given by the orchestra. "Turandot" as set by Schiller has always been a favorite subject in Germany, and Weber gave it with a real Chinese melody in its overture, while Lachner gave to it an imitation one. Busoni uses an Italian text for his topic and employs several actual Oriental tunes, one of them Chinese. But after all it would be folly to expect the true Chinese flavor in such a work, and the pentatonic scale is not much employed in it. Play the scale from C to C and omit F and B and you have the most used scale of China.

Busoni may be Italian by birth, but he has fallen into line with the most extreme Teutons and is now "Plus royalist que le Roi." He rivals Reger in bending the impossible into musical shape and in doing miraculous musical feats in composition. He has here used some material that is difficult to treat with our harmonic system, yet he has succeeded in bringing forth something that is brilliant and effective. Of course it was rather a handicap to have four marches as foils to each other, particularly when more than one of them had that rhythmic reiteration which is characteristic of much eastern music.

The drums were employed in rapping out these rhythms a good part of the time, but there was piquancy in each of the numbers all the same, although two marches would have been better than four, at the end of a programme of a little greater length than usual. The two last numbers, "Turandot" and the joyous finale, were the best of the set. In the finale, the sorrowful funeral march, with a brighter theme stealing in gradually and finally overwhelming everything in its triumph, made a very artistic contrast. In the matter of instrumentation Mr. Busoni belongs to the most advanced school and handles a large orchestra with power and effect. At the end of the short Suite Mr. Busoni was recalled to the stage and received recognition as a composer in addition to his preceding recognition as a great pianist.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 18, 191

SYMPHONY

The intellectual duel goes on between France and Germany. The weapons used by the French are violins, flutes, trumpets, and other melody making implements authorized by international regulations; those used by the Germans are the legitimate ones, together with a few others which the laws of nations do not recognize. The headquarters of the contending generals are the Paris conservatory on the one side, and the music schools of Munich and Berlin on the other. The battlegrounds are many; now the Teutonic forces exalt their standard right in the Gallic citadel; now the Debussyite hosts capture German city after German city. The opposing camps move about with exceeding swiftness. Victory is constantly winging her flight from one side of the border to the other. Sometimes a music festival will convene on the northern side, with intent to arbitrate the questions at issue, but nothing ever comes to settlement.

The combatants recognize no neutral territory; their diplomats are not even conversant with the Monroe doctrine. The theater of war extends to America; and in America the conflict goes on with about the same undecisive gain and loss as on the home soil. The whimsical thing about it all here is that the identical battalions must do service for both parties. Max Fiedler martials his men under the French banner on Thursday and under the German on Friday. So he becomes a shadow fighter, and of course is invariably a conqueror.

Mr. Fiedler added a wind machine to his ordnance on the German day, and he further violated the rules of civilized warfare by the employment of muted something or other (was it tuba?), and then he allowed the music to be called variations, when in truth it was a concerto for 'cello and orchestra, with Mr. Warnke as the solo 'cellist. Well, when Strauss is the composer and "Don Quixote" the title of the piece, are we not to expect some irregularities in the fighting methods?

Mr. Busoni, of Italian name but of German musical proclivities, played an early Beethoven piano concerto and afterward listened to the performance of an orchestral piece of his in popular vein, "Turandot." Mr. Busoni was very kind not to bring with him a tremendously recondite musical work either to play himself or to have Mr. Fiedler perform. Only light subjects should come up for discussion after Richard Strauss, humorist, has held the platform for a half hour, because the humor of Richard Strauss is such a serious thing that a little brightness and fun are distinctly needed to counteract it.

Program of the sixteenth Symphony concert: Wagner, prelude to "Lohengrin;" Strauss, "Don Quixote;" Beethoven, concerto in C minor, for piano and orchestra, No. 3 op. 37; Busoni, suite for orchestra, "Turandot," first time in Boston. Soloist, Ferruccio Busoni.

The Symphony orchestra is away the coming week on its fourth southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and the third and last concert of the season in Hartford on Monday evening, Feb. 27. In Baltimore the ninth symphony of Beethoven will be given with the assistance of the Baltimore Oratorio Society and a quartet consisting of Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, bass. Mr. Warnke is to be the soloist in Philadelphia, Mr. Schroeder in Washington and Ferruccio Busoni in the other cities.

[164]

rom Daily Citizen,
ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate FEB 11 1911

The symphony, which Max Fiedler has chosen for the fourth Brooklyn concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 24, is Schubert's in C major. This work which, by the way, the composer never heard, marks the highest point reached by his extraordinary creative genius. Philip Hale, the critic and annotator of the remarkable programme books of the Boston Symphony, speaking of this symphony when it was played in Boston a few weeks ago, called it "a veritable house of melodies." It is this work which has led many to the rather idle theory of what Schubert would have been had a longer life been granted him and there are not a few who think that this work alone proves conclusively that had he lived ten or fifteen years more he would have overshadowed the great Beethoven.

The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, the eminent pianist, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major No. 1.

Daily Eagle,
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 11 1911

The symphony which Max Fiedler has chosen for the fourth Brooklyn concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 24, is Schubert's in C major. This work, which, by the way, the composer never heard, marks the highest point reached by his creative genius. Philip Hale, the eminent critic and the annotator of the programme books of the Boston Symphony, speaking of this symphony when it was played in Boston a few weeks ago, called it "a veritable storehouse of melodies." It is this work which has led many to the rather idle theory of what Schubert would have been had a longer life been granted to him and there are not a few who think that this work alone proves conclusively that had he lived ten or fifteen years more he would have overshadowed the great Beethoven.

The soloists will be Ferruccio Busoni, the eminent pianist, who is to play Liszt's concerto in E flat major No. 1.

TRIBUNE
ess New York City.
FEB 12 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," which is the principal item on the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall on February 23, with the exception of "Macbeth," which is not known at all in New York, is the least familiar of Strauss's tone poems. It was first played here in the spring of 1904 by the Wetzler Orchestra, under the direction of the composer, and shortly after the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it under Mr. Gericke. Since then it has not appeared on a New York programme. Max Fiedler gave it in Boston last spring, with unusual success, and he is repeating it again on the 17th and 18th of this month. The solo violoncello part will be played by Heinrich Warnke and the solo viola part by Emil Ferir, both of the orchestra.

The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, who will also be the soloist at the Saturday afternoon concert on the 25th, when the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

is
N. Y. AMERICAN
FEB 12 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" will be the principal item at the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall on February 23. With the exception of his "Macbeth," which is not known at all in New York, it is the least familiar of Strauss's tone poems. It was first played here in the Spring of 1904 by the Wetzler Orchestra under the direction of the composer, and shortly after the Boston Symphony played it under Mr. Gericke. Since then it has not appeared on a New York programme. The solo violoncello part will be played by Heinrich Warnke, and the solo viola part by Emil Ferir, both of the orchestra. The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, who will also be the soloist at the Saturday afternoon concert on the 25th, when the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

TIMES
n
ress New York City.
e FEB 12 1911

The symphony which Max Fiedler has chosen for the fourth Brooklyn concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, Feb. 24, is Schubert's in C major. The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, the eminent pianist, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1.

n WORLD
ress New York City.
e FEB 12 1911

Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," which is the principal item on the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Carnegie Hall on Feb. 23, with the exception of "Macbeth," which is not known at all in New York, is the least familiar of Strauss's tone poems. It was first played here in the spring of 1904 by the Wetzler Orchestra, under the direction of the composer, and shortly after the Boston Symphony played it under Mr. Gericke. Since then it has not appeared on a New York programme. The solo violoncello part will be played by Heinrich Warnke and the solo viola part by Emil Ferir, both of the orchestra. The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, who will also be the soloist at the Saturday afternoon concert on the 25th, when the Symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

TIMES
n
ress New York City.
e FEB 12 1911

Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," which is the principal item on the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on Feb. 23, with the exception of "Macbeth," is the least familiar of Strauss's tone poems. It was first played here in the Spring of 1904 by the Wetzler Orchestra under the direction of the composer, and shortly after the Boston Symphony played it under Mr. Gericke. Since then it has not appeared on a New York programme. Max Fiedler gave it in Boston last Spring, and he is repeating it again on the 17th and 18th of this month. The solo violoncello part will be played by Heinrich Warnke, and the solo viola part by Emil Ferir, both of the orchestra.

The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, who will also be the soloist at the Saturday afternoon concert on the 25th, when the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

TRIBUNE
n
ress New York City.
e FEB 12 1911

The symphony which Max Fiedler has chosen for the fourth Brooklyn concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 24, is Schubert's in C major. Philip Hale, the eminent critic of "The Boston Herald" and the annotator of the remarkable programme books of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, speaking of this symphony when it was played in Boston a few weeks ago, called it "a veritable storehouse of melodies." The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, the pianist, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat major, No. 1.

m PRESS
Iress New York City
e FEB 12 1911

Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," which is the principal item on the programme of the Thursday evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Carnegie Hall on February 23, is one of the least familiar of Strauss's tone poems. It was first presented here in the spring of 1904 by the Wetzler Orchestra, under the direction of the composer, and shortly afterward the Boston Symphony played it under Gericke. Since then it has not appeared on a New York programme. Max Fiedler performed the work in Boston last spring with unusual success, and he is repeating it again on the 17th and 18th of this month. The solo violoncello part will be played by Heinrich Warnke and the solo viola part by Emil Ferir, both of the orchestra.

The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, who will also be the soloist at the Saturday afternoon concert on the 25th, when the symphony will be Schubert's in C major.

TELEGRAPH
New York City
FEB 12 1911

ALBANY.

Madame Troubadour, which scored a pronounced success earlier in the season at its premiere performance here, returned to Harmanus Bleecker Hall Feb. 2 and 3 and drew capacity houses. Except that Grace La Rue has been replaced by Sophie Brandt and Edgar Norton by Douglas B. Williams the cast is the same.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its usually delightful concert Feb. 6. Mme. Yolande Mero, pianist, was ill and gave way to Alvin Schroeder, cellist, who scored a well deserved success.

n Daily Times,
ress Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 18 1911

Ferruccio Busoni will play the Liszt concerto in E flat for pianoforte and orchestra at the Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The Schubert symphony in C major will be played by the orchestra.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 13 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The symphony which Max Fiedler has chosen for the fourth Brooklyn concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, February 24, is Schubert's in C major. This work which, by the way, the composer never heard, marks the highest point reached by his extraordinary creative genius. The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, the eminent pianist, who will play Liszt's Concerto in E flat Major No. 1

Daily Eagle,
ss Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 18 1911

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening next, will present as soloist the eminent pianist, Ferruccio Busoni, who will play Liszt's Concerto in E-flat No. 1. Busoni is to-day the most authoritative interpreter of Liszt we have, and it will be more than usually interesting to hear his performance of this favorite Concerto. The symphony will be Schubert's immortal C-major. Speaking of this a few weeks ago, after it had been played in Boston, Philip Hale, the eminent critic, called it a "veritable storehouse of melodies," and enlarging on the point suggested that more real melody could be found in this single symphony than in the entire works of such composers of to-day as Strauss, Reger, Puccini and the Frenchmen. The work has been called the symphony of "divine length," but that title was given to it before the modern composer had begun to spin out his tenuous substance into hour and hour-and-a-half symphonies and symphonic poems. Judged by modern standards, the C-major of Schubert is of moderate length, especially when all the repetitions are not given. Mr. Fiedler cuts out a number of these.

The programme will close with two works which have been much neglected in recent years by conductors of the larger orchestras. They are the early symphonic poems of Saint-Saens' "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre." By a freak of fate in recent years they have been relegated more to so-called "popular" programmes, and yet each is decidedly a master work of its kind. In nothing that he has done has this exceedingly skillful composer exhibited his genius in a greater degree. Both works are programatic in the literal sense of the word, and are vivid portrayals of their subjects. Moreover, the manner in which they are scored could well stand as a model for other composers to follow. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Schubert—Symphony in C major No. 7.
Liszt—Concerto for pianoforte in E flat No. 1.
Saint-Saens—Symphonic Poem No. 1. "Le Roust d'Omphale," Op. 31. (Omphale's Spinning Wheel).
Saint-Saens—Symphonic Poem No. 3. "Danse Macabre," after a poem by Henri Cazalis, Op. 40.
Soloist—Ferruccio Busoni.

rom Daily Citizen,
ddress Brooklyn, N. Y.
ate FEB 18 1911

The fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be given in the Academy of Music, on next Friday evening, will present as soloist the eminent pianist, Ferruccio Busoni, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat, No. 1. Busoni is to-day the most authoritative interpreter of Liszt we have, and it will be more than usually interesting to hear his performance of this favorite concerto.

The symphony will be Schubert's immortal C major. The work has been called the symphony of "divine length," but that title was given to it before the modern composer had begun to spin out his tenuous substance into hour and hour and a half symphonies and symphonic poems. As a matter of fact, judged by modern standards, the C major of Schubert is of modern length, especially when all the repetitions are not given. Mr. Fiedler cuts out a number of these.

The programme will be brought to a close with two works which have been much neglected in recent years by conductors of the larger orchestras. They are the early symphonic poems of Saint-Saens, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre." By a strange freak of fate in recent years they have been relegated more to so-called "popular" programmes and yet each is decidedly a master work of its kind. In nothing that he has done has this exceedingly skillful composer exhibited his genius in a greater degree. Both works are programmatic in the literal sense of the work and are vivid portrayals of their subjects.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

s

The next concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra will have as soloist Ferruccio Busoni, who will play the Beethoven concerto in C minor on Thursday evening and the "Todtentanz" of Liszt on Saturday afternoon. The other numbers on Thursday evening's programme will be Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote"; Liszt's "Les Preludes," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Saturday afternoon the orchestral offerings will be the C major symphony by Schubert, Franz Wullner's arrangement of Handel's overture in D major and "Benvenuto Cellini" overture by Berlios.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
BROOKLYN EDIT.

WEEK'S SCHEDULE IN THE INSTITUTE

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Be Heard in Fourth Concert in Academy of Music.

Most important on the Brooklyn Institute calendar for next week is the coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for their fourth concert in the Academy of Music on Friday evening. The symphony which Max Fiedler has chosen is Schubert's, in C major. Saint-Saens' Symphonic Poems, No. 1 and No. 3, will also be played. The soloist will be Signor Ferruccio Busoni, pianist, who will play Liszt's Concerto in E flat major, No. 1. Signor Busoni will also be heard in recital on March 2.

On Thursday afternoon, preceding the concert, Howard Brockway will discuss the programme of February 24, in the lecture hall of the Academy.

"The Balkan States" will be the subject of E. M. Newman's next travel lecture on Saturday evening. To-night Mr. Newman will describe "The Austrian Tyrol."

Mrs. Cornelia K. Hood's second lecture for women will be given om EVENING POST.

ldress New York City.
ate FEB 18 1911

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts are scheduled for the coming week, when, on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25, they will be given in Carnegie Hall. At its Thursday evening concert the Boston visitors will have plenty of opportunity to show their virtuosity, for the principal work on the programme is Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," which some consider Strauss's best tone poem. At both concerts, the soloist will be Mr. Busoni. On Thursday, he will play Beethoven's seldom-heard third concerto for piano. The other numbers on that programme will be Liszt's "Les Préludes," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. On Saturday afternoon, Busoni will play the seldom-heard "Todtentanz" of Liszt. This is a paraphrase of the "Dies Irae" made by Liszt after he had contemplated, so it is said, the frescoes of Orcagna's in the Campo Santo in Pisa. There are others who believe that he was inspired in this work by Holbein's picture of "The Dance of Death." Harold Bauer revived this with much success in the season of 1901-02, and two years later Busoni played it a great deal in this country. The symphony will be the immortal C-Major of Schubert, and the other numbers will be Franz Wüllner's arrangement of Handel's overture in D-Major and Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini." In Brooklyn next Friday the orchestra will play the Schubert symphony and Busoni will be heard in Liszt's first concerto.

WORLD
s New York City.
FEB 19 1911

Boston Symphony.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next week on Thursday evening, Feb. 22, and Saturday afternoon, Feb. 25. At both of these concerts the soloists will be Ferruccio Busoni. The programmes are as follows:

Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" ..... Liszt
"Don Quixote" (introduction, theme with variations and finale); fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, op. 35 (violoncello solo, Mr. Warnke; viola, Mr. Ferir) ..... Strauss
Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C minor ..... Beethoven
Overture, "Euryanthe" ..... Weber
Overture in D major No. 1 ..... Handel
Symphony in C major No. 7 ..... Schubert
Todtentanz, for pianoforte ..... Liszt
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini" ..... Berlioz

HERALD
New York City.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, pianist, will play at both the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. For Thursday the programme consists of Beethoven's C minor Concerto, played by Mr. Busoni, and the chief orchestral feature will be Mr. Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote." On Saturday afternoon Mr. Busoni will play Liszt's "Todtentanz," and the symphony will be Schubert's C major.

STAATS ZEITUNG

New York City.

FEB 19 1911

Im Reich der Töne.

In der lutherischen St. Peters-Kirche an Hale Ave., unweit Ridgewood Ave., veranstaltet morgen Abend Herr C. F. Starke ein großes Orgel-Konzert unter gefälliger Mitwirkung des Cellisten G. O. Hornberger und der Sopranistin Isabella Adams. Herr Starke steht mit Tonwerken von Bach, Mendelssohn, Lemmens, Batiste, Wagner und Du Bois auf dem reichhaltigen Programm verzeichnet. Das Konzert beginnt präzis ½ nach 8 Uhr.

Das vorletzte Saison-Konzert des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, Dirigent Max Fiedler, findet nächsten Freitag Abend im Opernsaal der neuen Musik-Akademie statt.

N. Y. AMERICAN

FEB 19 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. The programme on Thursday will include Liszt's "Les Preludes," Strauss's "Don Quixote" music, Beethoven's piano concerto in C major, and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. The Saturday programme will include Handel's overture in D minor (No. 1), Schubert's Seventh Symphony, Liszt's "Todtentanz" and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" Overture.

SUN

New York City.

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next week on Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. The programmes are as follows:

Thursday Evening, February 23, at 8:15.

Liszt	Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"
Strauss	"Don Quixote" (introduction Theme with variations and finale). Fantastic variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, op. 35.
Beethoven	Concerto in C minor
Weber	Overture, "Euryanthe"

Saturday Afternoon, February 25, at 2:30.

Handel	Overture in D major No. 1
Schubert	Symphony in C major No. 7
Liszt	"Todtentanz" for pianoforte
Berlioz	Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"

TIMES

New York City.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Seven years ago musical New York was thrown more or less into a turmoil by the first performance here under the direction of the composer of Richard Strauss's set of variations which he calls "Don Quixote." About the same time Mr. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra played it at a concert, and since then this work, which Ernest Newman regards as the greatest of Strauss's achievements in purely orchestral music, has been entirely neglected here. Last Spring Mr. Fiedler gave it a performance in Boston. Mr. Fiedler is playing it again at the fourth Boston Symphony evening concert in this city in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, with Mr. Warnke and Mr. Férir playing the solo parts.

"Don Quixote" was composed in 1897, having been finished at the very end of that year, and two months later Franz Wüllner gave it its first performance from manuscript in Cologne. The next season Theodore Thomas played it in Chicago with the Chicago Orchestra. Then it was neglected until Strauss came to this country. It differs from Strauss's other works in that it is not in symphonic form, but is in the shape of an introduction, ten variations on "A Theme of Knightly Character" and a finale.

The soloist Thursday evening will be Ferruccio Busoni, who will play the seldom-heard Third Concerto for piano and orchestra by Beethoven in C minor. The concert will begin with Liszt's "Les Preludes" and end with the "Euryanthe" overture. Busoni will again be soloist on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 27. Then he will play Liszt's "Todtentanz," a paraphrase made by Liszt of the "Dies Irae" which was inspired, so it is said, by Liszt's contemplation of Orcagna's painting in the Campo Santo in Pisa. The symphony on Saturday afternoon will be the C major of Schubert, and the other numbers will be Franz Wüllner's arrangement of Handel's overture in D major and Beethoven's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

TRIBUNE

New York City.

FEB 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Ferruccio Busoni will be the soloist at both of the coming Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert he will play Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, No. 3, a work which is seldom heard in public nowadays. On Saturday afternoon he will play Liszt's "Todtentanz," which is a paraphrase of the "Dies Iræ," said to have been inspired by a view of Orcagna's painting in the Campo Santo in Pisa.

Thursday night the principal orchestral work will be Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." The full title of this is "Don Quixote (Introduction, Theme with Variations and Finale); Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character, opus 35." With the exception of "Macbeth," which has never been played in New York, the "Don Quixote" is the least familiar of Strauss's orchestral works. It had its first performance in this city when Strauss conducted it when he was a guest in New York in 1904. Its first performance in America, however, was in Chicago on January 7, 1899, by the Chicago Orchestra under Theodore Thomas. The work was composed in 1897, the score having been completed on December 29 of that year, and was played first at a Gürzenich concert in Cologne from manuscript under Franz Wüllner, on March 8, 1898. Much has been written in explanation of this work which followed "Also sprach Zarathustra" (1896) and preceded "Ein Heldenleben" (1898). Mr. Arthur Hahn has written a pamphlet of twenty-seven pages in elucidation, and in this pamphlet are many wondrous things. We are told that certain queer harmonies introduced in an otherwise simple passage of the Introduction "characterize admirably the well known tendency of Don Quixote toward false conclusions."

It is said that "Don Quixote" was written at a time when the composer himself was inclined "to be conscious of the tragi-comedy of his own overzealous hyper-idealism and ironical at its expense." The writer of the programme book prepared for the Strauss Festival in London, in June, 1903, makes this statement, which, with a knowledge of Cervante's romance, might serve any one who is not too curious, who does not insist on knowing every detail in a musical panorama.

Ernest Newman, the distinguished English critic, has called this Strauss's greatest work, because "it is the one in which his qualities of realist and humanist come to their finest flower. It has all the fervor of 'Don Juan' and all the humor of 'Till Eulenspiegel,' with a technique still more amazing than that of either of these works, and that riper feeling that could come only to him with the process of the years. I would rank the 'Don Quixote' higher even than 'Also Sprach Zarathustra' because of this sensation that it gives us of the enormous fund of sincere emotion that underlies all of Strauss's audacity and cleverness, and that never leaves him even in his moments of most reckless humor."

The two other numbers on the programme will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. On Saturday afternoon the symphony will be the ever beautiful C major of Schubert. The programme will begin with Wüllner's arrangement of Handel's overture in D major, and will end with Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Schubert's C major symphony is to be the principal work presented at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat No. 1. The programme will be brought to an end by the two familiar and ever welcome symphonic poems of Saint-Saëns, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

MORN. TELEGRAPH

New York City.

FEB 19 1911

MUSIC NOTES

The fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, February 23, and Saturday afternoon, February 25. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. The programmes are as follows:

THURSDAY EVENING, AT 8.15.

Symphonic Poem—"Les Preludes"	Liszt.
"Don Quixote" (introduction, theme with variations and finale), fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, Op. 35	Strauss
Violoncello Solo—Mr. Warnke; Viola, Mr. Ferir.
Concerto for Pianoforte and Orchestra in C-minor,	Beethoven
Overture—"Euryanthe"	Weber

SATURDAY AFTERNOON AT 2.30.

Overture in D-major, No. 1	Handel
Symphony in C-major, No. 7	Schubert
"Todtentanz" for Pianoforte	Liszt
Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini"	Berlioz

PRESS

New York City

FEB 21 1911

BROOKLYN INSTITUTE.—A Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday night. On Saturday night an illustrated lecture on the Balkan States will be given by Emanuel M. Newman.

STANDARD UNION, BROOKLYN, N. Y.

FEB 19 1911

The fourth Boston Symphony concert which is to be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, will present as soloist the eminent pianist, Ferruccio Busoni, who will play Liszt's concerto in E flat, No. 1. Busoni is to-day the most authoritative interpreter of Liszt, and it will be more than usually interesting to hear his performance of this favorite concerto. The symphony will be Schubert's immortal C major. Speaking of this a few days ago, after it had been played in Boston, Philip Hale, the eminent critic, called it a "veritable storehouse of melodies," and enlarging on the point suggested that more real melody could be found in this single symphony than in the entire works of the composers of to-day—Strauss, Reger, Puccini and the Frenchmen. The work has been called the symphony of "divine length"; but that title was given to it before the modern composer had begun to spin out his tenuous substance into hour and hour and a half symphonies and symphonic poems. As a matter of fact, judged by modern standards, the C major of Schubert is of moderate length, especially when all the repetitions are not given. Mr. Fiedler cuts out a number of these. The programme will be brought to a close with two works which have been much neglected in recent years by conductors of the larger orchestras. They are the early symphonic poems of Saint-Saen's "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre." By a strange freak of fate in recent years they have been relegated more to so-called popular programmes, and yet each is decidedly a master work of its kind. In nothing that he has done has this exceedingly skillful composer exhibited his genius in a greater degree. Both works are programmatic in the literal sense of the word, and are vivid portrayals of their subjects. Moreover, the manner in which they are scored could well stand as a model for other composers to follow. The programme in its proper order is as follows:

Schubert	Symphony in C Major No. 7
Liszt	Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat, No. 1.
Saint-Saens	Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Op. 31 (Omphale's Spinning Wheel)
Saint-Saens	Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Danse Macabre," after a poem by Henri Cazalis, Op. 40.

Soloist, Ferruccio Busoni.

Howard Brockway will give the lecture recital preliminary to the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to take place on Friday evening next in the opera house, Academy of Music. The lecture recital is set in lecture hall of that building, and for Thursday afternoon next.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

PRESS

New York City

FEB 19 1911

The fourth pair of Boston symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall on next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At both of these concerts the soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. Here are the programmes:

Thursday evening, February 23, at 8.15—Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; Strauss, "Don Quixote", (introduction, theme with variations and finale), fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, op. 35 (violoncello solo, Warnke; viola, Ferir); Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in C minor; Weber, overture, "Euryanthe." Soloist, Ferruccio Busoni.

Saturday afternoon, February 25, at 2.30—Handel, overture in D major No. 1; Schubert, symphony in C major No. 7; Liszt, "Todtentanz" for pianoforte; Berlioz, overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Soloist, Ferruccio Busoni.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

The Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences has three musical events scheduled for the next few days. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts on February 24 and March 24 at the Academy of Music. On March 4 the New York Symphony Orchestra will render a Richard Wagner programme, with Marcus Kellerman, barytone, as assisting artist. Signor Ferruccio Busoni will give a piano recital on the evening of March 9.

Boston Symphony Orchestral U

The symphony which Max Fiedler has chosen for the fourth Washington concert at the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, February 21, at 4:30 o'clock is Schubert's symphony in C major. This work, which, by the way, the composer never heard, is said to mark the highest point reached by his extraordinary creative genius. There are not a few who think that this work alone proves that had he lived ten or fifteen years more he might have overtaken Beethoven himself. The soloist at the concert will be Alwin Schroeder, the eminent cellist of the orchestra.

TIMES

Washington, D. C.

FEB 19 1911

SCHROEDER TO BE CONCERT SOLOIST

Cellist to Play Here With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for many years 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet, will be soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert at the National Theater next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock.

He will play two works. One an adagio, by Dvorak, which bears the title of "Waldesrune," and the other, Boellman's Symphonic Variations.

The symphony will be Schubert's immortal C-Major, the one of which has been called a "veritable storehouse of melodies." It has also been called the symphony of "divine length," but that name was given to it before the modern composers began to write the symphonies and symphonic poems of today. As a matter of fact judged by modern standards, the C-Major is of moderate length, but the multitude of beautiful themes in it more than exceed the time taken in performance.

The program will be brought to an end by two of the most popular symphonic poems of the French composer, Camille Saint-Saens. The first will be "Le Rouet d' Omphale" or "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." The other, the brilliant "Danse Macabre."

STAR

WASHINGTON, D. C.

FEB 19 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alwin Schroeder, cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and for so many years the cellist of the Kneisel Quartet, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, February 21, at half-past 4 o'clock. He will play two works. One, a particularly beautiful Adagio by Dvorak, which bears the title of "Waldesruhe," and the other Boellmann's Symphonic Variations, which has had much favor with soloists for the reason that it is particularly grateful to the instrument.

The symphony will be Schubert's immortal C major, the one which has been called a "veritable storehouse of melodies." The program will be brought to an end by two of the most popular symphonic poems of the French composer, Camille Saint-Saens. The first will be "Le Rouet d'Omphale" or "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." The other the brilliant Danse Macabre." "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" is his first symphonic poem and was composed in 1871. It was originally a rondo for piano and then orchestrated. The first performance in public was of the piano piece in Paris, in 1872, played by the composer, and the first orchestral performance was in Paris three months later. The "Danse Macabre" is the third of Saint-Saens' symphonic poems and was first performed at the Chatelet in Paris in 1875. It is based on a poem by H. Cazalis which bears the name "Danse Macabre," which, freely translated into English, means the "Dance of Death."

The program in order is: Schubert, symphony in C major, No. 7; (a) Dvorak, "Waldesruhe," adagio for violoncello in D flat; (b) Boellmann, "Symphonic Variations"; Saint-Saens, symphonic poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale" (op. 31, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel"); Saint-Saens, symphonic poem No. 3, "Danse Macabre," after a poem by Henri Cazalis, op. 40. Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

POST

Washington, D. C.

FEB 19 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alwin Schroeder, the admired cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for so many years the cellist of the Kneisel Quartet, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the National on Tuesday afternoon, February 21, at 4:30 o'clock. He will play two works. One, a particularly beautiful adagio by Dvorak, which bears the title of "Waldeshrue," and the other, Boellman's symphonic variations.

The symphony will be Schumann's immortal C major, the one which has been called a "veritable storehouse of melodies." It has also been called the symphony of "divine length," but that name was given to it before the modern composers began to write the symphonies and symphonic poems of today. As a matter of fact, judged by modern standards, the C major is of moderate length, but the multitude of beautiful themes in it more than exceed the time taken in performance.

The program will be brought to an end by two of the most popular symphonic poems of the French composer, Camille Saint-Saens. The first will be "Le Rouet d'Omphale," or "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." The other brilliant "Danse Macabre." "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," is his first symphonic poem, and was composed in 1871. It was originally a rondo for piano, and then orchestrated.

om POST

Washington, D. C.

ddress

ate FEB 12 1911

Alwin Schroeder, the first cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at the fourth concert given by that organization in Washington in the National Theater on Tuesday afternoon, February 21. He will play an adagio by Dvorak and Boellmann's symphonic variations. The symphony will be Schubert's in C major and the concert will be brought to an end by two short symphonic poems of Camille Saint-Saens, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre."

110

m HERALD

Washington, D. C.

ress

te Feb 19 ..11

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alwin Schroeder, the admired 'cellist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for so many years the 'cellist of the Kneisel Quartet, will be the soloist at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which will be given in the New National Theater on next Tuesday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. He will play two works. One, a particularly beautiful Adagio by Dvorak, which bears the title of "Waldesruhe," and the other, Boellman's symphonic variations, which has had much favor with soloists for the reason that it is particularly grateful to the instrument.

The symphony will be Schubert's immortal C major, the one which has been called a "veritable storehouse of melodies." It has also been called the symphony of "divine length," but that name was given to it before the modern composers began to write the symphonies and symphonic poems of to-day. As a matter of fact, judged by modern standards, the C major is of moderate length, but the multitude of beautiful themes in it more than exceed the time taken in performance.

The programme will be brought to an end by two of the most popular symphonic poems of the French composer, Camille Saint-Saens. The first will be "Le Rouet d'Omphale" or "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," and the other the brilliant "Danse Macabre."

om

ddress

te FEB 11 [illegible]

ANTON WITEK AS SOLOIST

Will Play In That Capacity With Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There will have to be some very lively work at the Lyric Theatre after midnight on February 21, for there is an opera Tuesday evening and Wednesday evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, together with the Baltimore Oratario Society, is to give Beethoven's monumental Ninth Symphony. A complete stage has to be built between midnight and 10.30 the next morning, in order that a public meeting may be held there at that hour. To this end, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is sending down its own men to build the stage—men who are accustomed to this work.

The concert will have as soloist Anton Witek, the eminent violinist who is concert-master of the orchestra. He will play Beethoven's noble concerto for violin in D major.

om NEWS

dress Baltimore, Md.

Boston Symphony Comes To Lyric February 22

There will have to be some extremely lively work at the Lyric after midnight on February 21, for there is an opera on Tuesday evening, and on Wednesday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra, together with the Baltimore Oratorio Society, is to give Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Therefore, a complete stage has to be built between midnight and 10.30 o'clock the next morning, in order that a public meeting may be held there at that hour. To this end the Boston Symphony Orchestra is sending down its own men to build the stage—men who are accustomed to this work.

The concert will have as soloist Anton Witek, the eminent violinist, who is concert master of the Orchestra. He will play Beethoven's noble concerto for violin in D major.

RECORD

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

FEB 12 1911

Boston Symphony Concert.

Conductor Max Fiedler is making the second half of the Boston Symphony program which is to be played in the Academy of Music next Monday night entirely of Wagnerian music. This will be the funeral music from "Goetterdammerung," the Siegfried Idyll and the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the distinguished 'cellist of [illegible] orchestra.

om EVENING BALTIMORE, Md. SUN

ddress

t FEB 15 1911

MUSICAL TREAT AT LYRIC

Boston Symphony And Oratorio Society To Combine.

The first appearance of the Oratorio Society will take place at the Lyric on the evening of Washington's Birthday, when the Baltimore singers will assist the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the performance of Beethoven's ninth, or choral, symphony. It will be the second occasion of the society's appearance with the orchestra, the Beethoven work having been given on the same date last year, and the indications point to a duplication of the success of that event.

The soloists will be the same, the quartet including Mme. Corrinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, basso. Each one of these singers is well known and a prime favorite in Baltimore, and their work last year was very highly praised.

om

ddress

te

Oratorio-Symphony Engagement.

The Baltimore Oratorio Society is one of the few choral organizations that has ever appeared in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and its engagement with it last Washington's Birthday was not only the occasion of bringing out the largest and most enthusiastic audience ever seen at a similar concert at the Lyric, but the event was, moreover, put down as decidedly the most notable triumph the society had ever achieved. So delighted was Mr. Fiedler with the results of the co-operation of the two bodies that he immediately requested a reappearance of the Oratorio chorus with his players this season. This will take place next Wednesday night, Beethoven's Ninth or Choral Symphony being the principal number of the program Mr. Fiedler has selected for his fourth concert at the Lyric.

[illegible] SUN

n

ress

[illegible] FEB 10 1

FOURTH CONCERT OF SYM[illegible]Y

Anton Witek Will Be Soloist At Lyric Entertainment.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be given in the Lyric Theatre on next Wednesday evening, will be, musically speaking, the most enjoyable of the series. But two works will be played, and both of them by Beethoven, and these two works, in addition, hold a supremacy that has never been seriously challenged. They are the Concerto, for violin in D major, and the Ninth Symphony, that in D minor, which is commonly known as the "Choral" symphony.

The Concerto will be played by Anto Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. Witek used this work when he made his debut in Boston last fall as soloist. He is a Bohemian, having been born in Saaz, Bohemia, in January, 1872. In 1894, at the age of 22, he became concert master of the famous Philharmonic Orchestra, of Berlin, which post he held until last September, when he surrendered it to come to Boston as the successor to Willy Hess. Witek is an altogether remarkable artist. As a graduate of the Prague Conservatory, he has all the astounding technique which characterizes the violin pupils of that famous institution, but in addition to his technique he has a profound musical intelligence that too often is lacking in violin virtuosos.

STAR

[illegible] 1911

Fourth Boston Symphony.

The supreme master of all musicians, Beethoven, will be the sole composer represented on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be performed in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, February 22. He will be represented only by two works, a concerto for violin and the ninth symphony, commonly known as the choral symphony. The concerto will be played by Anton Witek, the new concerto master of the orchestra.

The Oratorio Society of Baltimore will assist, and the soloists will be Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso.

n NEWS

dress Baltimore, Md.

ate

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS WEDNESDAY

Concerts By Witek And Quartet Selections Feature Program.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, will be, musically speaking, the most enjoyable of the series. But two works will be played, both by Beethoven, which hold a supremacy never seriously challenged. They are the Concerto for Violin in D major and the Ninth Symphony—that in D minor, commonly known as the "choral" symphony.

The Concerto will be played by Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra.

The most successful feature of last year's series of Boston Symphony concerts here was the performance in February of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, in which the orchestra had the admirable assistance of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore, which had been trained by its conductor, Mr. Pache, and a quartet, consisting of Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso. At the performance of this symphony next Wednesday evening the orchestra will have exactly the same artists throughout.

SUN

[illegible] the composer [illegible]termination. W. G. O.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE program of the fourth Boston Symphony concert, which is to be performed in the Lyric next Wednesday night, comprises two works and they the greatest of the immortal legacy of Beethoven. The concert will begin with the concerto for violin and orchestra in D major and it will end with the Ninth Symphony in D minor, including the choral movement. The concerto will be played by Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. In the last movement of the symphony the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore and of a quartet of distinguished singers, comprising Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso.

Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, was born in Saaz, Bohemia, January 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennewitz at Prague, and in 1894 he was chosen concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, which post he surrendered last September to come to Boston. Mr. Witek commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos (by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini). Since 1894 he has given concerts in all European countries and in 1907 Mr. Witek played in Berlin the newly discovered Concerto in A Major of Mozart for the first time, and in 1909 in the same city the newly discovered Violin Concerto in C Major by Haydn, also for the first time. His repertory consists of 27 concertos and 75 concert pieces.

Mr. Witek made his debut as a soloist in Boston with this Beethoven Concerto. His performance has been one of the memorable events of the season. It is long since such enthusiasm has been created in the audiences at Symphony Hall, an enthusiasm which was shared alike by amateur and professional.

om EVE. BULLETIN

dress Philadelphia, Pa.

te

Once more a vocalist will appear with the Philadelphia Orchestra, the first since November 4-5, Margaret Keyes, contralto, being announced as the soloist for the nineteenth pair of concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, another event, and one especially interesting for Philadelphians, being the appearance of Mrs. Celeste Heckscher on the program as a composer. Mrs. Heckscher's composition, which will be played next week for the first time, is a suite, "Dances of the Pyrenees," which is soon to be heard as a ballet feature in this city. It is divided into five parts, and tells a pantomimic story introducing the famous Spanish dances, the first of which is a Seguedilla, the second a fandango, the third a bolero and the fourth a slow waltz, while the finale brings in suggestions of all the various dances that make up the characteristic music for the people in Spain. Miss Keyes, who met with much favor when she was heard here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, substituting at short notice for Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was ill, possesses a big, resonant voice of splendid color in dramatic episodes, while in the smoothly flowing lyrics of a more placid style her art also is very appealing. She will sing at next week's concerts the famous aria of Orpheus, "Che Faro senza Eurydice," from Gluck's opera, "Orpheus and Eurydice." The symphonic feature of the program will be Kalinnikow's G-minor, to be played here for the first time, while Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture is to be the opening number.

[illegible] AMERICAN

ess

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The supreme master of all musicians, Ludwig Van Beethoven, will be the sole composer represented on the fourth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be performed in the Lyric Theater on next Wednesday evening, February 22, and he will be represented only by two works, a concerto for violin and the ninth symphony, commonly known as the choral symphony. The concerto will be played by Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra.

The great success of the performance of choral symphony a year ago induced Mr. Fiedler, at the expense of much extra work of preparation, to give another performance of it this season. This year, at last, he will have the admirable assistance of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore, which has been trained by Mr. Pache. The solists will be the same as last year. Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso.

from AMERICAN

address

ate

Oratorio Society's Concert.

The first appearance of the Baltimore Oratorio Society this season will occur on Wednesday night, when, in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Beethoven's Choral Symphony will be performed. The soloists for the occasion will be Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, basso. This is the same quartet that was heard when the symphony was produced by Mr. Fiedler last year.

Final rehearsals on the symphony were held last week, and now all that remains is the orchestral rehearsal and going over the difficult music with Mr. Fiedler.

EVE. BULLETIN

ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Notes

RETURNING for its fourth concert of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, February 20, will play Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," with Heinrich Warnke, alternate principal 'cellist of the orchestra, and Emil Ferir, viola, as soloists. The second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner, including the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," the "Siegfried Idyll," and the prelude to "Meistersinger."

Paper Clipping Bureau [illegible]

RECORD

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

FEB 12 191[illegible]

The reputation of Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been not a little enhanced by his interpretations of the works of Richard Strauss. Fiedler, while he has due reverence for the classics and the great works of the past, is yet an ardent lover of and believer in the most modern movements in music. Particularly is he an admirer of Richard Strauss, of whom the conductor is an intimate friend. In Boston it has been felt that he achieved the greatest triumph of his career in this country late last spring when he offered "Don Quixote," the least familiar of Strauss' works. Fiedler does it again in Boston on the 17th and 18th of this month, and he has placed it on the Philadelphia program which will be played in the Academy of Music Monday, February 20. The violoncello soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, of the orchestra, while the viola solo will be played by Emil Ferir.

[167]

INQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

MADE A NOTE OF

At the next concert here of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place at the Academy of Music on Monday evening, February 20, the program will include the "Don Quixote" tone poem of Richard Strauss as its leading feature, and its other numbers will be taken from the compositions of Richard Wagner.

Johan Grolle, violinist, and D. Hendrik Exerman, pianist, will give a recital at Witherspoon Hall, under the direction of Miss Virginia Henderson, next Thursday evening, when the program will consist of sonatas by Mozart, Cesar Franck and Guillaume Leken.

There will be a pianoforte recital at 1520 Chestnut street next Tuesday afternoon under the auspices of the Matinee Musical Club.

Mr. Perley Dunn Aldrich, the well-known baritone, gives a recital in Carnegie Hall, New York, on Monday, February 13. He will be assisted by Mrs. Ada Weigel Powers, who will play a group of her own pieces. Mrs. J. Barrison Irvine will play Mr. Aldrich's accompaniments.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Pa.

...International Musical Agency.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play here again on Monday evening, February 20, at the Academy, at 8:15.

The reputation of Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been not a little enhanced by his really extraordinary interpretations of the works of Richard Strauss. Fiedler, while he has due reverence for the classics and the great works of the past, is at the bottom of his heart an ardent lover of and believer in the most modern movements in the art of music. Particularly is he an admirer of Richard Strauss, of whom he is an intimate friend, and to conduct any of Strauss's tone poems is with him decidedly a labor of love. In Boston it has been felt that he achieved the greatest triumph of his career in this country late last spring, when he did the "Don Quixote," the least familiar of Strauss's works. He does it again in Boston on the 17th and 18th of this month, and he has placed it on the Philadelphia programme.

The violoncello soloist will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke, of the orchestra, while the viola solo will be played by Mr. Emil Ferir.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

...Orchestra

Boston Symphony Program

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard at the Academy of Music on the evening of February 20. The chief orchestral feature will be the "Don Quixote" symphonic poem, by Richard Strauss. The cello soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, while the viola solo will be played by Emil Ferir. Max Fiedler will, of course, wield the baton.

Adele Marchesi-Coniglia, soprano, will give a concert in the Bellevue-Stratford ballroom on the evening of February 16. Among the assisting artists will be Anthony D. McNichol, tenor; Hahn Quartet; William Silvano Thunder, accompanist, and C. Behrens. The proceeds of this concert are for the benefit of the Italian mission of Our Lady of the Angels, at Fiftieth and Master streets.

PRESS

...Philadelphia, Pa.

The reputation of Max Fiedler, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been not a little enhanced by his really extraordinary interpretations of the works of Richard Strauss. Fiedler, while he has due reverence for the classics and the great works of the past, is at the bottom of his heart an ardent lover of and believer in the most modern movements in the art of music. Particularly is he an admirer of Richard Strauss, of whom he is an intimate friend, and to conduct any of Strauss' tone poems is with him decidedly a labor of love. In Boston it has been felt that he achieved the greatest triumph of his career in this country late last Spring, when he did the "Don Quixote," the least familiar of Strauss' works. He does it again in Boston on the 17th and 18th of this month and he has placed it on the Philadelphia program which will be played in the Academy of Music, Monday, February 20. The violoncello soloist will be Mr. Heinrich Warnke, of the orchestra, while the viola solo will be played by Mr. Emil Ferir.

...Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 9 1911

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music to-morrow evening, February 20. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the distinguished 'cellist of the Orchestra, who will play the violoncello solo part in Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote," which is the principal item on the program. It was composed in 1897 and its opus number is 35. It was played for the first time at a Gurzenich concert, Cologne, from manuscript, with Franz Wullner as conductor, on March 8, 1898. The first performance in America was by the Chicago Orchestra in Chicago under Theodore Thomas, on January 7, 1899. When Strauss was in this country in February, 1904, he had it on one of his New York programs at one of the concerts he gave with the Wetzler Orchestra in that city and later he conducted the same work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Pension Fund concert in Boston.

"Don Quixote" differs from all the other of Strauss' tone poems in that it comprises an introduction, a set of variations and a finale. Although it is less played than most of his other works, there are not a few who believe that "Don Quixote" represents the highest point of his achievement in symphonic music. It is possible that one of the causes for its apparent neglect is the use in it of a wind machine and the abnormally clever way in which the composer has portrayed the bleating of a flock of sheep, many thinking that both of these are undignified in such works, but it contains passages of surpassing beauty. In all the Strauss works it is doubtful whether there is anything more beautiful than the episode in which "Don Quixote" dreams of the ideal woman; the fifth variation, in which the Knight keeps his vigil, and then the finale, which portrays the death of the gallant Knight. The solo viola which portrays Sancho Panza will be played by Mr. Ferir.

The program begins with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, and the second part will be Wagner—the Funeral March of "Gotterdammerung," the Siegfried Idyl and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Concert

Richard Strauss will be presented at the concert of the Boston Symphony, under the baton of Max Fielder, to be given in the Academy tomorrow night. "Don Quixote," a symphonic poem written in 1897, and first presented here by Wilhelm Gericke, is the work. Heinrich Warnke will play the important cello solo part in the composition.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture will begin the concert, while the balance of the evening will be devoted to Wagner. The "Goetterdaemmerung" funeral march, the "Siegfried Idyll" and the "Meistersinger" prelude will be offered.

* * *

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, of the orchestra, who will play the violoncello solo part in Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote." It was composed in 1897 and was played for the first time at a Guerzenich concert, Cologne, from manuscript, with Franz Wuellner as conductor, on March 8, 1898. The first performance in America was by the Chicago Orchestra, in Chicago, under Theodore Thomas, on January 7, 1899. When Strauss was in this country in February, 1904, he had the work on one of his New York programs and later he conducted the same work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Pension Fund concert in Boston. "Don Quixote" differs from all the other of Strauss' tone poems in that it comprises an introduction, a set of variations and a finale. Although it is less played than most of his other works, there are not a few who believe that "Don Quixote" represents the highest point of his achievement in symphonic music. It is possible that one of the causes for its apparent neglect is the use in it of a wind machine and the way in which the composer has illustrated the bleating of a flock of sheep. The solo viola which portrays Sancho Panza will be played by Ferir.

The program begins with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and the second part will be Wagner—the Funeral Music of "Goetterdammerung," the Siegfried Idyl and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

PUBLIC LEDGER

...Philadelphia, Pa.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, February 20, at 8:15. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the distinguished 'cellist of the orchestra, who will play the violoncello solo part in Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," which is the principal item on the programme. It was composed in 1897, and its opus number is 35. It was played for the first time at a Gurzenich concert, Cologne, from manuscript, with Franz Wullner as conductor, on March 8, 1898. The first performance in America was by the Chicago Orchestra, in Chicago, under Theodore Thomas, on January 7, 1899. When Strauss was in this country in February, 1904, he had it on one of his New York programmes at one of the concerts he gave with the Wetzler Orchestra in that city, and later he conducted the same work with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its pension fund concert in Boston.

INQUIRER

...Philadelphia, Pa.

FEB 9 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music tomorrow evening, February 20. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the distinguished 'cellist of the orchestra, who will play the violoncello solo part in Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," which is the principal item on the program. It was composed in 1897 and its opus number is 35. It was played for the first time at a Gurzenich concert in Cologne from manuscript, with Franz Wullner as conductor, on March 8, 1898. The first performance in America was by the Chicago Orchestra in Chicago under Theodore Thomas on January 7, 1899. The program begins with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture and the second part will be Wagner—the funeral music of "Gotterdammerung," the Siegfried Idyll and the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

From ...Providence R.I.

Address ...

Date ...Feb 11 11

ANOTHER BRILLIANT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Admirably Diversified and Symmetrical Programme Delighted Large Audience.

One of the most pleasing features of the concerts this winter in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been the diversity and symmetry of the programmes offered. Mr. Fiedler, the conductor, seems to have a special aptitude in this direction and the selections that he makes for each concert are so well arranged as to give the acme of pleasure to those who attend and to show in fullest measure the strength and skill of his company of musicians. The fourth concert of the present series, given last night in InfantryHall, was no exception to this rule and the audience, which was again of a size that practically filled the large hall, went away satisfied with the individual numbers and with the well-rounded effect of the whole programme, which was in no respect below the very high level established for the season.

The opening number, Handel's Overture in D-major, No. 1, was a delightful introduction to the longer and more pretentious symphony with its quaint character of an earlier musical period made modern by a rearrangement by Franz Wullner. It is beautiful, melodic and pleases with its first grave and then lighter music. It is a gem and it served admirably and effectively to put the audience in a receptive mood for the heavier work that followed.

The symphony in C-major is one of Schubert's best. It has been called "a storehouse of melody" and it seems to be literally that, for it is full of "tunes" of a bright and lively nature that captivate the ear. It shows Schubert at his best and gives the fullest expression to that fund if melody which is his greatest characteristic as a composer. The audience received this production with intense absorption during its rendition and spontaneous outbursts of applause at the close of each portion.

The closing numbers were two symphonic poems by Saint-Saens that filled up the measure of delight for the audience. "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre" are little masterpieces of that composer's art and are ever popular with lovers of the best in music. The former is particularly sweet and charming and the latter has an originality and wierdness that are fascinating.

It is hardly necessary to say that the work of the orchestra was up to its high standard and left nothing to be desired.

The soloist was Mme. Yolande Mero, the young Hungarian pianist, whose selection was the second concerto in A-major by Franz Liszt. It was natural that she should select one of the productions of this greatest of Magyar composers and she showed complete mastery, both of the instrument and the selection, which was particularly well adapted to her brilliant style. Her playing was marked by a delicacy of touch and at the same time a firmness and force that were admirably contrasted and that were both brought out effectively by the demands of this concerto. She played with ease and freedom of movement and an appreciation of all the variations and moods of the selection. She was accorded warm applause and the audience was reluctant to allow her to go without an encore.

But one more concert remains of the present series and that will not be given until April 4. The programme of last night in detail follows:

Overture in D-major, No. 1.....Handel
Symphony in C-major, No 7.....Schubert
I. Andante: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
Concerto in A-major, No 2, for Pianoforte.....Liszt
Symphonic Poem, No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Op. 31.....Saint-Saens
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "Danse Macabre," Op. 40.....Saint-Saens

JOURNAL
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 12 1911

Two free lectures under the auspices of Brown University and the Rhode Island State Federation of Music Clubs will be given at Manning Hall this week. The first will be by Hans Schneider, Monday afternoon at 4:30, on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert. The second, a talk on the programme of the Kneisel Quartet, will be given by Mrs. George A. Deal, President of the Federation, on Thursday evening. All the musical numbers will be played by the Foster String Quartet, assisted by Mrs. Deal at the piano.

[168]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau

Providence, R. I.
Feb. 11 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra, with Yolande Mero Pianist, Gives Brilliant Programme.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last night, the orchestra being assisted by Mme. Yolande Mero, the talented young Hungarian pianist, who scored here the same brilliant triumph she has achieved elsewhere with the leading orchestras of the country. Conductor Fiedler, whose skill as a programme maker has caused us to look with certainty for interest and variety in his offerings, presented the following selections:

Overture in D-major, No. 1.....Handel
Symphony in C-major, No. 7.....Schubert
I. Andante; Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
Concerto in A-major, No. 2, for Pianoforte.....
Symphonic Poem, No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Op. 31.....Liszt
Symphonic Poem, No. 3, "Danse Macabre," Op. 40.....Saint-Saens

The symphony holds, by general consent, the place of honor in such a programme, and the honor is well deserved when it falls to such a magnificent work as Schubert's in C major. This prodigal outpouring of Schubert's remarkable genius is long—"of a divine length," according to Schumann, who rhapsodized over it—but the hearer gets no impression of prolexity. "Here we have," wrote Schubert's generous and appreciative contemporary, "besides masterly power over the musical technicalities of composition, life in all its phases, color in exquisite gradations, the minutest accuracy and fitness of expression, and, permeating the whole work, a spirit of romance such as we recognize in other works of Franz Schubert." A fine tribute from one great composer to another and a description which could hardly be improved upon.

Other musicians have been equally enthusiastic over the C major symphony. Felix Weingartner declared that in hearing or in conducting it he "became intoxicated with the music." He could think of nothing but "flying about in the clear air flooded with light" that would arouse similar emotions. "Nature has denied us this joy," wrote Weingartner, unconscious of the near and unsuspected approach of actual aviation, "but great works of art give it to us." Certain it is that in this monumental work Schubert displayed to the full the unparalleled melodic gifts and the keen sense of musical proportion upon which his fame largely rests. It only remains to say that the orchestra played it magnificently and in a manner worthy both of the music and their high reputation.

The other orchestral numbers were delightful in themselves and received a like interpretation. Handel's overture served especially to bring out the superb quality of the strings, a point in which the Boston orchestra excels all its rivals. The two well-known numbers by Saint-Saens which closed the programme can hardly be matched as successful and interesting examples of their type and never fail to please an audience.

Mme. Mero played with marked brilliancy, ample power and flawless technic. That she possesses a strong and interesting personality is not to be doubted, and one would wish to hear her in the freedom and variety of a recital programme to estimate the real extent of her powers. She received quite an ovation at the close of her number.

The audience was large, as has been the case at all the previous concerts this season, and much enthusiasm was displayed over the fine performance of the programme. The fifth and last concert by the orchestra will occur on Tuesday evening, April 4.

W. A. P.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

...Providence, R. I.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Yolande Mero, the distinguished Hungarian pianist, who has already made a name here in Providence, will be heard for the first time with orchestra at the fourth Boston Symphony concert, Max Fiedler, conductor, in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening. She will play Liszt's Second Concerto in A major. The sale of seats will open at Steinert's on next Saturday morning.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

...TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 9 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Yolande Mero, the distinguished Hungarian pianist, who has already made a name here, will be heard for the first time with orchestra at the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening. She will play Liszt's Second Concerto in A-major. The sale of seats will open at Steinert's Saturday morning.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

...TRIBUNE
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 14 1911

...Avenue.

In Infantry Hall to-night the fourth Symphony concert of the season will be given, with Yolande Mero, pianist, assisting.

NEWS
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
FEB 11 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA FEB. 14.

That the musical season is rapidly approaching its end is signalled by the fact that the concert which the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, is to give in Infantry hall next Tuesday evening, will be the fourth of the announced five and, therefore, music lovers of this city have but two more opportunities to hear this wonderful organization this year. Once more Mr. Fiedler has arranged a program of exceeding attractiveness. The Symphony, Schubert's in C-major, is one of immortal beauty. Philip Hale, the distinguished Boston critic, has called it "a veritable storehouse of melodies," and it is a fact that there are more "tunes" of real beauty in this single work, the performance of which lasts about 45 minutes, than can be found in all the works of such modern composers as Richard Strauss, Claude Debussy, Max Reger and Giacomo Puccini and all the rest of the modern Italian music makers. The wonder of Schubert never ceases. Always poverty-stricken, a frequenter of inns and taverns, a man of no particular education and, aside from his music, of seemingly few intellectual gifts, in this symphony he gives signs of a greatness which has led many to believe that had a longer life been granted him he would have overshadowed the great Beethoven. By this symphony together with his "Unfinished" symphony and his wonderful songs his claim to immortality is secure.

Two other delightful works on the program are the two symphonic poems of Camille Saint-Saens—"Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre." Both of these works show the great French composer in his most delightful mood. They are marvels of construction and of vivid portraiture. The program begins with Handel's Overture in D-major.

The soloist will be the distinguished Hungarian pianist, Mme. Yolande Mero. She will play Liszt's Concerto in A-major No. 2. The list of works in the proper order is as follows:

Handel—Overture in D-major No. 1.
Schubert—Symphony in C-major No. 7, Op. 92.
Liszt—Concerto in A-major No. 2.
Saint-Saens—Symphonic Poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel."
Saint-Saens — Symphonic Poem, "Danse Macabre."
Mme. Yolande Mero, soloist.

From Providence Journal
Address Providence, R.I.
Date Feb. 15 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT WAS DELIGHTFUL

Another large and distinguished audience attended the fourth concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last evening, in Infantry hall, and, perhaps, the appearance of Mme. Yolande Mero, the brilliant Hungarian pianist, had much to do with the large gathering of music lovers, for her work was a delight in every particular.

Dr. Fiedler, the celebrated conductor of the splendid orchestra, has given Providence people some very acceptable programs this season, and the one given last night was, in the selection made and in the playing, all that could be desired.

The program was:

Handel—Overture in D major, No. 1.
Schubert—Symphony in C major, No. 7, Op. 92.
Liszt—Concerto in A major, No. 2.
Saint-Saens—Symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel."
Saint-Saens—Symphonic poem, "Danse Macabre."

With such a program and such an aggregation of players, it is difficult indeed to pick out any particular gem, but, perhaps, it was in the Schubert symphony that the great capabilities of the orchestra were shown. Difficulties abound in this work, difficulties in technique, which might will deter a conductor who is not thoroughly assured that his players are in every way competent, but Dr. Fiedler had no cause for anxiety, and the beautiful C major symphony was magnificently played.

Mme. Mero, as the soloist, played, as she always plays, with a brilliancy that is truly remarkable, and it would have been hard to find anything better adapted to bring out her wonderful technique than the Liszt concerto in A major. She is truly a pianist of great ability, unusual power, and plainly possesses the true artistic temperament. The large amount of applause bestowed upon her was most truly deserved.

The other numbers on the program were indeed a treat, and delightful was the playing of the Handel overture in D major, which afforded an opportunity to demonstrate the strength of the orchestra in string work. The Saint-Saens numbers were also played in a charming manner.

The fifth and last concert of the series will occur on Tuesday, April 4.

From
Address
Date

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Yolande Mero, Hungarian Pianist, to be Soloist Tuesday Evening.

With Yolande Mero, the distinguished Hungarian pianist and soloist, and Schubert's wonderful C-major symphony as the principal work, Mr. Fiedler's programme for the fourth Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening is quite up to the high level of programme-making that has been established by him in the past. After this concert the orchestra comes only once more to Providence and those who have not heard it this year should not miss the two opportunities remaining. Schubert's C-major Symphony has been called the symphony of "divine length," but that name was given to it before the modern composer began to cover scoring paper with much ink. It it not so long by several minutes as the Rachminoff symphony which was played here this winter, nor is it so long as a number of Strauss and Reger works. Moreover, it is one unceasing fountain of wonderful melodies. No work in the whole literature of music has so many "tunes" of real beauty. The wonderful genius of Schubert seems to have poured itself into it and many believe that had Schubert been granted a longer life he would have overshadowed the great Beethoven, for in this C-major symphony for the first time he seems to have mastered symphonic form and to be able to arrange his wonderful fund of melody in orderly fashion.

The concert will begin with an overture by Handel in D-major, a quaint 18th century work which has been arranged for modern use by the late Prof. Wullner, the father of Dr. Wullner, the distinguished singer of songs. At the end of the programme will come two Saint-Saens symphonic poems, both of them of exceeding popularity—"Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre." Both are masterpieces and particularly the "Spinning Wheel" has few rivals in the field of programme music.

The soloist will be Mme. Yolande Mero, the young Hungarian pianist who made so favorable an impression when she was here in recital a year ago. Mme. Mero is now in a sense an American, as since her last visit here she has married an American. She has all the fire and brilliancy of the Magyar race and she will play the second concerto in A-major of the greatest of Magyar composers, Franz Liszt.

The programme in its proper order is as follows: Overture in D-major, No. 1, Handel; Symphony in C-major, No. 7, op. 92, Schubert; Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-major, No. 2, Liszt; "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens; soloist, Yolande Mero.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
TRIBUNE
FEB 14 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth and last concert but one by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be given in Infantry Hall to-night. The soloist will be the distinguished Hungarian pianist, Mme. Yolande Mero and the programme is as follows: Overture in D-major, No. 1, Handel; Symphony in C-major, No. 7, op. 92, Schubert; Concerto for piano in A-major, No. 2, Liszt; "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," Saint-Saens; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saens.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau
Symphony Concert.

A great audience assembled in Infantry Hall for the fourth concert of the season last evening. In the gallery noted Mr. William B. Weeden, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Smith, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mrs. W B. M. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Prof. Lorenzo Sears, Miss Sears, Mr. Frederick W. Allen, Mr. Richmond Allen, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Judge and Mrs. William H. Sweetland, Mrs. E. R. Trowbridge, Mr. Thomas Crosby, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. Willard C. Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Towne, Mrs. Charles W. Alexander, Miss Fanny Alexander, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Miss Ada Johnson, Mrs. Grace L. Johnson, the Misses Hall, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Rooke, Mr. and Mrs. George A. Freeman, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Miss Dorothy Bowen, Mrs. William H. Reynolds, Miss Ethel Parks, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Miss Helen M. Capron.

Valentine Party.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau
FEB 12 1911

Boston Orchestra's Last Concert.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at the Parsons Theater on Monday evening, February 27, the third and last concert of the season. Ferruccio Busoni, the greatest living performer of Liszt's works for piano, will play that master's favorite concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat major. The coming of Busoni has been anticipated by many above any other musical event, his great successes in New York, Boston and elsewhere having done much to create this desire. Of the orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler's leadership, there is little left unsaid. An admirable choice of program, and the performance by a body of virtuosi rarely equalled, make these concerts the first events in our musical life each season. Mr. Fiedler's selections for the coming entertainment are mentioned in the advertising section of "The Courant." Seats will be on sale this morning at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

[169]

Bostoner Symphonie Orchester.

Wird am nächsten Mittwoch in der Lyric Beethoven's wunderbare Neunte Symphonie gemeinsam mit der Baltimore Oratorien-Gesellschaft zur Vorführung bringen. — Anton Witek zum ersten Male der Solist.

Das vierte Conzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters, welches am nächsten Mittwoch Abend in der Lyric gegeben wird, ist in musikalischer Hinsicht das anregendste von der ganzen Serie. Es werden nur zwei Werke gespielt werden, und zwar beide von Beethoven. Sie nehmen in der musikalischen Welt eine außerordentlich hohe Stellung ein. Es sind dies das Violin-Conzert in D-Dur und die Neunte Symphonie in D-Moll, welche geminhin als die „Choral-Symphonie" bekannt ist.

Das Violin-Conzert wird von Herrn Anton Witek, dem neuen Conzertmeister des Orchesters, gespielt werden. Witek führte sich mit diesem Werk letzten Herbst in Boston ein und sein Auftreten war eine der Sensationen der gegenwärtigen Saison in Boston. Obwohl dieses Conzert dort in den letzten dreißig Jahren vielfach von hervorragenden Künstlern gespielt wurde, scheint es doch dort die allgemeine Ansicht gewesen zu sein, daß man das Conzert noch niemals zuvor in solcher vollkommenen Vollendung gehört hat. Gewiß ist, daß die Bostoner Symphonie-Halle selten einen so großen Enthusiasmus gesehen hat, als nach Witek's Vortrag, sowohl bei der öffentlichen General-Probe, wie am Conzertabend selbst.

Witek ist ein Böhme; er wurde in Saaz, Böhmen, im Januar 1872 geboren. Im Jahre 1894 wurde er als Zweiundzwanzigjähriger Conzertmeister des berühmten Philharmonischen Orchesters in Berlin und behielt diese hervorragende Stellung bis zum September letzten Jahres bei, als er als Nachfolger von Willy Heß nach Boston kam. Witek ist ein bewundernswürdiger Künstler. Als ein Schüler des Prager Conservatoriums verfügt er über die erstaunliche Technik, deren sich alle Violin-Zöglinge dieses berühmten Lehrinstitutes erfreuen können; gleichzeitig aber besitzt er eine tiefe musikalische Intelligenz, wie man sie nicht immer bei Violin-Virtuosen vorfindet. Während Paganini ihm keinerlei Schwierigkeiten bereiten, ist er besonders stark in den großen Klassikern seines Instrumentes. In seinem Repertoire hat er 27 große Conzerte und 75 Conzertstücke, und der Stradivarius, auf welchem er spielen wird, ist eines der kostbaren existirenden Instrumente. Als er ihn letzten Herbst in's Land brachte, wurde sein Werth auf 48,000 Mark oder $12,000 abgeschätzt.

Das erfolgreichste Ereigniß der letztjährigen Saison des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters war die Vorführung von Beethoven's Neunter Symphonie im Februar vorigen Jahres unter der bewunderungswürdigen Mitwirkung der Baltimorer Oratorien-Gesellschaft, welche von ihrem Dirigenten Prof. Joseph Pache einstudirt war, und eines Quartetts welches aus Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Sopran, Frl. Janet Spencer, Contralt, Daniel Beddoe, Tenor, und Claude Cunningham, Baß, bestand. Bei der Vorführung der Neunten Symphonie am nächsten Mittwoch wird das Orchester genau die gleichen Solisten haben, wie im Vorjahre. Die Vorführung wird dieses Jahr auf vielfach geäußerte Wünsche hin wiederholt. Solche Wünsche wurden Dirigent Max Fiedler gegenüber schon im vorigen Frühjahr ausgesprochen. Wenn auch schon die vorjährige Aufführung bemerkenswerth war, so sollte die diesjährige thatsächlich eine noch vollendetere sein, da Chor und Solisten jetzt genau mit der Auffassung des Dirigenten vertraut sind. Es war für die Baltimorer, die dem vorjährigen Conzert beiwohnten, ein erlesener Genuß, zu hören, mit welch' spielender Leichtigkeit die Oratorien-Gesellschaft die großen Schwierigkeiten des Tonwerkes überwand, und allgemein sieht man der Aufführung am Mittwoch mit größten Erwartungen entgegen.

Baltimore Journal, Mittwoch, den 15. Februar 1911.

Boston Symphonie-Orchester

Beethoven wird das Scepter in dem vierten hiesigen Conzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters schwingen, welches am Mittwoch, den 22. Februar, Abends in der Lyric stattfinden wird. Das Hauptereigniß des Abends wird Bethoven's unsterbliche Neunte Symphonie unter Mitwirkung der hiesigen Oratorien-Gesellschaft und der hervoragenden Solisten Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Janet Spencer, Daniel Beddoe und Claude Cunningham sein. Die Wiedergabe der Symphonie im vorigen Jahre war ein so außerordentlicher Erfolg, daß sie dieses Jahr auf Grund zahlreicher Wünsche wiederholt wird.

Die einzige andere Programm-Nummer wird Beethoven's ebenfalls unvergängliches Violin-Conzert in D-Dur sein. In der Wiedergabe desselben wird sich Anton Witek, der neue Conzertmeister des Orchesters, als Solist in Baltimore einführen und wird jedenfalls den gleichen Sensationserfolg erringen, wie bei seinem Auftreten in anderen Städten.

STAR.
WASHINGTON, D. C.
FEB 22 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston's famous Symphony Orchestra was heard at its fourth matinee in Washington at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon. The house, as usual, was taxed to its capacity, and close interest was manifested by the audience.

Beginning with Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7, with its four variant and beautiful movements, the program followed with Dvorak's "Waldesruhe" and Boellman's symphonic variations for the cello, by the soloist, Alwin Schroeder, and closed with two Saint-Saen's numbers, exquisitely rendered, Symphonic Poem No. 1, ("Omphale's Spinning Wheel") and Symphonic Poem No. 3, (the "Dance Macabre").

Mr. Schroeder's numbers were played with delicacy and feeling. "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" was given with a beauty of tone and sympathetic grace all the more effective for its simplicity. His technique appeared to better advantage in the "Dance Macabre", which was beautifully rendered.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Richard Wagner, above all others, created the need for the enlarged modern orchestra, and, in fact, has used it with greater effectiveness than any composer of the past or present. His wonderful music dramas are heard infrequently outside the very few cities where opera is maintained as a home institution. The presentation of excerpts in concert form is therefore always welcomed. A long desired opportunity to hear several of the more famous numbers from the works of this great master will be offered at the Parsons Theater, Monday evening, February 27, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, will render the "Funeral Music" from "The Dusk of the Gods" and "Wotan's Farewell" and "Magic Fire" music from "Walkure." The performance of these magnificent selections will serve as a brilliant closing of a series of memorable concerts by the Boston musicians and in all probability will be witnessed by the largest audience of the season. Seats are on sale at John M. Gallup & Co.'s music store.

From POST
Washington, D. C.

MRS. TAFT occupied a box for the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, at the National Theater. Her guests were the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Ballinger, Miss Riddle, and Mrs. Buckner Randolph.

Baltimore Journal, Sam stag, den 18. Februar 1911.

Bostoner Symphonie Orchester.

Wird am nächsten Mittwoch in der Lyric Beethoven's wunderbare Neunte Symphonie gemeinsam mit der Baltimore Oratorien-Gesellschaft zur Vorführung bringen. — Anton Witek zum ersten Male der Solist.

Das vierte Conzert des Bostoner Symphonie - Orchesters, welches am nächsten Mittwoch Abend in der Lyric gegeben wird, ist in musikalischer Hinsicht das anregendste von der ganzen Serie. Es werden nur zwei Werke gespielt werden, und zwar beide von Beethoven. Sie nehmen in der musikalischen Welt eine außerordentlich hohe Stellung ein. Es sind dies das Violin - Conzert in D- Dur und die Neunte Symphonie in D-Moll, welche gemeinhin als die „Choral-Symphonie" bekannt ist.

Das Violin - Conzert wird von Herrn Anton Witek, dem neuen Conzertmeister des Orchesters, gespielt werden. Witek führte sich mit diesem Werk letzten Herbst in Boston ein und sein Auftreten war eine der Sensationen der gegenwärtigen Saison in Boston. Obwohl dieses Conzert dort in den letzten dreißig Jahren vielfach von hervorragenden Künstlern gespielt wurde, scheint es doch dort die allgemeine Ansicht gewesen zu sein, daß man das Conzert noch niemals zuvor in solcher vollkommenen Vollendung gehört hat. Gewiß ist, daß die Bostoner Symphonie-Halle selten einen so großen Enthusiasmus gesehen hat, als nach Witek's Vortrag, sowohl bei der öffentlichen General - Probe, wie am Conzertabend selbst.

Witek ist ein Böhme; er wurde in Saaz, Böhmen, im Januar 1872 geboren. Im Jahre 1894 wurde er als Zweiundzwanzigjähriger Conzertmeister des berühmten Philharmonischen Orchesters in Berlin und behielt diese hervorragende Stellung bis zum September letzten Jahres bei, als er als Nachfolger von Willy Heß nach Boston kam. Witek ist ein bewunderungswürdiger Künstler. Als ein Schüler des Prager Conservatoriums verfügt er über die erstaunliche Technik, deren sich alle Violin - Zöglinge dieses berühmten Lehrinstitutes erfreuen können; gleichzeitig aber besitzt er eine tiefe musikalische Intelligenz, wie man sie nicht immer bei Violin - Virtuosen vorfindet. Während die complizirtesten Werke von Paganini ihm keinerlei Schwierigkeiten bereiten, ist er besonders stark in den großen Klassikern seines Instrumentes. In seinem Repertoire hat er 27 große Conzerte und 75 Conzertstücke, und der Stradivarius, auf welchem er spielen wird, ist eines der kostbaren existirenden Instrumente. Als er ihn letzten Herbst in's Land brachte, wurde sein Werth auf 48,000 Mark oder $12,000 abgeschätzt.

Das erfolgreichste Ereigniß der letztjährigen Saison des Bostoner Symphonie - Orchesters war die Vorführung von Beethoven's Neunter Symphonie im Februar vorigen Jahres unter der bewunderungswürdigen Mitwirkung der Baltimorer Oratorien - Gesellschaft, welche von ihrem Dirigenten Prof. Joseph Pache einstudirt war, und eines Quartetts, welches aus Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Sopran, Frl. Janet Spencer, Contralt, Daniel Beddoe, Tenor, und Claude Cunningham, Baß, bestand. Bei der Vorführung der Neunten Symphonie am nächsten Mittwoch wird das Orchester genau die gleichen Solisten haben, wie im Vorjahre. Die Vorführung wird dieses Jahr auf vielfach geäußerte Wünsche hin wiederholt. Solche Wünsche wurden Dirigent Max Fiedler gegenüber schon im vorigen Frühjahr ausgesprochen. Wenn auch schon die vorjährige Aufführung bewundernswerth war, so sollte die diesjährige thatsächlich eine noch vollendetere sein, da Chor und Solisten jetzt genau mit der Auffassung des Dirigenten vertraut sind. Es war für die Baltimorer, die dem vorjährigen Conzert beiwohnten, ein erlesener Genuß, zu hören, mit welch' spielender Leichtigkeit die Oratorien - Gesellschaft die großen Schwierigkeiten des Tonwerkes überwand, und allgemein sieht man der Aufführung am Mittwoch mit größten Erwartungen entgegen.

HOLYOKE DAILY TRANSCRIPT.

, FEBRUARY 16, 1911.

SYMPHONY CONCERT MARCH 27TH.

The announced coming of the Boston Symphony orchestra to Springfield on March 27th, has been a source of great satisfaction to the musical public of this vicinity, for it seemed hardly right that a year should go by without hearing at least once this extraordinary organization. The season in general for the orchestra has been the most successful in its history and never has such enthusiasm been shown over its concerts. Its recent tour in the Middle West turned out to be a series of remarkable ovations. Writers of the press seemed to be unable to find words with which to express their opinion of the beautiful playing.

Mr. Fiedler can be relied upon to give one of his extremely interesting programs.

HERALD

Washington, D. C.

ess

Mrs. Taft occupied a box at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She was accompanied by the Secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Ballinger, Mrs. B. M. Randolph, and Miss Biddle.

MONITOR, BOSTON
FEBRUARY 25, 1911.

MUSIC NOTES.

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the English contralto, will be the soloist at the seventeenth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra, Friday afternoon, March 3, and Saturday evening, March 4. She will sing two numbers, the first being songs with orchestra from Elgar's cycle, "Sea Pictures," and the second, the air, "Divinites du Styx," from Gluck's "Alceste." The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," which has not been played here since Dr. Muck's time. There will be two novelties: an "Overture to a Gascon Comedy," by Richard Mandl, and "The Swan of Tuonela," by the Finnish composer, Sibelius. Weber's overture to "Euryanthe" will conclude the program.

The sixth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theater Thursday evening, March 2. The program will be that which is played at this week's Boston concerts; the soloist will be Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

The pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be given Sunday evening, March 12, at 8 o'clock, in Symphony hall. Florencio Constantino of the Boston opera company has offered his services for the evening. This will be the first appearance of one of the artists of the Boston opera with the Symphony orchestra. Mr. Fiedler's intention is to make a program of rather more popular character than usual; and he expects one of the numbers to be Strauss' waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube" in its original form, with male chorus.

The pension fund institution is one of the elements that help make for the permanency of the orchestra. It was organized in Mr. Gericke's second term and is now paying 18 stipends.

BOSTON TRAVELER
FEBRUARY 25, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto, will be the soloist at the 17th rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will sing two numbers, the first being two songs, with orchestra, from Elgar's cycle "Sea Pictures," and the second, the air, "Divinities du Styx," from Gluck's "Alceste." The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," which has not been played since Dr. Muck's time. At this concert, as then, the solo viola will be played by Mr. Ferir. Mr. Fiedler will place two novelties on the programme, an "Overture to a Gascon Comedy," by Richard Mandl, and Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela." The other number will be the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

CAMBRIDGE CONCERT.

The sixth concert of the Symphony orchestra in Cambridge will be given in Sanders' Theatre on next Thursday evening, March 2. Mme. Kirkby-Lunn will be the soloist.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY,
FEBRUARY 25, 1911

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

NEXT Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Fiedler purposes to revive Berlioz's highly romantic symphony of the wanderings through Italy of Byron's still more romantic Harold—music that is a succession of moody tone-pictures, with the melancholy viola sounding through and around them for the voice of the pilgrim. Mr. Ferir, of course, will play it. For further tone-picturing, Sibelius's "Swan of Tuomela" will be performed for the first time here. Now, in Finnish legend, Tuomela is Hades, and those wending their way to the final abode had to traverse nine seas and one river—the equivalent of the Styx—whereon sang and floated the sacred swan.

the long-necked, graceful swimmer,
Swimming in the black death-river,
In the sacred stream and whirlpool.

Another new piece, this time by an obscure composer, is Richard Mandl's overture to a Gascon comedy. It begins the programme as a classic overture ends it—Weber's to his opera, "Euryanthe," which completes the biennial round of Weber's three surviving preludes. Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, the English alto, who is one of the distinguished singers of Covent Garden, who has been a member of the company of the Metropolitan Opera House, and who has sung often in America in concert and oratorio, will assist the orchestra. Her pieces are Alceste's apostrophe to the gods of the Styx from Gluck's like-named opera and two of the songs (with orchestra) that Elgar calls "Sea Pictures." On Thursday evening, in Sanders Theatre at Harvard, for the sixth of the concerts of the orchestra in Cambridge, Mr. Fiedler, his men, and Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, will be heard in the programme just specified.

Sunday evening, March 12, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler and with the assistance of Mr. Constantino, the tenor of the Boston Opera House, for the increase of its pension fund. The singing of Strauss's "Blue Danube" Waltz by a male choir from the Cecilia will make the final number on the programme.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1911.

FOR PENSION FUND.

Constantino to Sing in Aid of the Symphony Institution.

Signor Florencio Constantino, with the co-operation of Henry Russell, director of Boston Opera, has offered his services as soloist at the concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, March 12, in aid of the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra. The offer was accepted with much pleasure by the committee, which has charge of the affair, and Signor Constantino's presence will add much to the attraction of the concert.

The fund of the Pension Institution of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is greatly in need of additions. Practically its only sources of income are from the proceeds of the two concerts which are given each year and from the dues of the members.

SUNDAY GLOBE—
FEBRUARY 26, 1911

Novelties to be Heard at The Symphony Concerts.

The name of Richard Mandl will appear on the program of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week for the first time. His work to be played is an "Overture to a Gascon Comedy." The musical dictionaries are silent as to his dwelling place and his identity.

"The Swan of Tuonela" will be another tone poem by the Finnish Sibelius to be heard in Boston for the first time although it has been announced before.

This is the first of Sibelius' Two Legends from the "Kalevala." The "Kalevala" is the national epic of Finland. This treasure house of myths and darkly fanciful lore derives its name from Kaleva, "the land of plenty and happiness," whence went forth the heroes Wainamoinen, Ilmarinen and Lemminkainen to do battle with the foes of the cold country of the north—Pohjola and Tuonela, the land of death.

About Tuonela there flows a deep and gloomy river. Upon the bosom of these dark waters there floats a swan who sings his weird song of death the while. In the orchestra this is alloted to the English horn.

Otherwise the program will include Berlioz' symphony, "Harold in Italy," not played at these concerts since Dr Muck's time. Mr Ferir will play the viola solo. The other orchestral number will be the "Euryanthe" overture.

The soloist will be Mme Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English Contralto from Covent Garden, who appears with the orchestra in Boston for the first time in a number of years. She will sing two numbers from Elgar's Cycle of Songs, "Sea Pictures" and the air "Divinites du Styx" from Gluck's "Alceste."

Cambridge Symphony Concert.

The sixth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders theatre next Thursday evening. The program will be the same as that which is to be played at the Boston concerts next Friday and Saturday and the soloist will be Mme Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto.

Pension Fund Concert .

Sig Florencio Constantino of the Boston opera company has performed the graceful act of offering his services as soloist at the concert to be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, March 12, in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra. The offer was accepted with much pleasure by the committee which has charge of the affair, and Sig Constantino's presence will add much to the attraction of the concert.

The full program has not yet been arranged, but as announced some time ago, it is expected that one of the numbers will be the "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz of Johann Strauss in its original form, that is to say, sung by a male chorus.

HERALD, BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 26, 1911.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Fiedler has placed two novelties on the 17th Symphony program, which is to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The first of these is an "Overture to a Gascon Chivalric Drama," by Richard Mandl, and the other is Sibelius's short tone-poem, "The Swan of Tuonela." Mandl's name is unknown here, but Sibelius has in the last few years grown to be one of the most popular composers whose works appear on Symphony programs, and any unfamiliar composition of his is always awaited with interest. The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," which has not been played here since Dr. Muck's time. The solo viola part will be played by that admirable artist, Mr. Emil Ferir. The other orchestral number will be the "Euryanthe" overture of Weber.

The soloist will be Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto, who will appear with the orchestra in Boston for the first time since 1903.

The program is as follows in order:
Richard Mandl, Overture to a Gascon Chivalric Drama.
(First time in Boston.)
Berlioz, Symphony No. 3, "Harold in Italy."
Elgar, Two Songs from the Cycle "Sea Pictures."
Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela."
(First time in Boston.)
Gluck, Air, "Divini s du Styx," from "Alceste."
Weber, Overture, "Euryanthe."

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Florenccio Constantino, with the kindly co-operation of Henry Russell, director of the Boston opera, has gracefully offered his services as soloist at the concert to be given in Symphony Hall or Sunday evening, March 12, in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra. The offer was accepted with much pleasure by the committee which has charge of the affair, and Mr. Constantino's presence will add greatly to the attraction of the concert. The full program has not yet been arranged. It is expected that one of the numbers will be the "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz of Johann Strauss in its original form, that is to say, sung by a male chorus.

The usual concerts for the benefit of this fund are late this year because the work of the orchestra up to the present time has been so exacting and exhausting that Mr. Fiedler has not felt it possible to prepare a program. As an illustration of the activities of the orchestra, in the 20 days of February 19 concerts will have been given. In addition to these must be added the time devoted to rehearsals and to travelling.

The fund of the pension institution of the Boston Symphony orchestra is greatly in need of additions. Practically its only sources of income are from the proceeds of the two concerts which are given each year and from the dues of the members. Contrary to the general belief, the Pension Fund Institution has no connection with the Boston Symphony orchestra as such, as it is an independent organization, maintained by and participated in by the active members of the orchestra. It was formed a matter of a dozen years ago largely through the inspiration of Mr. Gericke, who in his wisdom saw that not only would such a fund be a most valuable adjunct to the orchestra, but that it would be a most valuable one for the members themselves. All of the greater orchestras in Europe have such funds. The one in aid of the Gewandnaus in Leipsic amounts to over $1,000,000. The formation of this institution has made it much easier for the management to secure musicians of proper calibre from Europe when vacancies have occurred because the musician is particularly in need of a pension when his career of usefulness is ended. Music is the most exacting of the arts and even the humbler members of the profession must devote their entire lives to it to attain adequate proficiency. As a result of this rarely does it happen that a musician when his usefulness is gone in his art has anything else to turn to as a means of livelihood. Moreover, the demands of modern music are such that the period of usefulness of a musician is constantly shortening. Especially true is this of players of wind instruments, who, since modern composers have been at work, find their lips give out much sooner than in the old days and that retirement stares them in the face when other men are just in the prime of life.

Already the pension institution has a list of 18 pensioners. Each year this number must increase, and in order that the principal of the fund may not be touched, it must be so enlarged that the income will be sufficient to cover the demands on it. In the past the patrons of the Symphony orchestra have been most generous in regard to the concerts given for this fund, and if it was necessary in the past that such aid be given, it will be still more so in the future. The full program will be announced in a few days.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE.

The sixth Symphony concert in Cambridge will be given in Sanders Theatre on next Thursday evening, March 2. The program will be exactly the same as that which is played at the Boston concerts on next Friday and Saturday, and the soloist will by Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, the distinguished English contralto. The program is as follows:
Richard Mandl, Overture to a Gascon Chivalric Drama.
(First time in Cambridge.)
Berlioz, Symphony No. 3, "Harold in Italy."
(Solo viola, Mr. Ferir.)
Elgar, Songs from the Cycle "Sea Pictures."
Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela."
(First time in Cambridge.)
Gluck, Air from "Alceste," "Divinites du Styx."
Weber, Overture, "Euryanthe."

SUNDAY POST,
FEBRUARY 26, 1911

Pension Fund Concert

Florencio Constantino, with the kindly co-operation of Mr. Henry Russell, director of the Boston Opera, has gracefully offered his services as soloist at the concert to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, March 12, in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra. The offer was accepted with much pleasure by the committee which has charge of the affair, and Mr. Constantino's presence will add much to the attraction of the concert. The full programme has not yet been arranged, but as announced some time ago, it is expected that one of the numbers will be the "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz of Johann Strauss in its original form, that is to say, sung by a male chorus.

The usual concerts for the benefit of this fund are very late this year, because the work of the orchestra up to the present time has been so exacting and exhausting that Mr. Fiedler has not felt it possible to properly prepare a programme. As an illustration of the activities of the orchestra, in 20 days of February, 19 concerts have been given. In addition to these must be added the time devoted to rehearsals and to travelling. The full programme of the concert on the 9th will soon be announced.

The programme of the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening:

Overture to a Gascon Comedy....Richard Mandl
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3, "Harold in Italy"....Berlioz
Two Songs from the Cycle "Sea Pictures"
.....Elgar
"The Swan of Tuonela".....Sibelius
(First time in Boston.)
Air, "Divinites du Styx," from "Alceste"
.....Gluck
Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Soloist—Madame Kirkby-Lunn.

BOSTON JOURNAL
FEBRUARY 26, 1911.

Symphony Program

Mr. Fiedler has placed two novelties on the Symphony program which is to be played next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The first of these is an "Overture to a Gascon Comedy," by Richard Mandl, and the other is Sibelius's short tone-poem, "The Swan of Tuonela." The soloist will be Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the English contralto, who appears with the orchestra in Boston for the first time in a number of years. The program is as follows:

Overture to a Gascon comedy...Richard Mandl
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 3 "Harold in Italy"....Berlioz
Two songs from the cycle "Sea Pictures"
Elgar
"The Swan of Tuonela".....Sibelius
(First time in Boston.)
Air, "Divinities du Styx," from "Alceste"
Gluck
Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber

Pension Fund Concert

Florencio Constantino, the noted tenor of the Boston Opera House, has offered his services as soloist at the concert to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, March 12, in aid of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra. The full program has not yet been arranged, but as announced some time ago, it is expected that one of the numbers will be the "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz of Johann Strauss in its original form, that is to say, sung by a male chorus.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTIS
FEBRUARY 28, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK TODAY FROM ITS TRIP

The Symphony Orchestra returns from its fourth Southern trip this morning, having given the last concert of the season in Hartford last evening. The usual success has attended this series of concerts, and as the season draws to an end the promise of the early fall that it would be the most successful of the history of the Orchestra seems to be fulfilled. The principal features of this last trip were the performance in Baltimore of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and the performances in Philadelphia and New York of Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." It would be difficult to find words of more enthusiastic praise than were given to the Orchestra by the New York critics after they had played Strauss's difficult tone poem. The symphony for this week's concerts will be Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," with Mr. Ferir as the solo viola. The novelties will be an Overture by Richard Mandl and Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela." The soloist will be Madame Kirkby-Lunn, who will sing two of Elgar's "Sea Pictures" and the aria, "Divinites du Styx" by Gluck.

BOSTON POST,
FEBRUARY 28, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK FROM 4TH TRIP

The Symphony Orchestra returns from its fourth Southern trip this morning, having given the last concert of the season in Hartford last evening.

The usual success has attended this series of concerts and the season promises to be the most successful of the history of the orchestra. The symphony for this week's concerts will be Berlioz' "Harold in Italy" with Mr. Ferir as the solo viola. The novelties will be an overture by Richard Mandl and Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela." The soloist will be Madame Kirkby-Lunn who will sing two of Elgar's "Sea Pictures" and the aria, "Divinities du Styx" by Gluck.

THE BOSTON HERALD,
FEBRUARY 28, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA BACK.

The Symphony orchestra returns from its fourth southern trip this morning, having given the last concert of the season in Hartford last evening. The usual success has attended this series of concerts, and as the season draws to an end the promise of the early fall that it would be the most successful of the history of the orchestra seems to be fulfilled. The principal features of this last trip were the performance in Baltimore of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony and the performance in Philadelphia and New York of Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." It would be difficult to find words of more enthusiastic praise than were given to the orchestra by the New York critics after they had played Strauss's difficult tone-poem. The symphony for this week's concerts will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with Mr. Ferir as the solo viola. The novelties will be an overture by Richard Handl and Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela." The soloists will be Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, who will sing two of Elgar's "Sea Pictures" and the aria, "Divinites du Styx," by Gluck.

THE BOSTON TRAVELER
FEBRUARY 28, 1911

SYMPHONY IS BACK FROM LONG TOUR

The Symphony orchestra returned from its fourth southern trip this morning, having given the last concert of the season in Hartford last evening. The usual success has attended this series of concerts and as the season draws to an end the promise of the early fall that it would be the most successful of the history of the orchestra seems to be fulfilled. The principal features of this last trip were the performances in Philadelphia and New York of Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" and the performance in Baltimore of Beethoven's ninth symphony.

The symphony for this week's concerts will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with Mr. Ferir as the solo viola. The novelties will be an overture by Richard Mandl and Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela." The soloist will be Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, who will sing two of Elgar's "Sea Pictures" and the aria "Divinites du Styx," by Gluck.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
FEBRUARY 28, 1911

The Symphony orchestra returned from its fourth southern trip this morning. The principal features of the trip were the performances in Philadelphia and New York of Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" and the performance in Baltimore of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

* * *

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY,
MARCH 2, 1911

News of Music

A CHEERFUL note from Mr. Chadwick corrects an innocent error in the Transcript of Saturday. The despatch that recited the award of prizes in the recent competition of the National Federation of Music Clubs suggested that Mr. Chadwick received his for his familiar "Symphonic Suite" that was played here in Dr. Muck's time. In fact he received the prize for a wholly new composition, in the same form and in the key of E-flat. The music is as yet unpublished and unperformed, but Mr. Fiedler has seven more Symphony Concerts before him, and he has played little music this season, by American composers.

BOSTON JOURNAL
MARCH 2, 1911

Madame Kirkby-Lunn has made a slight change in the selections announced for her to sing at the Symphony concerts this week on tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Her first number will be two of Elgar's "Sea pictures," "Sabbath Morning at Sea," as already announced, and "Where Coral Lies," the latter being substituted for the "Slumber Song," which was originally announced. She will sing also the air "Divinites du Styx," from Gluck's "Alceste." The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" and the two novelties will be Mandl's "Overture to a Goscon Comedy," and Sibelius's "The Swan of Tuonela." The concert will end with the "Euryanthe" overture.

THE BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 2, 1911

MUSIC NOTES.

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn has made a slight change in her songs for the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. Her first song will be Elgar's "Sabbath Morning at Sea," as already announced, and "Where Coral Lies" instead of "Slumber Song," originally announced. She will sing also the air, "Divinites du Styx," from Gluck's "Alceste." The symphony will be Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," and the two novelties will be Mandl's overture to a Gascon comedy and Sibelius's "The Swan of Tuonela." The concert will end with the "Euryanthe" overture.

GLOBEMARCH 2. 1911

Mme Kirkly-Lunn will be the soloist this week at the symphony concerts. Her selections will be "Sea Pictures" and "Sabbath Morning at Sea," by Elgar, and an aria from Gluck's "Alceste." Mandl's overture to a Gascon comedy and "The Swan of Tuonela," by Sibelius, will be the novelties. "Harold in Sicily," Berlioz, and Weber's "Euryanthe" will complete the program.

TRANSCRIPT
MARCH 3, 1911

Mrs. Rider-Kelsey, the soprano, of rich voice and admirable skill, who has sung here seldom of late in view of her place in American concert-rooms, is likely to be the singer at the Symphony Concerts of April 21 and 22, in lieu of Miss Destinn, who must remain in the company of the Metropolitan for its tour.

THE BOSTON GLOBE
MARCH 4, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Mme Kirkby-Lunn Appears as the Soloist.

Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela" Played For First Time in Boston.

The program of the 17th symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Richard Mandl, overture to a Gascon Chivalrie Drama (first time in Boston); Berlioz, "Harold in Italy"; Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela" (first time in Boston); Weber, "Eurganthe" overture. Mme Kirkby-Lunn, the soloist, sang "Where Corals Lie" and "Sabbath Morning at Sea," two songs from the cycle of five by Elgar, called "Sea Pictures."

"The Swan of Tuonela" of Sibelius, announced last season but heard here yesterday for the first time, is another legend from the Finnish national epic the "Kalevala." The music of Sibelius already performed, the "Finlandia," the "Saga" and particularly the second symphony, denote him an epic poet.

There were traits which marked these compositions that were apparent yesterday—the unswerving individuality, the brooding seriousness, the noble melancholy. There was a fine sense of proportion and withal a grave and elegiac beauty in the use of melody.

The mournful song of the swan which plies the dark silent waters of the river of Tuonela is sung by the English horn. There is significance and there is repose in these measures. Both the solo and the orchestral parts were admirably played.

Richard Mandl is too recent a name for the dictionaries. The program book is not without information about him, however. His music has been heard in Paris.

His overture performed yesterday for the first time in Boston is a piece of light and ingratiating fancy. There is a striking contrast of movements. There is color and animation and a happy use of dance rhythm.

Berlioz requires four long movements to narrate experiences suggested by Byron's Harold, whose melancholy he would set forth through the tones of a rare Stradivarius viola for which Paganini asked him to write music.

The use of the recurring theme as in his "Fantastique" symphony is clever, and his descriptive music often picturesque, as the flippant and tawdry air of the oboe over a drone bass in the mountaineer's serenade to his mistress, but the pages devoted to the march of the pilgrims are dull and monotonous.

The somber tone color of the viola is expressive in the music of the hero. The long series of arpegii is more exacting than grateful. Mr Ferir gave the lyric passages emotional value and the florid portions flexibility.

Mme Kirkby-Lunn's voice is a typical English heroic contralto of imposing proportions and dark quality. At times it has an appeal of beauty in its sheer opulence of tone. Again it will sound constricted and marred by unvocalized breath.

The singer's enunciation elided all the words of a phrase, and her phrases betrayed labored breathing. Mme Lunn is not highly adept at the coloring of tone to the emotional thought, and, had she been, she could scarcely have relieved the mediocrity of Elgar's songs. The purity of architecture of Gluck's music demands a more lofty and a purer style.

There was applause for Mme Lunn, for Mr Ferir and for conductor and orchestra.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT
MARCH 4, 1911

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY Concerts in which the orchestra has been unassisted have been fewer this winter than for some years past. One pair of such is appointed for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening next, and then, besides, all the pieces, except one, will be familiar. Again, it is the turn of Brahms's first symphony (in C-minor) for biennial performance, and in it Mr. Fiedler is an eloquent conductor. Once upon a time Brahms's admirers called it the Tenth Symphony, in succession to Beethoven's nine; but the other day in the Saturday Review, Mr. Runciman asserted that the true Tenth Symphony is Beethoven's mighty mass—which seems rather more plausible. The other familiar pieces are Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" for the virtuosity of the orchestra and Tschaikowsky's Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" for its picturing and dramatizing power. The novel piece is the gayly chattering overture that Sinigaglia, one of the few Italian composers who cultivates orchestral music, wrote to Goldoni's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiuzzote," which is a play of the quarrels and intrigues of a Venetian fishing village. Two or three summers ago, the overture was played at the "Pop" concerts.

ADVERTISER, SATUR
MARCH 4, 191

SYMPHONY FEATURE "CHILDE HAROLD"

FERIR'S PLAYING OF THE OBBLIGATO VERY GOOD

Sibelius' "Swan of Tuonela" Another Novelty — Mme. Kirkby Lunn Vocal Soloist.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Richard Mandl—Overture to a Gascon Comedy.
Berlioz—"Harold in Italy." Symphony.
Elgar—Two Songs from "Sea Pictures," Op. 37.
Sibelius—"The Swan of Tuonela."
Gluck—"Divinites du Styx" from "Alceste."
Weber—"Euryanthe." Overture.
Soloist—Mme. Kirkby Lunn.

Nominally Mme. Kirkby-Lunn was the only soloist, but those who know the "Childe Harold" symphony will remember that it contains the finest solo ever composed for the viola, and when they are told that Emil Ferir played this "obbligato" they will understand that there was another soloist and a very good one. Of course, this symphony was the great orchestral work of the concert. In spite of all that the Strausses and Mahlers have done old Berlioz does not fade much by comparison, nor does his contemporary, Franz Liszt. There were evidently heroes before Agamemnon.

The constant introduction of the viola melody as Childe Harold himself, is one of the best of "leit-motif" ideas outside of Wagner, and this melody seems to us more natural and more inspired than the "Love-theme" which Berlioz treats in a similar manner in his "Symphonie Fantastique." The theme is also finely suited to its instrument. The viola is the melancholy, brooding instrument of the orchestra, and is the embodiment of the sadness and yearning that are in Childe Harold.

Such an orchestral device as the union of harp and horn to give the effect of a deep-toned bell is one of which Wagner himself might have been proud, while the frenzy of the final orgie cannot be excelled by any of the moderns. The horn was occasionally too loud in the bell effect, and there was less of surety in the finale than usual, but for all this it was one of the most effective performances of the symphony that we have ever had, and Mr. Ferir deserves especial praise for a noble performance of the great viola part.

Mandl is a name that one does not find in the musical dictionaries, but Mr. Philip Hale has discovered that he studied at the Conservatory at Vienna and from about 1886 made Paris his dwelling-place, where he studied instrumentation with Delibes and evolved an opera. This overture is for the tremendous orchestra which your true modern requires even for a Slumber-song. The work has something of the Gascon swagger in its chief theme. It is often tumultuous, boisterous or bombastic. Its subordinate theme is clear and tangible melody. It was not altogether a convincing work although it was not a musical puzzle. It was interesting in its complex scoring, but that is becoming quite a natural thing to expect nowadays; we have numbers of orchestral experts who can swing the heaviest orchestral forces and produce the most complicated orchestral scores.

The other novelty of the concert was by Sibelius. Without giving the story of the pursuit of the magical swan, the composer depicts the melancholy solitude of the river of death and the mysterious bird upon it. The English Horn is the chief instrument of sadness, in the orchestra, and it is here beautifully used in portraying the swan-melody, with muted strings and a deep roll of drums to increase the sombre character of the picture. The sadness of the north is in almost every measure, and there was too little of contrast in the composition, but one must remember that it is a single movement from a symphonic poem of four parts. Heard against the other portions of the work it might make a different impression, but by itself we found it as dark as a coal-bin by midnight. Even as it is there are masterly touches in this score and we are glad that this was not, in fact the "swan-song" of Sibelius.

We consider Elgar's sea-pictures to be his most poetic work, even if not his most ambitious one. Mme. Kirkby Lunn sang the beautiful "Where Corals Lie," and the yet more impressive "Sabbath Morning at Sea," a setting of Mrs. Browning's impressive poem. She was not in her best voice and there was some effort at the climax of the latter of the two songs. But in Gluck's great "Divinites du Styx" she gave a broad and dignified interpretation. The singer was recalled several times and responded with several graceful English curtsies, very different from the concert bow of the American artist.

Weber's "Euryanthe" overture was broadly played and with the theatrical contrasts which suit so well to the music of this composer who seldom was able to shake off the flavor of the foot-lights. The contrast of the chief and subordinate themes was very well brought out and there was refreshing vigor in the martial and triumphant portions of the work. We could not help noticing the pure and resonant tones of the kettledrums; it proved that this humble instrument can do much more than give mere thumps and thuds.

MUSIC NOTES.

Dr. Fiedler has arranged what seems to be a very popular programme for the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, March 12. As already announced, Constantino, the tenor, has been kind enough to offer his services as soloist. Moreover, the male chorus of the Cecilia Society is giving its services for the performance of Strauss' "The Beautiful Blue Danube" in its original form.

[171]

TIGHT BINDING

EVENING TRANSCRIPT, MARCH 4, 1911

THE CONCERT CALENDAR

Programme for the Concert of the Symphony Orchestra for Its Pension Fund—The Witeks' Concert—Signs of the Ending Season

SUNDAY evening, March 12, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Fiedler with the assistance of Mr. Constantino, tenor of the Boston Opera House, of a male choir from the Cecilia, for increase of the pension fund. The orchestral "numbers" of the programme are Tschaikowsky's suite of ballet-music, "The Nut-Cracker," Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser," Nicolai's to his opera, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Préludes." The concert will end with the performance of Strauss's waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube" in the form in which it was originally written—for men's voices and orchestra. Mr. Constantino's numbers are the Outlaw's monologue from the last scene of Puccini's "La Fanciulla" and the apostrophe to the sky and the sea in Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

JOURNAL—SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1911.

NEW DELIGHTS IN SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Viola Solo Playing of Mr. Ferir Makes Him Hero of the Occasion.

There are new and old delights in this week's Symphony program. As a result the audience at the rehearsal yesterday afternoon was one of the happiest of the season.

Two orchestra novelties mark this seventeenth of the twenty-four programs. One, an "Overture to a Gascon Chivalric Drama," by Richard Mari, a Moravian with Gallic tendencies, contrasts strikingly with the poignant pathos of "The Swan of Tuonela," a part of a symphonic poem by the renowned Finnish composer, Jean Sibelius. Mandl's name is new to Symphony concert patrons, but this spirited and melodious overture will serve, for one thing, to keep it in pleasant memory. The Sibelius novelty proved to be a characteristic work, gloomy but poetical—a genuine Scandinavian masterpiece.

The big orchestral feature of the concert, however, was the brilliant performance of Berlioz's romantic "Harold in Italy" symphony. Mr. Ferir played the viola solo music in an artistic manner that made him the hero of the occasion. The entire performance of this tuneful, highly colored work, so much beloved of all the musical romanticists, was thoroughly enjoyable.

The soloist this week is Mme. Kirkby Lunn, the English contralto, who last was heard here as Kundry to the fine English production of "Parsifal" given given by Henry W. Savage. Her numbers, "Where Coral Lies" and "Sabbath Morning at Sea," from Elgar's "Sea Pictures," and Alceste's air, "Divinities du Styx," from Gluck's "Alceste," were well applauded yesterday.

BOSTON JOURNAL—MARCH 5, 1911.

Symphony Program

No provision has been made for a soloist at this week's Symphony concerts. The first number will be Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1, and the second half of the program will comprise Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and the overture to Goldoni's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote."

Pension Fund Concert

Mr. Fiedler is making the interesting experiment of giving a program of popular music at the concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra which is to take place in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening, March 12. Sig. Constantino of the Boston Opera Company has been good enough to offer his services as soloist, which were gladly accepted by the orchestra. He will sing the big aria of Johnson from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West" and the popular aria from "La Gioconda," "Cielo e Mare."

In addition to Sig. Constantino the male chorus of the Cecilia Society has also given its services. These will be employed in a performance of Johann Strauss's "The Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz.

The principal orchestral numbers will comprise Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, Nicolai's overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and the ever-popular "Nut-Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1911

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. FIEDLER MAKES A ROMANTIC PROGRAMME

Weber and Berlioz for Familiar Music; Sibelius and Mandl for Unfamiliar—Euryanthe and Harold, Gascon Swaggerers and a Swan of a Finnish Hades in One Afternoon — Mme. Kirkly-Lunn for the Singer

IF Mr. Fiedler were accustomed to "unify" and label his programmes for the Symphony Concerts, he might have called that of yesterday "romantic." The longest piece upon it was Berlioz's symphony, "Harold in Italy," born of the romantic Byron, imagined by a no less romantic composer and accomplished in the romantic Paris of the romantic thirties. A new overture—"To a Gascon Comedy" by the half-Parisian, half-Czech and wholly unknown Richard Mandl—began the concert. It was sonorously big, persistently changeful, and both are romantic ways. Weber's overture to his opera "Euryanthe" ended the concert, and the music is all romantic flourish and glow. A piece by Sibelius separated Mme. Kirkby Lunn's songs and air—a tone picture of the swan that swims upon the waters that wash the Finnish Hades. It was of romantic imagining, in spite of its incisive reticence of execution. Two of Mme. Kirkby-Lunn's pieces were the songs that Elgar calls "Sea Pictures"—music of romantic, if of rather inarticulate and laboring mood. The other was the apostrophe of Alcestis to the divinities of another river of Hades, when she descends in Greek legend and in Gluck's opera to give herself for her dead spouse. By Gluck's own words, it is music that should picture changing emotions; and by so much, classic of opera though it has now become, it may plausibly be romantic, too.

In all this romantic music, the Weber of the overture to "Euryanthe," perhaps, had the best of it. The true romanticist has his sense of form and style, and Weber's overture is impeccable on that score. The true romanticist would animate his chosen form and heat his chosen style with the fire of passion. After ninety years almost, it still glows in the opening measures of the overture, in the transition to the warlike rhythms, in the chivalric voice of the close. The true romanticist loved mystery, and it still whispers through the middle passages of the overture. Again he loved the voice of darksome evil; it is in Weber's music on due occasion. Above all, the romanticist loved a kind of fiery energy that burned away all constraints except those of his own choosing, that could splinter into brilliance or burn with a white and steady flame. Weber's overture is ardent from beginning to end. It has many voices, and one, soft and clear, is the voice of tender emotion. Time does not tarnish or weaken the music. It still engrosses, transports. The listener does not reflect upon it; and he is minded to reflection over Berlioz's symphony. The overture seems spontaneous; the symphony is too deliberately schemed. Weber's music has a modern richness; Berlioz's is wearing thin.

The allegretto of the marching pilgrims and of their chiming bells is still ingenious and fanciful tone-picturing, reiterating its images. It might pass today for an "impression of Italy." The ensuing serenade of the mountaineer is another "impression" as ingeniously wrought in imitation of Italian piping. On the other hand, the "orgy of the brigands," with which the symphony ends, and in which Berlioz believed he had written "something rather violent," sounds tame enough to our sophisticated ears. The youngest composer can outdo it in orchestral tumult; there is no suggestion in the melodic ideas or in the handling of them of the monstrous and the foul revelries of Berlioz's earlier "Fantastic Symphony." And in the first movement "of melancholy, happiness and joy," goes a like tameness. The Fantastic Symphony is warm with glowing imagination. The symphony of Harold is chilled at the outset by an artificial scheme. Berlioz might well have written his impressions of an Italy that he knew most imaginatively through his Virgil, his Shakspeare and his Byron. The music would probably have been ampler and more ardent than the amiable tone-picturing of marching pilgrims and the serenading shepherd. He preferred, being romantic, to tie himself to the mooning Harold of his viola, plaintively weaving his arabesques about the symphony itself. Now the viola lures the ear, when it is such an instrument as was Mr. Férir's yesterday and when it is played as he played it. Not even the oboe may compass a more melancholy voice, may so drip the sad sweetness of its tones. To hear was an exotic pleasure. The attendant Harold vanished; the symphony receded into an orchestral background against which Mr. Férir was playing a very intermittent, a highly fragmentary concerto for viola. No doubt Berlioz conceived the symphony, as his custom was, upon a duly psychological plan. His Harold of the viola was to lead us through his musical Italy and we were to muse with him along the way. The music was to keep the symphonic form and yet bend it to the psychological scheme. The scheme has withered; the "impressions" remain, and about them twines the plaintive viola.

The romantic music out of our own time was diverse enough. Mandl baffled even the most learned and resourceful of programmists. Moravia cradled him; he still lives; Paris has heard some of his music and scoffed; German cities have liked it better. Mandl has also read plays and books of exuberant, swaggering, amorous, generally forth-putting Gascons—doubtless the comedy of Cyrano, the tales of d'Artagnan, and the adventures of Tartarin, who ought to have been born in Gascony, though Provence, according to Daudet, mothered him. He liked these fellows; he imagined a comedy peopled with them; and forthwith he set down to write an overture for it. They clamor, swagger through the music; they fight, they win, and all to the richness of modern orchestral sonorities, the breadth of modern orchestral cantilena, the snap of modern orchestral rhythms. The overture is clanging, glowing music, as obvious as those it sings, as full of the pomps of sound as they—of whatever pomps they affected. When it is done the curtain ought to rise on Cyrano's cadets and him leading them. The music is as broad as Coquelin's face, as unctuous as his acting. Mandl lived not in Paris for naught.

The romanticism of Sibelius in "The Swan of Tuonela" is the romanticism of Boecklin's pictures. The music is tone-picturing and nothing else. The shadowed voice of the English horn, the echoing viola, the deepening violoncello, the uncanny obbligato of the violins, now picked, now touched with the back of the bows, the long melodic line that vanishes at last into nothingness, the melody itself; all summon the dark waters, smooth and still. Above them, on either hand, are the black cliffs of the river of Hades under as smooth and as black a sky. Upon the black waters swims the white swan; yet less swims than parts them in the unparted silence. Down the stream it floats—the melodic line. Now it stirs its arching neck—the faint curvings of the melody: now it spreads its white wings—the deepening of the melodic voice. The eye can no longer follow it; the dark, the stillness are everywhere, and the music dies with the vanishing swan. Boecklin could make the picture in line and color; Sibelius has made it in tones. With instruments he has written the music of silence; with diversified orchestral colors he has written music that is black save for the moving white line. There is rhythm, yet the music barely stirs. Small as the piece is, it is of uncanny perfection. The analyst may search the means.

Beside such music the Greek Hades was only of the opera house, and Mme. Kirkby-Lunn was no sombre and mysterious Sibelius, but a very tangible and comely figure of the concert room who dropped curtsies, in lieu of bows, to an applauding audience. Not for nothing is she an eminent English alto; she has curtsied a little more deeply before Their Majesties in their time. Her voice has its deep toned and deeply colored contralto richness and smoothness. She has made it pliant enough to circumvent the verbal and the musical intricacy of the "Sea Pictures" that she chose from Elgar—the song of the coral and the song of the "Sabbath morning at sea" in Mrs. Browning's most clumsy and inarticulate verse. To set such lines as

> The skies, impassive o'er me,
> Calm in a moonless, sunless light,
> As glorified by even the intent
> Of holding the day glory!

is a musical feat, to sing them a vocal tour de force. It is easy to forgive composer and singer both for the heavily accented "the" before "intent." There was no other way. English contraltos cultivate these "Sea Pictures." They were written for Clara Butt; and all her sisters have sung them. No doubt Sir Edward meditated long over them; no doubt he was as exalted as his admirers like to believe he always is. Yet the sum of them is very exacting music to the singer and very dull music to the hearer. Orchestral detail relieves them; the richness of a contralto voice lifts them out of the ooze of sentimentality. Better one air of the Gluck of "Alceste" than a whole cycle of the picturing Elgar. "Divinités du Styx" runs a long gamut of contrasting emotions. Gluck changes the pace with an unpardonable modernity for 1767. There is passion in the music; there was a modicum of it in Mme. Kirkby-Lunn's tones. And he had not half Elgar's means. A good workman, in opera as everywhere else, does not quarrel with his tools.

H. T. P.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SUNDAY, MARCH 5, 1911.

FOR PENSION FUND.

Concert with Noted Singers to Aid Symphony Players.

Mr. Fiedler is making the interesting experiment of giving a programme of popular music at the concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra which is to take place in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, March 12th.

As already announced, Signor Constantino of the Boston Opera Company has been good enough to offer his services as soloist, which were gladly accepted by the orchestra. Signor Constantino has selected to sing as his first number the big aria of Johnson from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West" and the popular aria from "La Gioconda," "Cielo e Mare."

In addition to Signor Constantino the male chorus of the Celia Society has also given its services. These will be employed in a performance of Johann Strauss's "The Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz.

The principal orchestral numbers will comprise Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes," Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, Nicolai's overture "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and the ever popular "Nut-Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky.

No provision has been made for a soloist at next week's Symphony concerts, the program being entirely orchestral. The first number will be Brahms's Symphony in C-Minor No. 1 and the second half of the program will comprise Tschaikowsky's Overture Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and the overture to Goldoni's comedy "Le Baruffe Chiozzote." Sinigaglia is a name new on Symphony programs, although works of his in chamber music form have been heard in Boston. He was born in Turin on August 14, 1868, and studied at the conservatory in that city and later in Vienna, where he absorbed the best musical influences of the time. His best known works are a string quartet in D Op. 27; a violin concerto in A; and a "concert etude" for string quartet, Op. 5, which was played here by the Boston Symphony Quartet some years ago. "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" was written by Goldoni and produced in Venice in the season of 1760.

[172]

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1911

SYMPHONY GIVES TWO NOVELTIES

Mandl's Overture Performed for the First Time in the United States.

BY PHILIP HALE.

The 17th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to a Gascon Chivalric Drama ..... Mandl
Symphony, "Harold in Italy" ..... Berlioz
Two sea songs ..... Elgar
"The Swan of Tuonela," Legend ..... Sibelius
"Divinites de Styx" ..... Gluck
Overture to "Euryanthe" ..... Weber

Mandl's overture and the little symphonic poem of Sibelius were played for the first time in Boston, and the overture, I believe, was performed for the first time in the United States. The musical dictionaries say nothing about Mandl. A Moravian by birth, he studied at the Vienna Conservatory and about 1886 went to Paris for further study. Some of his music has been performed in Paris; an operetta was produced at Rouen; his symphonic poem, "Griselidis," performed not long ago in Vienna and Munich, was warmly praised. In a prefatory note to the score of the overture played yesterday the composer says: "When I read years ago an old play in which the hero was a Gascon knight, a prototype of an amorous, imaginative swaggerer and blagueur, the idea came to me of writing an orchestral piece in a joyous, lyrical, exaggerated style based on this long-forgotten chilvaric drama. But I can say with Dumas the Elder, the overture first came "Twenty Years After."

Mandl has well characterized this overture, which is entertaining. He has caught the spirit of the bombastic, amusingly mendacious type; there is the boasting, the fanfaronade; but the amorous side of the Gascon Knight is not so well portrayed. nor does the composer, as one intellectually superior to his subject, stand apart and look critically on his creation. There is a certain "Gemeinheit" in this music, a certain coarseness, gross vulgarity which is foreign to types quoted by Mandl; for Cyrano, d'Artagnan, and Tartarin of Tarascon, The Provencal, were never vulgar. Mandl employs a huge orchestra, but the chief result is boisterousness. His instrumentation is for the most part thick, and when he uses an instrument for a determined effect it seldom is allowed to speak clearly and unhampered.

The piece of Sibelius refers to the legend in the "Kalevala" of the swan that moves majestically and sings on the broad river of black water and swift current that surrounds Tuonela, the Finnish Hades. We think nobly of the swan and wish him a more impressive song. The song that Sibelius imagined is given for the most part to the English horn. A mood is certainly at once established, and an appropriately gloomy, dismal one; but the composer's imagination soon failed him and the swan quickly becomes tiresome, a prosaic bird, whereas he might have much to tell of Death, the slayer of heroes.

Mr. Ferir's playing of the viola in the music given by Berlioz to the melancholy, misanthropic Harold was the feature of the performance. The tonal beauty, the unfailing accuracy, the musical phrasing and the controlling art—these were above ordinary and conventional praise. He played a viola made by Gasparo da Salo, a famous instrument, of which he may be justly proud. By his display of art Mr. Ferir even succeeded in making the motive which was prophetic of Offenbach's "Voici le Sabre" sound less common. As for the symphony itself, it must stand below the earlier one, the still amazing "Fantastique," but it is nevertheless an admirable composition.

Mme. Kirkby Lunn sang for the second time in Boston at a Symphony concert. She was more successful on the whole in the songs by Elgar than in the great air of Alceste, although she declaimed the characteristic first measures of the tragic aria with dramatic intensity. Her voice is a fine one; she sings as a rule with skill; but there is little true, deep emotion in her interpretation. If she were a more emotional singer the songs of Elgar would probably not appeal so strongly to her. Her devotion to Elgar is only surpassed by that of Mrs. Micawber for her spouse. It is not easy to think of Mme. Kirkby Lunn forsaking Elgar and his sea songs under any condition. Sir Edward has written an orchestral description of London, and a song, "Sabbath Morning at Sea." Why does he not write a grand orchestral fantasia, "A Sunday in London," in G minor, Adagio, Lugubriemente?

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Brahms, symphony in C minor, No. 1; Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet"; Wagner, Siegfried Idyl; Sinigaglia, overture to "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte" (first time in Boston). There will be no soloist.

BOSTON TRAVELER, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY

By EDITH BURNHAM.

At the Symphony yesterday afternoon an exceedingly varied programme was rendered, mostly romantic and pictorial in character, and containing two novelties, played for the first time in this city. Mr. Fiedler opened the concert with one of these, Mandl's Overture to a Gascon Chivalric Drama. With one of the famous Gascons, whose chivalry was of the strutting variety, as a central figure the composer has written some exceedingly melodious music, ful lof ow and rhythm, and with a song in it that is full of the legendry of chivalry. The entire composition is conceived in broad not delicate style, and consequently carries a broad fundamental, emotional appeal. The other novelty, Sibelius' "The Swan of Tuonela," Legend from the Finnish Folk-epic "Kalevala" was distinctly opposite in character, being painted with fine and delicate lines of beauty. It has the melancholy of Sibelius, but touched too with a fine artistry. The Finnish legend from which it is adapted suggests very much one of the Indian legends given in Algic Researches and utilized by Longfelow in his "Hiawatha." But the "swan song of Sibelius' tone poem is far more mournful and plaintive—he dwells lingeringly and pityingly upon it. As sung by the English horn yesterday it was singularly haunting. The answering melodies of cello and viola, the sighs of parting souls, are vague and yet poignant. The ability of Sibelius to connote and suggest far more than he expresses is evident in this as in his greater works.

Yesterday's symphony was "Harold in Italy" by Berlioz, in which the solo viola muses in melancholy over the ideas partly suggested by the orchestra and partly born of his own imaginings. The orchestration is quite independent of the solo part, but paints a deep, rich-toned background—a kind of Gainsborough setting—while the viola, a solitary figure in the foreground, really tells the story. The themes of the orchestra act as psychological suggestions to the solo viola, but do not assist it in working out the solution. The "Pilgrims' March," of the orchestra, with only an occasional sound of the viola voice, and that only in arpeggio accompaniment, is almost a stern religious chant. The third movement, the serenade of a mountaineer of the Abruzzi to his Mistress, and the following Orgie of Brigands afford a striking contrast to the earlier movements.

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, the soloist of the afternoon, sang two of Figar's Sea Pictures and the Alceste Air from Gluck's "Divinities du Styx." The second of the Sea Pictures, "Sabbath Morning at Sea," was far better suited to her voice than the "Where Corals Lie." The delicate phrase contour of the latter is not adapted to the quality of her voice. In the deep-toned apotheosis to the majesty and sublimity of the sea, Mme. Kirkby-Lunn found a fitting vehicle for her voice. Again in the Alceste aria she encountered some difficulty in the moments of finest feeling. Her voice is not capable of delicate emotional intonation; it is unwieldy and heavy at such moments. She sings with freedom and clear tone quality, although the higher notes are musically cold.

PENSION FUND CONCERT OF SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged what seems to be a very popular programme for the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony orchestra, to be given Sunday evening, March 12. As already announced, Signor Constantino, the first tenor of the Boston Opera Company, has been kind enough to offer his services as soloist. The male chorus of the Cecilia is giving its services also for the performance of Johann Strauss's "The Beautiful Blue Danube" in its original form. Signor Constantino has chosen two arias, his big aria from "The Girl of the Golden West" and the "Cielo e Mare" from "La Gioconda," for his solo numbers. Mr. Fiedler, for the instrumental numbers, gives Lizst's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, Nicolai's overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and the ever popular "Nut Cracker" ballet suite of Tschaikowsky.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

There will be no soloist at next week's Symphony concerts. Mr. Fiedler has placed on the programme as a novelty an overture to Goldini's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote." The programme will begin with Brahms' symphony in C minor, No. 1, and will include the overture fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" by Tschaikowsky and the Siegfreid Idyll by Wagner.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MASS., SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1911.

NOVELTIES AT SYMPHONY

The program of the seventeenth Symphony rehearsal, as will be seen, contained several novelties. It was as follows:

Mandl, overture to a Gascon Chivalric Drama (first time in Boston); Berlioz, "Harold in Italy," Symphony with viola solo, op. 16 (viola solo by E. Ferir); songs—Elgar, "Where Corals Lie," "Sabbath Morning at Sea," from "Sea Pictures," op. 37; Sibelius, "The Swan of Tuonela," legend from the Finnish Folk-epic "Kalevala" (first time in Boston); Gluck, air of Alceste, "Divinites du Styx," from "Alceste," act 1; Weber, overture to "Euryanthe"; the soloist was Mme. Kirkby Lunn.

Romanticism in association as well as in composition holds the Symphony stage this week, and the romanticism is of such distinct schools as those of Dumas and Byron. The lover of the Gascon as portrayed for us by the great Alexandre and the author of the illustrious Tartarin could not fail to be delighted by the overture of Mandl, a work sufficiently modern to have "ginger," and in form clear enough to be grasped at a hearing. While certain nobler sides of these characters are not indicated it is a cheery piece, the essence of a sincere braggadocio.

The work moreover prepared the hearers for a beautiful and impressive rendering of Berlioz' "Harold in Italy," in which the orchestra and soloist both bore nobly their part.

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn's rich tones pleased in the striking group of songs. The new song of Sibelius was curious and strong. It is best described as a vocal obbligato to English horn solo, with an accompaniment of strings in alt. after the Wagnerian formula.

BOSTON JOURNAL-
MARCH 7, 1911.

Pension Fund Concert

Strauss's waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube," in its original form for male chorus and orchestra, will be the final number on the program of the Pension Fund concert in Symphony Hall next Sunday evening. The male chorus of the Cecilia Society has given its services. The program, with Constantino as soloist, is one of the most attractive of its kind the orchestra has presented.

SUNDAY GLOBE—
MARCH 5, 1911.

Constantino and Cecilia to Aid Pension Fund.

Mr Fiedler is making the interesting experiment of giving a program of popular music at the concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra which is to take place in Symphony hall next Sunday evening. Sig Constantino of the Boston Opera company has offered his services as soloist and has elected to sing as his first number the big aria of Johnson from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West," and the popular aria from "La Gioconda," "Cielo e Mare."

In addition to Sig Constantino the male chorus of the Cecilia society has also given its services. These will be employed in a performance of Johann Strauss' "The Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz.

It is not generally known that this waltz was written originally for male chorus and orchestra and it was some years after it was published in this form that it was arranged for orchestra alone.

The waltz was not received with much favor when first heard in Vienna, and it was not until it had become popular in the United States that the Viennese awoke to its beauties. With the male chorus of the Cecilia society the waltz will be given in its original version.

The principal orchestral numbers will comprise Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture, Nicolai's overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and the ever popular "Nut-Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky.

This Week's Symphony Program.

No provision has been made for a soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, the program being entirely orchestral. The first number will be Brahms' symphony in C-minor No 1 and the second half of the program will comprise Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote."

Sinigaglia is a name new on Symphony programs, although works of his in chamber music form have been heard in Boston. He was born in Turin, Aug 14, 1868, and studied at the conservatory in that city and later in Vienna.

His best known works are a string quartet in D, op 27; a violin concerto in A and a "concert etude" for string quartet, op 5, which was played here by the Boston Symphony quartet some years ago. "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" was produced in Venice in the season of 1760.

At the last concert of the Cecilia society and Boston Symphony orchestra Bach's "Passion Music" will be given, with the solo parts sung by Marie Zimmerman, Janet Spencer, George Ham-

THE SUNDAY HERALD
MARCH 5, 1911.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Mr. Fiedler is making the experiment of giving a program of popular music at the concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra, which is to take place in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, March 12. As already announced, Mr. Constantino of the Boston Opera company has been good enough to offer his services as soloist, which were gladly accepted by the orchestra. Mr. Constantino will sing the aria of Johnson, from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West," and the popular aria from "La Gioconda," "Cielo e Mare."

The male chorus of the Cecilia Society has also given its services, which will be employed in a performance of Johann Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz. This waltz was written originally for male chorus and orchestra and it was some years after it was published in this form that it was arranged for orchestra alone. The waltz was not received with much favor when it was first heard in Vienna. With the male chorus of the Cecilia Society the waltz will be given in its original version.

The principal orchestral numbers will be Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; Wagner's "Tannhaeuser" overture, Nicolai's overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and the ever-popular "Nut-Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky. It will be remembered that two years ago Mr. Fiedler played the "Nut-Cracker" suite at a pension fund concert, and it aroused such enthusiasm that last year he put it on one of the Symphony programs and since has led it in a considerable number of cities the orchestra has visited. It is always received with much favor.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

No provision has been made for a soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, the program being entirely orchestral. The first number will be Brahm's Symphony in C minor, No. 1, and the second half of the program will include Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll," and Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote." Sinigaglia is a name new on Symphony programs, although works of his in chamber music form have been heard in Boston. He was born in Turin on Aug. 14, 1868, and studied at the conservatory in that city and later in Vienna. His best known works are a string quartet in D, op. 27; Piedmont Rhapsodies for orchestra, also for violin; a violin concerto in A, and a "concert etude" for string quartet, op. 5, which was played here by the Boston Symphony Quartet some years ago. "La Baruffe Chiozzote" was written by Goldoni and produced in Venice in the season of 1760. In his autobiography he says: "I composed a Venetian piece entitled 'Le Baruffe Chiozzote ("The Disputes of the People of Chiozza"). This low comedy produced an admirable effect. Mme. Bresciani, notwithstanding her Tuscan accent, had acquired the Venetian maners and pronunciation so well that she afforded as much pleasure in low as in genteel comedy. * * * The piece had the most brilliant success; and with it we closed the carnival."

THE BOSTON HERALD,
MARCH 9, 1911.

The sale of seats for the pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Sunday evening shows that the public is taking kindly to the idea of a popular program. Such a program as Mr. Fiedler has arranged finds a parallel only in the concert given by Mr. Gericke for the benefit of the San Francisco sufferers. Mr. Constantino will sing Johnson's appeal from "The Girl of the Golden West" and "Cielo e Mare" from "La Gioconda."

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY

The sale of seats for the Persian Fund concert of the Symphony orchestra next Sunday evening, which is now in progress, shows that the public is taking most kindly to the idea of a popular programme. In the past three or four years Pension Fund concerts have been devoted very largely to Wagnerian excerpts and such a programme as Mr. Fiedler has arranged finds a parallel only in the concert given by Mr. Gericke in the last year of his service here for the benefit of the San Francisco sufferers. Signor Constantino is to sing two numbers, the big aria from "The Girl of the Golden West" and the "Cielo e Mare" aria from "La Gioconda."

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 9, 1911

The sale of seats for the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, which takes place next Sunday evening, is now in progress. Wagnerian excerpts and the Strauss "Blue Danube" waltz, sung by male voices, will figure on a programme of a generally popular character. Florencio Constantino, of the Boston Opera, will be the soloist, singing two operatic arias from "La Gioconda" and "The Girl of the Golden West."

On March 14th Anton Witek, concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mrs. Witek, pianist, will give a second concert in Chickering Hall.

Edmond Clement, the French tenor whose appearance in opera and in concert in this city has brought him high reputation, will sing next Thursday afternoon, the 16th, in Jordan Hall.

[173]

SUNDAY POST,
MARCH 5, 1911

Symphony

The programme of the Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be entirely orchestral. The first composition will be Brahms' symphony in C minor No. 1; and the second half of the programme will consist of Tschaikowsky's overture fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet;" Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll;" and Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzote." Sinigaglia is a name new on Symphony programmes, although works of his in chamber music form have been heard in Boston. He was born in Turin on Aug. 14, 1868, and studied at the conservatory in that city and later in Vienna, where he absorbed the best musical influence of the time. His best known works are a string quartet in D, Op. 27; a violin concerto in A, and a "concert etude" for string quartet, Op. 5, which was played here by the Boston Symphony Quartet some years ago. "Le Baruffe Chiozzote" was written by Goldoni and produced in Venice in the season of 1760. In his autobiography he says: I composed a Venetian piece entitled "Le Baruffe Chiozzote," ("The Disputes of the People of Chioza"). This low comedy produced an admirable effect. Madame Bresciani, notwithstanding her Tuscan accent, had acquired the Venetian manners and pronunciation so well, that she afforded as much pleasure in low as in genteel comedy. * * * The piece had the most brilliant success; and with it we closed the carnival.

Pension Fund Concert

Mr. Fiedler is making the interesting experiment of giving a programme of popular music at the concert for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony Orchestra, which is to take place in Symphony Hall on next Sunday evening, March 12. As already announced, Mr. Constantino of the Boston Opera Company has been good enough to offer his services as a soloist, which were gladly accepted by the orchestra. Mr. Constantino has elected to sing as his first number the big aria of Johnson from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West" and the popular aria from "La Gioconda," "Cielo e Mare."

In addition to Mr. Constantino the male chorus of the Cecilia Society has also given its services. These will be employed in a performance of Johann Strauss's "The Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz. It is not generally known that this waltz was written originally for male chorus and orchestra; that for some years after it was published in this form it was arranged for orchestra alone. Moreover, it is interesting to know that this waltz, unquestionably the most popular waltz of its kind, was not received with much favor when it was first heard in Vienna, and that it was not until it had become very popular in the United States that the Viennese really awoke to its beauties. With the male chorus of the Cecilia Society the waltz will be given in its original version.

MODERN 'CELLO MUSIC

Returning from a long trip last week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrated one of the most successful concert tours in its history. And it is good to say that one of the particular triumphs came with Strauss' "Don Quixote," so remarkably interpreted by Mr. Fiedler, the orchestra and the soloists. Mr. Warnke, the solo 'cellist, gave a performance in this and other cities which was almost a revelation of the possibilities of this part. What by the way, if a glorious day is upon us, when, as now we talk of this or that opera star in a famous role, we shall discuss a 'cellist as Don Quixote, or the sensational success of a tuba player as Sancho Panza. This sounds new, but so did the flying machine only a few years ago, and Strauss is changing the musical map at least as rapidly and as successfully as the Wright brothers are exploring the firmament. Indeed, where is there greater opportunity for creative impersonation, for the artistic expression of psychology, than in this same 'cello part provided by Strauss? All, and more, than 'cellist ever dreamed before, is in those lines. A 'cello concerto of tomorrow, perhaps, was the primary purpose of the composer when he sat down to compose "Don Quixote."

BOSTON JOURNAL
MARCH 9, 1911

Pension Fund Concert

The sale of seats for the pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra next Sunday evening, which is now in progress, shows that the public is taking most kindly to the idea of a popular program. Signor Constantino is to sing two numbers, the big aria from "The Girl of the Golden West" and the "Cielo e Mare" aria from "La Gioconda."

EVE. NEWS.

Newark, N. J.

SS

1911

The Boston Symphony Concerts this week, on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, will furnish Ferrucio Busoni, pianist, as soloist. The program for Thursday evening includes Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," by Lizst; "Don Quixote," by Strauss, with solos for violoncello and viola to be played by Mr. Warnke and Mr. Ferir; Concerto for piano and orchestra in C minor, No. 2, by Beethoven, and Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe." Saturday afternoon's program consists of Handel's Overture in D major, No. 1; Schubert's Symphony in C major, No. 7, and Berlior's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." Mr. Busoni will play Lizst's "Todtenlanz," with the orchestra.

TIGHT BINDING

...Symphony con...
...afternoon and Sat...
...entirely orchestral. ...be Brahms' ...Nos. 1 and the ...one will con... ...fantasie, ...ner's "Sieg... ...overture ...Baruffe Chioz... ...ame new 'on ...although works ...form have been ...born in Turin ...at the con... ...later in Vienna, ...last musical in... ...best known ...in D, Op. 27;

...A, and a "concert ...Op. 5, which ...Boston Symphony ...ago. "Le Baruffe ...ten by Goldoni, and ...in the season of 1760. ...says: I com... ...entitled "Le ...The Disputes of the ...This low comedy ...effect. Madame ...ing her Tuscan ...Venetian man... ...so well, that she ...easure in low as in ...The piece had ...success and with it ...ival.

...nd Concert

...aking the interesting ...ng a programme of ...the concert for the ...fund of the Sym... ...to take place ...on next Sunday eve... ...already announced, ...of the Boston Opera ...good enough to offer ...soloist, which were ...the orchestra. Mr. ...ected to sing as his ...big aria of Johnson ...Puccini's "The Girl ...West" and the popular ...Gioconda," "Cielo e ...

...Constantino the male ...ella Society has also ...These will be em... ...formance of Johann ...eautiful Blue Danube" ...generally known that ...written originally for ...orchestra; that for some ...published in this form ...for orchestra alone. ...interesting to know that ...estionably the most pop... ...kind, was not received ...when it was first heard ...that it was not until it ...popular in the United ...Viennese really awoke to ...ith the male chorus of ...iety the waltz will be ...inal version.

"CELLO MUSIC

...a long trip last week, ...phony Orchestra cele... ...most successful con... ...history. And it is good ...of the particular tri... ...with Strauss'. "Don ...markably interpreted by ...orchestra and the solo... ...e, the solo 'cellist, gave ...n this and other cities ...st a revelation of the ...his part. What by the ...s day is upon us, when, ...of this or that opera ...s role, we shall discuss ...Quixote, or the sensa... ...a tuba player as Sancho ...nds now, but so did the ...only a few years ago, ...anging the musical map ...and as successfully ...brothers are exploring ...Indeed, where is there ...nity for creative im... ...the artistic expression ...han in this same 'cello ...by Strauss? All, and ...st ever dreamed before, ...A 'cello concerto of to..., was the primary pur... ...poser when he sat down ...Quixote."

JOURNAI
CH 9, 1911

...n Fund Concert

...f seats for the pension ...of the Symphony Orches... ...ay evening, which is now ...shows that the public is ...kindly to the idea of a ...am. Signor Constantino is ...umbers, the big aria from ...the Golden West" and ...Mare" aria from "La ...

Newark, N. J.
FEB 23 1911

...Symphony Concerts this ...sday evening and Satur... ...will furnish Ferruccio ...as soloist. The program ...ening includes Sympho... ...ludes," by Liszt; "Don ...ss, with solos for vio... ...to be played by Mr. ...Ferir; Concerto for ...in C minor, No. 3, ...Weber's Overture to ...day afternoon's pro... ...el's Overture in D ...Symphony in C ...z's Overture, ...usoni will play ...the orchestra.

TRIBUNE
New York City.
FEB 24 1911

MUSIC

The Boston Orchestra.

...omment on last evening's concert of the ...ton Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie ...ll may well begin with a word of regret ...the unhappy arrangement of the pro... ...amme, and in the same spirit of fair... ...s it must end with what has long since ...ome an old story, namely, a song of ...ise of the achievements of the unique ...anization of music-makers from the ...ighboring city in Massachusetts. Four ...idely differing moods were published in ...e course of this concert, by the works of ...many composers, and Mr. Fiedler's ...uping of these refractory elements the ...ief victim was Beethoven's C minor ...anoforte concerto, with the solo perform... ..., Mr. Busoni.

Belonging to what may be called a black ...nd white period of Beethoven's creative ...rt, its frequent meagreness of color and ...straint of emotional content were sharply ...mphasized by its position on the list, fol...wing Richard Strauss's overflowingly rich ...nd colorful "Don Quixote" theme and va...iations. Nor did the playing of Mr. Bu...oni do as much as could have been wished ...o attune the ears of the auditors to the ...amut of beauty and interest that meas...res the appeal of this score. Its range ...f color is not large, as the idle array of ...brass instruments, lying upon the empty ...chairs, visibly testified, but within its re...stricted scale there are gradations which, ...when duly observed by the pianoforte ...player and the accompanying orchestra, ...are eloquent of a real and lasting beauty. ...Mr. Busoni's agile fingers and vigorous ...wrists dwelt too often upon the prosaic last ...night, and there were too many moments ...of Puritanic grimness in the concerto.

Before the Strauss work came Liszt's ...popular and sometimes irritatingly pom...pous "Les Preludes," and after the ...Beethoven concerto there was proclaimed ...a grandiose and glittering fashion the ..."Euryanthe" overture of Weber. Both set ...forth the wonderful perfection of the Boston ...orchestra, but it was the Strauss "Don ...Quixote" that at once focussed and baf...fled the interest of last evening's audience. ...Reasonably familiar by this time to most ...New York listeners, these "Fantastical ...Variations on a Theme of Knightly Charac..." continue to provoke alternate admira...tion and the reverse. With much that is ...obviously sincere and a few moments of ...poignant and even stately beauty and ...power, there are passages that spell trivi...lity and often mere virtuosity run wild. ...But the musical biographer of the "un...fortunatest knight" nevertheless contrives ...to make the listener genuinely fond of his ...hero, and his passing is something more ...than dignified—it has the nobility of genu...ine pathos.

The Boston men, with Mr. Ferir and Mr. ...Warnke as solo viola and 'cello, respective... ...played with astounding brilliancy and ...clarity, but Mr. Fiedler's interpretation was ...thought too smooth and supple, from the ...illustrative point of view.

EVE. JOURNAL
ess New York City.

...The fourth pair of Boston Symphony ...concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall ...Saturday evening and Saturday af...ternoon. At both of these concerts the ...soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni. The ...programmes are as follows:

...Thursday—Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les ...Preludes"; Strauss, "Don Quixote"; Bee...thoven, concerto in C minor; Weber, ...overture, "Euryanthe." Saturday after...noon—Handel, overture in D major No. ...1; Schubert, symphony in C major No. 7; ...Liszt, "Todtentanz" for pianoforte; Ber...lioz, overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

STAATS ZEITUNG
ess New York City.

Im Reich der Töne.

Im Opernsaale der neuen Musik-Aka...demie veranstaltet morgen, Freitag Abend, ...das Boston Symphonie-Orchester, Diri...gent Max Fiedler, das vorletzte Konzert ...der heurigen Saison, mit dem Pianisten ...Ferruccio Busoni als Solisten. Das hier...für in Aussicht genommene Programm ...weist folgende Tonschöpfungen auf: Schu...mann's Symphonie in C dur, No. 7; Liszt's ...Konzert für Pianoforte und Orchester in ...Es-dur, No. 1; Saint-Saëns' Sympho...nisches Gedicht No. 1; „Le Rouet d'Om...phale" und sein symphonisches Gedicht ...„Danse Macabre."

STANDARD UNION,
...
FEB 24 1911

The fourth Boston Symphony con...cert will be given in the Academy of ...Music this evening. The soloist will ...be Ferruccio Busoni and the pro...gramme is as follows:

...Symphony in C major, No. 7.....Schubert
...Concerto for pianoforte in E flat, ...No. 1.....Liszt
...Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Om...phale, No. 31 ("Omphale's Spinning ...Wheel").....Saint-Saens
...Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Danse Ma...cabre," after a poem by Henri Ca...zalis, op. 40.....Saint-Saens

---

STAATS ZEITUNG
ess New York City.
FEB 24 1911

Bostoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Die Eingangsnummer des gestern Abend in Carnegie Hall stattgefundenen Symphonie-Konzerts der Bostoner, Liszt's „Préludes", war nicht geeignet, sonderliche Hoffnungen für den Verlauf der Veranstaltung zu erwecken, denn Liszt's populäres Werk fand in Herrn Fiedler einen allzu strenuösen Ausbeuter, der an Sonorität und Herausarbeitung der starken Wirkungen zwar viel leistete, die Feinheiten dagegen recht unbeachtet ließ.

Aber er sollte sich mit einer wahren Prachtleistung sofort rehabilitiren, denn als eine solche muß seine Darbietung von Strauß' „Don Quixote" bezeichnet werden. „Phantastische Variationen über ein Thema ritterlichen Charakters" nennt Strauß dieses Werk, das wir nie zu seinen erfreulichsten gezählt haben, wenn er darin auch an orchestralem Witz und geistreicher Kontrapunktik, der in einer überaus kühnen Harmonik und bezauberndem Instrumentalkolorit starke Bundesgenossen erwachsen, das Höchste leistet. Neben dieser verwegenen Kontrapunktik ist auch die Verwebung des thematischen Materials und die musikalische Charakteristik eine meisterhafte.

Wenn das Werk dennoch nicht zu den populären von Strauß zählt und wenig aufgeführt wird, so liegt dies an verschiedenen Ursachen. Vor allem ist es viel zu lang, dann ist es unglaublich schwierig, und schließlich kann das Publikum den musikalischen Bildern ohne genaue Kenntnis der programmatischen Einzelheiten nicht folgen. Somit löst sich alles gewöhnlich in eine Reihe barocker, häufig wie musikalische Witze klingende Bilder auf, und das wirkt mit der Zeit ermüdend.

Strauß entfaltet in diesem Werk eine einfach virtuose, stellenweise allerdings fast bedenkliche Realistik in der instrumentalen Ausmalung, so daß man den „Don Quixote" gar häufig kurzerhand als „Orchesterwitz" bezeichnet hat.

Göhler nennt das Werk „eine witzige Orchesterstude", wobei er mit dem gehässigen Nachsatz, „daß man sie anhören müsse, wie man Instrumentalvirtuosen, die nur Techniker sind, und andere Seiltänzer ansieht", viel zu weit geht. So bedenklich ist die Sache nicht. Dazu ist schon die Idee der Variationenform, wenn diese auch in allerfreiester Weise eingehalten wird, eine zu glückliche. Strauß illustrirt uns in freier Folge und ohne Unterbrechung eine ganze Reihe von Szenen und Vorgängen aus Cervantes' Roman vom „Ritter von der traurigen Gestalt", die auf Grund der selbstverständlich nach Bedarf veränderten thematischen Gedanken aufgebaut sind. Wer diesen bunten musikalischen Bildern folgen kann, der wird stark interessirt sein, bei minder Vorbereiteten oder Ausdauernden wird bald Ermüdung eintreten, namentlich wenn das Werk nicht in einwandsfreier Weise herausgebracht wird.

Damit war es bei den Bostonern gestern nun allerdings wundervoll bestellt, und Herr Fiedler hat damit unstreitig seine brillanteste und virtuoseste Leistung geboten. Man müßte die Introduktion, die zehn Variationen und das Finale einzeln und minutiös durchgehen, wollte man den eindringenden Geist und die durchgeistigte Technik auch nur andeutungsweise zu schildern versuchen. Die Bostoner bewährten sich da wieder einmal triumphal als vielköpfiger Virtuose, als eine wahre Mustervereinigung. Was uns Fiedler da an Kunst der Farbenmischungen, an Farbenbrechungen und Mitteltönen, an polyphoner Klarheit und durchsichtiger Darstellung bot, war eines Meisters würdig. Das Werk gehört zu den schwierigsten Dirigentenaufgaben, denn es erfordert bei großliniger Gesammtgestaltung und Uebersicht die subtilste Feinheit in der Gliederung der einzelnen Theile und in's Einzelne gehende Plastik in der Herausbringung der kleinsten Details.

Das Publikum brach zum Schluß förmlich in Jubel aus und rief Fiedler immer wieder hervor, der den Beifall auf die Meisterspieler leitete. Das Solo-Cello, das die Person des edlen Ritters verkörpert, und die Solo-Bratsche, welche den treuen Knappen Sancho Pansa darstellt, wurden von den Herren Warnke und Ferir klangschön und virtuos gespielt. Namentlich Herr Warnke erhob sich nach einem etwas nervösen Beginn zu einer bedeutenden Leistung. Sein Ton klang groß, blühend und die „letzten Worte" des Sterbenden sang er mit edler Einfachheit und fast menschlich sprechendem Klang.

Es war ein taktischer Fehler, dieser Klangorgie Beethoven's C-Moll-Piano-Concert folgen zu lassen, das sich nach dem Strauß'schen Instrumentalfeuerwerk etwas gar zu einfach, fast hausbacken ausnahm. Allerdings saß ein Busoni an dem Flügel, und da kam man bald wieder in Stimmung. Der große Künstler spielte das Werk mit gesammelter Concentration bald orchestral voll, bald mit liebevollster Ausarbeitung des Detailwerks, so recht als künstlerisch gezügelten Ausgleich zwischen dem Starken und Zarten, der Melancholie und Heiterkeit, der Kampfesstimmung und dem Beschaulichen. Ganz wundervoll spann und sang er den langsamen Satz. Busoni wurde begeistert gefeiert.

Weber's „Euryanthe"-Ouverture schloß

TIMES
ress New York City.
FEB 24 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS 'DON QUIXOTE'

Richard Strauss's Tone Poem Heard for First Time Since Orchestra Broke Down in It.

A DIFFICULT COMPOSITION

Beethoven's Third Concert in C Minor, with Mr. Busoni as the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played again in Carnegie Hall last evening, to an audience large and interested, even though the programme presented a subject not easy for many music lovers to enjoy. This was Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote"; there were, besides, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Préludes," and the overture to Weber's "Euryanthe." Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist, and he played Beethoven's third concert in C minor.

Strauss's "Don Quixite" had not been heard here since 1904. In that year the Boston Orchestra played it under Mr. Gericke's direction; and it also formed one of the works that the composer conducted when he gave a rather unfortunate series of concerts here in the same year. His performance of "Don Quixote" was especially unfortunate, as the orchestra broke down in it, and the composer had to pick up the broken strands before he could go on.

It is not strange that the composition has not been repeated since. It is of enormous difficulty and complication; and it sets up extraordinary demands upon the sympathies and patience of its auditors. In it Strauss has made his most extreme excursion into the realm of realistic programme music. He has not before or since attempted such painful exactitude of literal depiction as he has in "Don Quixote." The introduction, ten variations, and finale are, in large measure, almost unintelligible of themselves, purely as music, without such a detailed account of the successive doings of the orchestra as was provided in the programme book last evening. Preliminary investigation will not do unless it goes to the length of memorizing the notes; and woe to him who follows them and loses count, and still more woe to him who neglects to go across the street and provide himself with a copy of them. We are told by the most learned of the commentators that this music ought not to be listened to simply as music; that it is meant to illustrate something definitely, and that something should be as clearly known to the listener as to the composer. Unfortunately, the rules and regulations as to distributing programme books in Carnegie Hall seriously interfere with the progress of this type of music.

"Don Quixote" no longer shocks or alarms. It is not difficult for the intelligent music lover to follow the musical structure or the unfolding of the musical idea. He can see in it more clearly than ever the amazing skill and ingenuity of Strauss in his use and development and transformation of his material. His theme of Don Quixote has a very characteristic mock-chivalric turn, and yet lends itself singularly to musical elaboration. There are passages in some of the variations that are of real beauty; some few reach a fine and lofty eloquence, as where Don Quixote "speaks nobly of the ideal." Others are recognizably humorous; and humor in music is not always easy to detect. But the futility of the bleating sheep and the whistling windmachine and numerous other prosaic details was never more obvious; there are passages of mere commonplace adroitly placed to make effect; and the depressing and useless cacophony of the Straussian "counterpoint," which involves the easy process of putting together any and as many themes as desired, no matter how they sound, wearies and disgusts the eagerest listener. As a whole, and for what the composer intended it, "Don Quixote" can be regarded as only a very qualified success.

It can not be expected to be anything at all, except in such a remarkably skillful and perfect performance as Mr. Fiedler gave of it last evening. Mr. Warnke played the difficult and treacherous obligato 'cello part with unerring touch, with the air of an improvisation that much of it demands; and Mr. Férir deserves the highest praise also for his playing of the viola obligato. The whole performance abounded in flexibility and that sort of characteristic expression that the composer obviously intended. There was much applause, which Mr. Fiedler very properly made the orchestra share with him.

Beethoven's C minor piano concerto had not been heard in public here in years. It had been tacitly shelved by the pianists as antiquated. Mr. Busoni gave an extremely interesting interpretation of it, wonderfully clever and incisive, exquisitely articulated in the runs and passages, with much variety of tone color—and yet, with all his skill, he could not avoid a certain hardness and shallowness of tone. And he did rescue the concerto in large degree from the suspicion of being antiquated; perhaps not wholly, for there are some wrinkles on its countenance that will not be smoothed away. It was, at any rate, an experiment quite worth making, and that it impressed the audience so Mr. Busoni was left in no doubt.

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 24 1911

Fine Concert at Jamaica.

JAMAICA, Feb. 24.—Under the auspices of the Jamaica branch of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, a concert was given in Archer's Hall, last evening by Miss Bessie Collier, violinist, and Alexander Rihm, pianist. Both had previously been heard in Jamaica, when their playing was so much enjoyed that members of the Jamaica Branch of the Brooklyn Institute urged that they appear again. Miss Collier recently played with the New York Symphony Orchestra, of which Walter Damrosch is conductor, and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

---

rom EVE. SUN
Address New York City.
FEB 24 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

BOSTON ORCHESTRA STAND UP FOR "DON QUIXOTE."

Some Facts About a Composer of Alleged Impossibilities—A Season's Farewell of the Flonzaleys—The Opera Concert and Others.

Hear Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" three times in seven years and then admit that a trained musician locked in a room with these sounds alone—and no key to unlock the music's heart—would yet recognize its fundamental basis in a "theme and variations." The simplest of musical forms is only carried to the proportions of Brobdingnag. The hobby-horse hero of all the world is Cervantes's poor Don, that perfect, gentle knight of the days when knighthood wasn't in flower at all. Take the story with you, and the Strauss variations become concise, clear, inviting to human sympathy and stimulating to not unkindly laughter.

If these things break music's first laws, so much the worse for the laws, that's all. People first endured, then pitied Haydn's watery creation of the world and Beethoven's pastoral thunderstorm and Wagner's worm. Now they embrace them all. Strauss himself broke down brought his orchestra—or they brought him—to a full stop when he first conducted his quixotic fantasy in New York in 1904. Wilhelm Gericke and the Boston Orchestra came after and played it better. Max Fiedler and many of the same Bostonians came last night to Carnegie Hall, bringing the "Don Quixote" sheep behind them. 'Cellist Warnke on a pedestal played the romantic Don, and Ferir, hidden among the modest violas, sang jolly, commonplace Sancho Panza. First Violin Witek was one of the hundred other "soloists," more or less, and of course it's funny to hear big George Longy make a weak, helpless oboe bleat like a Wall Street lamb.

The windmills booming four-square in mellow brass, the sheep bleating in the woodwind, the knight and squire swapping their ideas, the muscular Christian soldiers, the night watch in an armory, the tambourine girl on the road, the joy-ride in the wind machine, the upset barcarole—where you could fairly see the plucked 'cello and viola wading ostrich-like ashore—the last affair of the two jogging monks and the death-rattle of the Don's sigh down a drawn 'cello string—oh! it was an awfully lovely little, half-sad, half-funny story illustrated with music in edition de luxe for the spoiled children of modern music. The whole orchestra stood up on three recalls for Strauss. The Beethoven piano concerto after it seemed worn and threadbare, though Mr. Busoni in ruffled shirt and silks played the rondo so crisply and the largo episode with the caressing touch of romance.

The Boston Symphony men go to Brooklyn to-night to play Schubert's Seventh symphony in C major, Liszt's piano concerto No. 1, with Busoni, and Saint Saens's "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Dance of Death." The printed folder on its front cover tells that "the regulations of the Academy of Music will not permit the distribution of these programme books at the concert; they may be had at the drug store, Fulton street and Lafayette avenue." It is the same in Manhattan, only the Fifty-seventh street "drug store" is long since closed and boarded up except on Boston Symphony days.

To-morrow afternoon Busoni will play at Carnegie Hall the seldom heard "Todtentanze" of Liszt. This paraphrase of the "Dies Iræ" Liszt drew from contemplating, so it's said, the frescoes of the Campo Santo in Pisa. There are others who fancy he was inspired by Holbein's picture of "The Dance of Death."

The matinée symphony will again be the C major of Schubert and the other numbers, Handel's overture in D arranged by Franz Wüllner and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 24 1911

LECTURE RECITAL.

Howard Brockway Explains Boston Symphony Programme.

There was much more recital than lecture in Howard Brockway's lecture-recital of yesterday afternoon, in lecture hall, Academy of Music, on the programme to be given this evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of that building. For he contented himself by giving brief description of a composition as a whole, then indicating the themes and the peculiarities attending their introduction.

He played exerpts from the entire programme, a few from the Schubert Symphany, the C major, No. 7; almost the whole of the Liszt Concerto, E-flat major, No. 1, which Busoni is to play with the orchestra, and very large amount from the two Symphonic Poems by Saint Saens, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," No. 1 Opus. 31, and "Danse Macabre," No. 3 Opus 40.

[174]

EVE. JOURNAL

New York City.

FEB 24 1911

Music

WHY does Richard Strauss generally provoke people to derisive smiles, to gnashing of teeth, to hyper-superlatives, or to sleep?

It is a fair enough question, for that is what Strauss and his music do.

And it is quite as difficult a question to answer as some of Strauss's orchestral puzzles used to be difficult to solve.

Of one thing, however, there is no doubt. The inevitable perspective is throwing its shadowy vista from where he has taken his stand in modern music, and it is already beginning to assert its inevitable conclusiveness. But the end of the perspective is not yet, and, therefore, such conclusiveness as one may arrive at by peering down its vista is not sufficiently conclusive.

Seven years ago Strauss's tone poem, "Don Quixote," was played in New York and it was not played here again until last night at the first and fourth pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. Seven years is not a long time, where music is concerned, but it is long enough to have some things come to pass in the interim.

Seven years, for one thing, may serve to distinguish musical craftsmanship from musical artistry. They may serve to crystallize opinion as to a musician's sincerity. And they may also serve to force a conclusion as to whether or not sheer realism in music is referable to idealistic suggestion and more or less definite mood evocation.

Strauss sets out to characterize for you Don Quixote and Sancho Panza and the Knight of the Doleful Countenance's imaginative conception of his Dulcinea. It cannot be gainsaid that to this extent he succeeds admirably.

But he goes much further. He attempts to portray with the orchestral sound apparatus ten of the adventures of Don Quixote.

This brings him to the bathos of literary music. If you know beforehand what he is going to do, it is not so bad; but if you don't, goodness only knows how you are going to understand his musical language.

And that is the fault of all music that depends upon literary narrative. Music can speak directly to the seat of the emotions but it can speak only directly through its literary forerunner when it rests upon a literary foundation.

It all resolves itself into the difference between the work of the camera and the work of the painter. Strauss reproduces for you with remarkable orchestral ingenuity the episode of Don Quixote's attack upon the Windmill, his battle against the Host of the Emperor Alifonforon, which host is merely a flock of sheep. You hear the ba-a-a-ing of the sheep in the muted brass and when there is a storm to be raised Strauss adds a wind machine to his orchestral forces.

But—one rises to pose a large and querulous "but."

Shall orchestral gimcrackery come between you and music?

And have the great masters of music evolved the art merely that it should become the handmaiden of literature?

Answer the question for yourself.

It took eight pages of Philip Hale's programme notes to provide for Strauss's "Don Quixote," and it took only two to furnish sufficient explanatory pabulum for Beethoven's third piano concerto, which was played last night by Ferruccio Busoni. But this was one of those things to which the rule of inverse ratios applies.

You have, no doubt, heard that little criticism about Meyerbeer. It was said that when he had nothing to say, he wrote a cadenza for the clarinet. When Mr. Strauss feels feverish he writes a tremolo passage for the strings, and a tenor tuba or bass clarinet serves him to think through.

Conductor Max Fiedler and his men from Boston did everything that was to be done with and for "Don Quixote." This task that Strauss set for the orchestra was beautifully accomplished and special mention should be made of the playing of the violincello portions by Heinrich Warnke and of the viola portions by Emil Ferer, of the orchestra.

Before Strauss came Liszt with his third symphonic poem, "Preludes." Liszt was one of the precursors of Strauss and, in the end, it may prove that Strauss is much more a follower of the Weimarian Hungarian than he is of Richard Wagner. Liszt seems somehow to fall short of intellectual distinction. His music is like a beautiful woman who might have crumbs in the corners of her mouth.

It remains to say that Mr. Busoni played the Beethoven concerto with forcefulness and appropriate color in the allegro, with a beautiful singing tone in the largo and with ingratiating delicacy in the lightsome rondo.

The programme was concluded with a brilliant performance of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture.

EVE. WORLD

ss New York City.

Boston Orchestra Plays Strauss's "Don Quixote"

Wonderful Exhibition of Skill in Depicting the Difficult Composition by This Superb Body of Players—Busoni a Soloist in a Beethoven Concerto.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

A SPLENDID exhibition of the virtuosity of each member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was made at Carnegie Hall last night, when Mr. Fiedler presented Richard Strauss's difficult "Don Quixote," which the composer himself once tried to conduct here with indifferent success. The "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character" got an illumination such as scarcely might have been hoped for even from these expert musicians. The prominent part allotted to the 'cello was masterfully performed by Mr. Warnke and the viola part with fine taste by Mr. Ferir.

Perhaps no other work of Strauss's shows his mastery of orchestration as does this one. It is a wonderful thing in construction, whether one likes it or not, conceived with an ingenuity that calls for the admiration of its most severe critic and abounding in color. Throughout this most polite of musical audiences there was a cackle of amusement when the bleating of the sheep was portrayed, and after the finale of the near dozen variations there was applause, which Mr. Fiedler made every man in the orchestra acknowledge, as it was meant that he should.

The programme began with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," and ended with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, both splendidly played. The soloist was Mr. Busoni, the distinguished Italian pianist, who chose the seldom heard third Beethoven concerto in C minor for his appearance. Somewhat antiquated, with joints that seemed to creak, it seemed to be, in spite of the player's skill, which was no less remarkable than ever.

Daily Eagle
Brooklyn, N. Y.

38

FEB 24 1911

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music this evening. The soloist will be Ferrucio Busoni, and the programme is as follows: Schubert—Symphony in C major, No. 7. Liszt—Concerto for pianoforte in E flat, No. 1. Saint-Saens—Symphonic poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," op. 31 ("Omphale's Spinning Wheel"). Symphonic poem No. 3, "Danse Macabre," after a poem by Henri Cazalis, op. 40. Soloist, Ferrucio Busoni.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 24 1911

A LECTURE RECITAL.

There was much more recital than lecture in Howard Brockway's lecture recital of yesterday afternoon, in Lecture Hall, Academy of Music, on the programme to be given this evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the opera house of that building. For he contented himself by giving a brief description of a composition as a whole, then indicating the themes and the peculiarities attending their introduction. He played excerpts from the entire programme.

ress

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Fiedler Gives "Don Quixote."

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, not only did a real service for musical New Yorkers last night, when he reintroduced to them Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" in Carnegie Hall, but he also revealed himself in an exceedingly favorable light as an interpreter of the great German composer; offering, indeed, by far the most satisfactory performance of this extraordinary work ever heard in New York.

That, to be sure, does not signify much if one recalls the only performances of "Don Quixote" given in this city before: the first by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Wilhelm Gericke, smooth and precise, but woefully lacking in variety of expression; the second by the Wetzler Orchestra, under the composer himself, tense, vital, interesting, but so inadequately prepared that a moment of rhythmical uncertainty caused a sudden breakdown.

However, Fiedler's reading had far more to commend it than mere comparison with previous examples. It was admirably worked out in its details. It was smooth and euphonious, delicate, refined, poetic. It had tenderness and pathos, tragic force and ingenuous simplicity. Where it gave least satisfaction was on the humorous side, though the sheer wit and fantastic fun of the music carried a delightful message nevertheless. The delicious theme of Sancho Panza, for instance, Fiedler took at too fast a tempo, weakening thus the good-natured drollery, the waggish, heavy-footed roguery which the music suggests.

Fiedler and his men treated "Variation II.," in which the old knight charges the sheep, in a truly masterly way. Here, indeed, the bleating of the muted brass and reed instruments over trembling violas, six times divided, and the panicky screeching of the first and second violins not only presented a picture to the ear as vivid as words or painting could give, but conveyed an impression poetically imaginative and moving.

Last night's performance of Strauss's "Fantastic Variation on a Theme of Knightly Character" confirmed the opinion that this work represents not only one of the most sincere and inspired efforts of the great composer, but will hold an important place in the annals of music. Surely this short opera without text, pictures or voices is a greater work of art than the same composer's music dramas, "Salome" or "Elektra!"

After this highly colored offering Beethoven's Concerto No. 3, in C minor, played with fine clarity by Ferruccio Busoni, sounded thin and pallid. It should have preceded the "Don Quixote." Liszt's "Les Preludes," which Fiedler's rapid tempo robbed of majesty and power, opened the evening. Weber's "Euryanthe" overture brought it to a close.

EVE. POST.

ress New York City.

e

MUSIC AND DRAMA

The Boston Orchestra and Busoni.

In these days when the war cry is, "Back to Mozart"—or, "Forward to Mozart"—every musician ought to read Kerst's "Mozart: the Man and the Artist," done into excellent English by Henry Edward Krehbiel, and published by B. W. Huebsch. The following, in particular, from a Mozart letter, is worth pondering: "If I find time, I shall revise a few violin concertos—shorten them—for our taste in Germany is for long things; as a matter of fact, short and good is better."

Short and good is better. If composers had heeded that injunction during the 133 years since Mozart wrote it, the musical ocean would not be covered with so many derelicts. There is Strauss's "Don Quixote," for instance. The Boston Symphony Orchestra played it last night, but it had not been heard here in years, and is, in fact, seldom heard anywhere. For this no one but Strauss is to blame. He had a good subject to write about, a subject calling for imaginative, sentimental, and grotesque qualities. All these are to be found in this piece, here and there; and, if Strauss had followed Mozart's example and shortened it, all would have been well. But the joy in his ability to "sling ink," as John Fiske used to say, tempted him to prolong this joke to nearly forty minutes, with the result that one becomes more and more wearied, until one is tempted to give expression to one's agonizing feelings of boredom by uttering a wild Indian yell and throwing things at the conductor and the players, even when they are giving as brilliant a performance as Max Fiedler and his well-trained men did.

"Don Quixote" had evidently got the lion's share of the rehearsing, for the performance of the other orchestral pieces, Liszt's "Preludes" and Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, did not come up to the usual high standard of this orchestra. Nor was the soloist, Mr. Busoni, able to reveal his extraordinary gifts in all their splendor, for he chose an early work of Beethoven's, his third concerto, which does not show the marks of the lion's claw, as many of Beethoven's later works do. A piece by Chopin or Liszt or MacDowell would have better stood the test of being placed after the richly-colored Strauss piece. Nor was the misplacing of the concerto the only fault of the programme. It was much too long. "Short and good is better" applies to programmes as well as to compositions.

To-morrow afternoon Mr. Busoni will play in Carnegie Hall, with the Boston Orchestra, Liszt's "Dance of Death." In Brooklyn to-night the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saëns will be played. It would have been interesting to have both of these dances of death on the New York pro-

[175]

Allerlei Persönliches.

Das Neueste über bekannte Personen und Kreise.

— Dr. von Haase, der Besitzer des Musik-Verlags Breitkopf & Härtel in Leipzig, hat gestern Abend Gast von Herrn Max Fiedler, dem Dirigenten des Boston Symphonie-Orchesters, wird aber dieser Tage wieder nach New York zurückkehren, um dann eine Reise nach dem Westen anzutreten. Dr. von Haase kam hierher, um kennen zu lernen, was Amerika auf musikalischem Gebiete bietet, natürlich wird er auch Land und Leute studiren.

EVE. GLOBE

New York City.

FEB 24 1911

"Don Quixote" Heard.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night, gave the third performance in this city of Richard Strauss's celebrated "Don Quixote." Though this composition is one of its author's most discussed works, largely because sheep are made to bleat in it through the medium of muted brass instruments, it has been neglected in New York. The Boston orchestra played it here first, in 1904. The same year Strauss himself conducted it here on the occasion of his visit to this country. His orchestra was not of the best and broke down during the performance. Now, the Boston orchestra does not break down during performances, even when it has to face the enormous technical difficulties of such a work as "Don Quixote." Neither for that matter do our Philharmonic and Symphony societies. So it is that the neglect of this work for seven years seems rather surprising, especially in view of the quantity of Strauss's music heard here in the mean time, including his operas (or scenic tone poems) "Salome" and "Electra."

The performance last night showed plainly that the learned Strauss is not altogether wrong in his theory that absolute music can create absolute mirth. The audiences that attend Boston Symphony concerts would rise in wrath if anyone termed them frivolous, but this one tittered visibly and audibly when sheep did bleat and the wind machine did howl like Boreas upon the blast. Whether the merriment was with or at is a question we cannot pretend to settle. It was there.

This extraordinary composition in an introduction, ten variations, and a finale requires close attention from all who would fain know its contents, for each section is designed to reflect an episode of the novel. Usually an ample guide is furnished (like the excellent one printed in the programme book last night), for without such help even a close student of Cervantes would be at sea, if not as Don Quixote and Sancho Panza are in one variation. Thus led one may thread the mazes of the music with amusement, horror, delight, what you will. At any rate few listeners surely will deny the great beauty of the closing measures that portray the death of "Don Quixote" and of the third variation in which he "discourses nobly of the ideal."

almost before the last notes had died away into silence a cry of "Bravo! Bravo! from somewhere on high rang through the hall; some ardent whistling followed it. Then the audience joined with its more conventional hand clapping. Mr. Fiedler quite justly signalled to his men to rise and accept with him the applause, for the orchestra had discharged its herculean task superlatively well. Mr. Warnke in the part for solo 'cello (the voice of Don Quixote) and Mr. Ferrir in that for solo viola (the voice of Sancho Panza) had a chance to distinguish themselves especially.

Before "Don Quixote" Liszt's "Les Preludes" was heard. It is rather surprising that this work which belongs now to the popular concert programme continues to be played occasionally by our symphony orchestras. Its empty pomp was set forth in all the splendor of the matchless band. After "Don Quixote" Mr. Busoni was heard in Beethoven's C minor piano concerto. This early work of the master is seldom given nowadays, but, though some of it has aged, enough remains that is beautiful to justify a sympathetic performance. Mr. Busoni's was thoughtful, scholarly, artistic, but missed the warmth and grace that can revivify this somewhat antiquated music. Weber's "Euranthe" overture, played most brilliantly, closed the concert.

ODD STRAUSS MUSIC BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

"Don Quixote," Symphonic Fantasia, the Feature of a Concert That Arouses Great Applause.

Mr. Richard Strauss' symphonic fantasia "Don Quixote" was the feature of the concert by the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night. At its close there were cheers and such applause that Mr. Fiedler, who conducted, asked his men to rise.

Mr. Strauss' extraordinary composition, with its mixture of grotesque music and passages of undeniable beauty, gave the orchestra a chance to show its virtuosity, of which it took full advantage. Mr. Warnke played the 'cello solo that constitutes so important a part of the work beautifully.

Mr. Ferruccio Busoni played Beethoven's C minor piano concerto with beautiful tone and crispness of style. He made the piano fairly sing in the Largo, and the Rondo was full of rippling cheerfulness. The orchestra's share of the concerto was done with delicacy. Mr. Busoni was applauded and recalled many times.

The concert began with Liszt's "Les Préludes" and ended with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture. Both these familiar compositions were played with the brilliancy for which this orchestra is renowned. The audience was as large as the hall could hold.

FADED TEXT

The First Established and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the AMERICAN

N.

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES DON QUIXOTE

Solo Instruments Impersonate Characters in Strauss Work, Which Pleases Audience.

At the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony, given last night at Carnegie Hall, much interest and comment was created by the performance of Strauss' "Don Quixote—Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character."

Strauss has taken the well-known romance and written his work in such a way that several solo instruments are meant to impersonate the principal characters in the story, while the rest of the usual orchestra, with a few Straussian additions, represents the elements and incidental happenings. For instance, the 'cello stands for Don Quixote, the viola represents Sancho Panza ,and the muted oboe is played for Dulcinea.

The entire tale is treated, making rather a long musical number, with no pause or wait. But however long it may be, last night's rendition was so superb, so carefully thought out and delivered, there was not a dull instant in the forty-five minutes used in its performance.

The work might rightly be called a 'cello solo with orchestral accompaniment. This part was played last night by Mr. Warnke, of the society, and his efforts were loudly cheered by the subscribers to these concerts.

A marked contrast to the muted tubas and wind machines in Strauss's music was the beautiful simplicity and affecting harmonies of the Beethoven concerto which followed. Terruccio Busoni played the piano part with delightful expression and at times phenomenal power. Busoni has discovered a unique method of striking a note sharply and with force and securing a remarkable singing tone singularly flutelike in quality. This was particularly effective in several instances last night. By his excellent performance of the concerto last night Busoni gained a firmer grip on his army of admirers in this country.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Preludes," and the overture to the opera, "Euryanthe," by Weber, were the other numbers of an unusually interesting and remarkably well played programme.

MORN. TELEGRAPH
New York City.
FEB 24 1911

"DON QUIXOTE" GIVEN BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Richard Strauss' Work the Feature of a Brilliant Concert at Carnegie Hall.

"Don Quixote," one of Richard Strauss' most remarkable schemes, was played last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

Mr. Strauss is a composer of genius, but one will be forgiven if he does not admit into the clear category of music a composition that can only be understood when accompanied by profound dissertations that are the gracious outcome of the collaborating geniuses of Cervantes and Mr. Philip Hale. Even with those two eminent compilers of philosophical fiction to stimulate and inspire one "Don Quixote" created a sense of tedium and a longing for a type of invention that was not quite so clever, not quite so sophisticated and not quite so far sought, and that was more musical. It was splendidly played.

Thus it came about that the energies of an association of musicians who for ability and enthusiasm are scarcely to be paralleled were devoted to music that lovers of music cannot find either enjoyable or instructive. How delightful it would have been to hear the greatest of all orchestras in some of the greatest of music rather than in a composition the values of which are disputed and the tendency of which in the minds of many sound and magnanimous critics is almost irritating.

Ferruccio Busoni took one into an entirely different atmosphere with the Beethoven C minor concerto, played with all his customary scholarship and forcefulness.

The programme included Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Weber's overture to "Euryanthe." There was a great house.

STRAUSS' DON QUIXOTE BY BOSTON ORCHESTRA

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

No one need doubt that the Boston Symphony orchestra has the most astounding virtuosity in the world after hearing the "Don Quixote" tone poem of Richard Strauss last night, when this organization, under Max Fiedler, visited New York for the last time but one this season. This was the principal feature on the programme, upon which Busoni played the third concerto of Beethoven, a work very seldom heard nowadays.

Only such colossal powers as those which mark Busoni's playing could have held an interest after the dissipating of all seriousness by the Strauss composition, to perform which he invented an instrument to represent the howling of the wind, and devoted several minutes which might have been spent in hearing music to representing a drove of sheep bleating.

It was difficult to hear the marvels of his orchestration, the sublime beauty of some of his motifs, the extraordinary feats which he can accomplish with an orchestra, to note the use to which he puts this genius in a work like the one heard last night without feeling that there is much truth in that statement and that he awaits eagerly the accounts of those who listened and pronounced this great music.

There is little to say of "Don Quixote" for those who know the story of the knight-errant, except that for one willing to listen Richard Strauss has reduced all sounds to the possibilities of an orchestra from the creak of the windmill, rusty on its axis, to a barnyard screech that distances anything that Rostand ever thought of in his "Chantecler." One forgets really whether the animals are pigs or sheep, and in this possibly Mr. Strauss is open to criticism, but for the general effect this detail is perhaps not all important.

There was a 'cello solo part running through most of the work, which was admirably played by Mr. Warnke, and one for viola, equally well delivered by Mr. Ferir. The audience manifested its appreciation of the share contributed by the orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, probably more than of the composition, which made greater demands upon the orchestra than any other of the modern fantastic outbursts.

Busoni played the Beethoven concerto with beautiful qualities, and yet it seemed to belong to an older day, more so perhaps than a Mozart would have sounded. The C minor concerto offers little to the great virtuoso, much less than any of the other concertos of the same master, but it was well worth hearing Busoni's exceedingly graceful and telling interpretation. The programme closed with the Weber "Euryanthe" overture.

Busoni will conduct his own work this afternoon at the Philharmonic concert by request of Mr. Mahler, whose desire it was to show him this courtesy.

"Tosca" was sung last night at the Metropolitan with Mme. Fremstad in the title role and Martin as Cavaradossi. Scotti sang the part of Scarpia. Caruso is now in Atlantic City and Jadlowker will sing the part of Rodolfo in "La Boheme," with Geraldine Farrar as Mimi.

WORLD
New York City.

BUSONI SOLOIST WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

Strauss's "Don Quixote" and Beethoven's Third Concerto Features of Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

There was no novelty in the programme of the fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, unless Beethoven's third piano concerto, C minor, op. 37, which appeared on a concert programme in New York for the first time within my recollection, might for this reason be called so.

I wonder why Mr. Fiedler chose to preface the ultra-modern extravagances of Strauss's "Don Quixote" with the flowing melodies and beautifully rich sonorities of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"—which, delightfully played, was most impressive—if it were not to emphasize the difference between the sane and the insane in music.

Cervantes, "Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance" was mad indeed, and in this respect Strauss's music faithfully depicts him. Programme music may suggest or describe moods, emotions and even material objects, and Strauss is certainly past master of the tricks of imitative orchestration. But this extraordinary work asks too much of even the musically educated hearer.

Knowing the title and general plan and idea of the composition, and with a detailed description of all that the prelude, theme, ten variations and finale are supposed to represent in the way of scene and incident before one, one may gain some idea of what it is all about; but hardly then. Without such aid it would simply be a jumble of odd sounds, quite unintelligible, and not over agreeable. There are, it is true, some moments of great musical beauty, like Variation V., "The Knight's Vigil," and the finale, while the 'cello solo—rarely well played by Mr. Warnke—certainly suggests the pathos even more than the humor of the poor mad gentleman, who with all his chivalric pranks remained a gentleman at heart. Almost any one too could recognize the ba-a of the sheep and the whistling of the wind-machine. But even so, is all this music? Not for me. It must be confessed, however, that after this riot of sound—whose performance was a bit of rare orchestral virtuosity—the Beethoven concerto appeared a trifle tame.

Though sounding so essentially Beethoven as to seem as familiar as if heard yesterday it was more typical of the earlier Haydn-Mozart period of the master than of his later and more individual style. Still it sounded wonderfully suave and sunny and as clean cut and finished in workmanship as a cameo.

Busoni's interpretation was marked by a feeling which was gracefully classic, but never dry, and much elegance and fluency of style and execution.

A rendering of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, romantic and full of color, closed an interesting programme.

EVE. TELEGRAM
New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra usually offers a wealth of music at its New York performances and the programme at Carnegie Hall last night was no exception to the rule.

There could be no greater contrast than the two principal offerings, Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote" and Beethoven's piano Concerto in C minor. They are the North and South Pole of music. The Strauss composition is made up of fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, and in their development the composer seeks to depict certain adventures of the famous knight of La Mancha. It is difficult to follow these adventures, even with the aid of the programme notes. The composition, however, is noteworthy with its bold treatment, its realism, its attempted humor and irony.

The great orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's direction mastered the overwhelming technical difficulties admirably and told the story as clearly as it could be told.

Mr. Warnke voiced Don Quixote on the 'cello, while Sancho Panza found expression in Mr. Ferir's violo. Both soloists and the orchestra and its leader were rewarded by an audience who were manifestly grateful for the opportunity to hear a remarkable work so remarkably well interpreted.

Mr. Busoni, an interesting personality and a remarkable pianist, made the Beethoven concerto sound like a new and at times almost modern work. Liszt's "Les Preludes" opened the concert and Weber's Overture to Euryanthe brought it to a melodious close. In the four admirably contrasted compositions Mr. Fiedler again demonstrated his skill as a programme builder.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
FEB 25 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Ideal Programme, With Busoni to Play the Liszt Concerto in E Flat.

Max Fiedler has made many fine programmes for the delight of the Brooklyn devottees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but memory does not hold one in which many exquisite parts blended into so harmonious and satisfactory a whole as that given at the Acedemy last night.

This was the more remarkable because the backbone of the concert was Schubert's symphony in C major, the one in which the composer holds the portals of heaven ajar for fifty blessed minutes and lets you hear the clestial choirs singing together. It is not an easy test to find music which will bear being heard side by side with that of the immortal master of melody. Mr. Fiedler made no foolish attempt to match the genius of Schubert. Instead he selected the thoroughly well made music of lesser men; music of delicate fancy and of clearly defined melodic and harmonic outline, so that there was not a single bar proclaiming the unrest, the uncertainty, the vain striving, or the black Russian gulfs of the moderns.

The symphony itself was played with such loving tenderness, with such an ideal beauty and purity of tone that its unfailing flood of melody seemed to be enhanced by the instruments from which it came. At the close of the stormy last movement there was a prolonged outburst of applause and Mr. Fiedler called the men of the orcrestra to their feet to share the honors. Never was a compliment more richly earned.

Then came the Liszt concerto in E flat, with Busoni at the piano. There have been many Liszt players of many degrees of excellence, and it is common enough to hear pianists who can roll out his climaxes with sonorous authority and who can tinkle his favorite passages at the very top of the key board with the requisite clearness. But few artists have ever drawn from the pianissimo passages of this concerto such wondrous delicacy and tenderness of tone as Busoni revealed last night. If you can imagine Orpheus equipped with a modern concert grand instead of his lyre, Eurydice would have followed Busoni's tone without once looking back. And the accompaniment to those soft places was as wonderful as the piano part. Orchestra and piano melted together in one of the most perfect demonstrations of extreme virtuosity which it is possible to imagine.

The concerto was followed by two symphonic poems by Saint-Seans, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and the "Dance of death." Saint-Seans may not be great, but he is a thoroughly finished workman who never leaves a loose end anywhere. His absolute mastery of the task which he sets himself in these descriptive pieces commands enthusiastic respect. And the gaily marked swing of Omphale's wheel made it an ideal step downward from the heights of Schubert. Both pieces are familiar, but never have they been better played than by this superb orchestra. Mr. Feidler must have gone to bed happy. Through the night nothing had gone wrong and some few things, including his share of the Liszt concerto, had gone so ideally and gloriously right as is only permitted by special dispensation of the gods in rare and precious moments. Such a moment was last night's concert for every sensitive hearer.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Busoni, Soloist, in an Unusually Fine Programme.

The fourth Boston Symphony concert will be given in the Academy of Music this evening. The soloist will be Ferruccio Busoni, and the programme is as follows:

Schubert, Symphony in C-Major, No. 7; Liszt, Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, No. 1; Saint-Saens, Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Op. 31; Saint-Saens, Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Danse Macabre," after a poem by Henri Cazalis, Op. 40.

FERRUCCIO BUSONI was again the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, playing Liszt's seldom heard "Dance of Death." In those diabolically clever variations on the "Dies Irae" Mr. Busoni was at his best. His extraordinary command of tonal gradation, his technical prowess, and his ingenuity of treatment conbined to make his playing a remarkable display of virtuosity.

The main orchestral piece of the afternoon was Schubert's C major symphony of "heavenly length." Mr. Fiedler's deviations from strict tempo in the second movement and near the end of the fourth we do not like, but he was much nearer the metronomic ideal than some conductors of this great work here have been, and in all other respects the performance was superb. The orchestra rose at a sign from Mr. Fiedler to share with him the applause of the audience. The concert opened with the pomp and circumstance of Handel's D major overture (as retouched by Franz Wüllner) and closed with the brilliance of Berlioz's to his opera "Benvenuto Cellini."

rom SUN

ddress New York City.

FEB

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS

"DON QUIXOTE" BY RICHARD STRAUSS GIVEN.

The Remarkable Variations Heard With Interest If Not With Delight—Busoni Plays One of the Less Frequently Heard Beethoven Concertos.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night served to introduce not a few music lovers of this town to Dr. Richard Strauss's remarkable set of variations entitled "Don Quixote." The composition was played here in the year 1904 under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke and also later under that of the distinguished composer. But it has not been a familiar acquaintance of concertgoers since that time, and therefore last night's performance must have offered a first hearing to many.

Nevertheless there does not seem to be any pressing call for a detailed analysis of the work. Such comment would present no great difficulties, for like Strauss's other compositions in the large orchestral forms, this is perfectly clear in musical construction. Once the hearer has acquainted himself with the thematic subject matter, which is compact, well defined and strikingly announced, there is no trouble in following the progress of the different variations.

Despite all that some unreasoning opponents have said Strauss is a master of the technics of construction. To this mastery he adds an almost wicked cleverness in orchestration, but this he uses to ends which all devotees of real art must deprecate. In no other work has he shown forth his abuse of his own skill to such a degree as in this same "Don Quixote."

Ernest Newman, an English critic usually sane and well posied, went into raptures about this creation, and not only he but also other adorers of Strauss have intimated that those who fail to perceive its grandeur are akin to those scarified by James Fitz Maurice Kelley for inability to recognize the genius of Cervantes.

But it is futile for the opposing parties to endeavor to reconcile their diamerrically opposite points of view. One party regards it as the summit of musical art to represent Don Quixote by a really beautiful and significant theme and Sancho Panza by a commonplace one. The other party shrugs its shoulders and says this sort of thing has been done over and over again.

One party declares that the imitations of a flock of sheep by combinations of instruments and of the ride through the air by still other combinations, helped out by a wind machine, are examples of musical realism unrivalled in the entire domain of the art. The other party holds that such doings are not artistic at all, but simply smart.

Technically these variations are ingenious, and they belong to a class of orchestral virtuosity of which Mr. Strauss is the principal practitioner. They might not inappropriately be called the reductio ad absurdum of Father Haydn's orchestral imitations of rolling billows and rushing storms. Wagner himself fell into line in this manner of writing when he invented the "Wurm" theme in "Der Ring des Nibelungen" and some other motives which will readily occur to the music lover.

But the employment of physical imitation is not Mr. Strauss's only resource. He treats certain solo instruments vocally and allots to them dialogues without words, and in these we are asked to hear the conversations of Don Quixote and his faithful esquire. We can do so if we have the voluminous programme notes, and otherwise we cannot.

The musical phraseology given to these instruments is generally broken and fragmentary like recitative, though it often rises to arioso. This floats in front of a background of orchestral descriptive writing, which for the most part is filled with empty realistic strivings, like the conversation.

The whole structure is in open defiance of the elementary laws of art. The attempt to make music statistically photographic is vain. It can never be anything else. Music is not a photographic art. It can be representative of moods and emotions, and when it is reduced to the office of the scene painter and the property man it is driven from its own high throne of idealism and discrowned of its royalty.

In "Don Quixote" Strauss rises to his finest level when he frankly abandons his own mannered virtuosity and falls back upon the eternal verities of musical art. He does this whenever he has an emotional state to express, and then he writes musically, naturally, broadly and beautifully. Perhaps at such times he exposes his own capacity, which is by no means as large as his admirers would have us believe, but he is at least a singer equipped with fancy and not a maker of illustrated catalogues.

The closing measures of "Don Quixote" are good. The third variation is better. The programme notes tell us that in it Don Quixote discourses nobly of the ideal. He sings a real and beautiful song. We recall that in the "Symphonia Domestica" there is a picture of Mr. [illegible] sitting down at night to compose. Gross and earthly cares have fled away. Mr. Strauss speaks nobly of the ideal. It is a situation calling for real music and real music is permitted to hymn her own glories. We prefer Don Quixote when he discourses nobly of the ideal. We do not care for the bleating of the sheep, the howling of the wind machine nor the arguments with Sancho Panza.

The work was superbly played. Every instrument in the orchestra is asked to play a solo part and at times to sing in an idiom foreign to its language. Such doings try the souls as well as the technic of musicians. But the Boston men met the exacting demands admirably. The 'cello obligato, a most important part, since it represents the personality of the hero, was splendidly performed by Heinrich Warnke. The viola solo representing Sancho was in the capable hands of Emil Ferir. The solo bits for violin were excellently done by Mr. Witek, the concert master.

The Strauss composition was prefaced by Liszt's "Les Preludes," and after it Feruccio Busoni, the pianist, played Beethoven's C minor concerto. This composition is infrequently heard. Mr. Busoni played it with musicianly skill and artistic intelligence. The concerto is not one of the greatest works of its composer, nor of its species, but it sounded quite sensible and purely musical after the remarkable discourse of Mr. Strauss. The concert ended with Weber's "Freischütz" overture.

rom Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N.Y.
ldress
FEB 25 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Busoni, Piano Virtuoso, Heard With Orchestra in Liszt Concerto—Excellent Performance.

Last night the fourth in the season's series of five concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in the opera house of the Academy of Music. The programme was rich in its individual numbers, and as a whole possessed an engaging variety. The soloist was Feruccio Busoni, the eminent piano virtuoso.

Schubert's joyous symphony in C major, No. 7, with its affluence of melody and its resourceful command of the instruments, was superbly played by the orchestra, under the scholarly and highly efficient conductor, Max Fiedler.

Beautiful sonority and flexibility of tone, perfect unanimity and subtle transitions were as impressive as usual. They are qualities essential in the rendition of this work of Schubert's ripened and matured powers. From the noble beauty of the first movement, through the romantic second, with its original and effective use of the instruments, through the delicious and exquisitely frolicsome scherzo, to the spirited, vigorous, dramatic finale, the symphony is of a haunting and compelling beauty. The use of the thematic matter is original and striking. The rendition aroused the audience to unwonted demonstration.

The second number, the Lisza Concerto, in E flat, major, No. 1, for piano and orchestra, enlisted the services of the artist and virtuoso, Busoni. Of his amazing technical skill it is unnecessary to speak. His position is indisputable. He is acknowledged to be an authoritative interpreter of Liszt. His command of tone is all-embracing; his intellectuality, emotional control, with definite expression and domination of elaborate difficulties, were abundantly demonstrated.

The introduction of the triangle in this composition aroused a storm of controversy when it was first given, but even the composer would have been gratified had he heard the way in which the musical episode was treated last night.

Two of Saint Saen's symphonic poems, the No. 1, op. 31 ("The Spinning Wheel of Omphale"), and the No. 3, the "Danse Macabre," concluded the programme. The latter, with its grim humor and fantastic imagery, was pleasing. "The Spinning Wheel of Omphale" was admirably rendered, with correctness and finish, but seemed lacking in the sensuous charm suggested by story of Omphale's seductive [illegible] beguilments.

TIMES

ess New York City.

FEB 26 1911 FEB 26 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fiedler Gives Extremely Orthodox Programme—Busoni the Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Max Fiedler, gave another concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. On this occasion there was no attempt to startle the ears with compositions of the moderns. The programme, in fact, was extremely orthodox, if one may be allowed to call Liszt's "Todtentanz" orthodox some forty-five years after Von Bülow disclosed it to the world.

The programme began with a superb performance of Handel's overture in D major No. 1, for which Franz Wüllner had filled in places in the original score, which in the original performances were doubtless left for the improvising ingenuity of a harpsichord performer.

Schubert's C major symphony, which could never be heard too often if played as well as it was yesterday, followed, and the other orchestral number was Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."

Ferruccio Busoni, who has been much in the public ear this week, as he has played two concerts with the Boston men and conducted his new "Berceuse Elegiaque" with the Philharmonic Society, was the soloist of the afternoon. He played Liszt's more or less unfamiliar "Todtentanz," a set of fantastic variations on the "Dies Irae." His playing was particularly brilliant on this occasion, and, joined with the performance of the Boston men, gave to the work an extraordinarily uncanny effect.

STANDARD U[illegible]
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

ss

FEB 2[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT THE ACADEMY.

With Ferruccio Busoni as the soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music last night. The programme of the evening brought forth no novel features, although some in the audience may have considered two numbers by Camille Saint-Saens "old enough to be new." Suggestively entitled, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre," these phantasies for full orchestra have suffered much in consequence of inefficient and ragged treatment since their relegation from the more artistic repertoire of concert pieces. To have them presented under the splendid auspices of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was therefore very interesting, although neither of the two compositions by Saint-Saens was hardly in accord with the pace set by such a wonderful masterpiece of melodic construction as Schubert's Symphony No. 7 in C major, which headed the programme.

To those of orthodox sentiment, in fact, such a contrast would imply the very extreme of bad and injudicious taste. But this would be without counting into consideration a superb orchestral instrument capable of ornating to the point of highest tonal beauty even the most commonplace material. For in both "Omphale's Spinning Wheel" and "Danse Macabre," more especially the latter, Saint-Saens' technical ingenuity is far superior to his musicianship. There is an abundance of clever description and coloring, but withal the music lacks substance and inspiration. It is such music as this that drags on the artistic sense after it has offered a few moments of frivolous diversion to the ear.

And yet the very manner in which the orchestra, under the able baton of Max Fiedler, performed "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," seemed to add to the piece a continence and a beauty which, under the conditions of a less refined performance, it would hardly possess. It would be difficult for the most imaginative to have missed the picture. The recurring passage for violins, in which the buzz and whirl of the spinning wheel is clearly illustrated, is an inimitable bit of mimicry worthy of Richard Strauss. The melodious section of the poem is not badly conceived, and is certainly delightful to hear when performed, as it was last night, with delicate shading and nuance. That final rise of the strings into whispering harmonics was exquisite. As for the "Danse Macabre," it is impossible even for Fiedler and the Boston Symphony to lift it from mediocrity.

The audience, however, found their greatest source of pleasure in Schubert's noble symphony. Fiedler gave the work a reading that was in every respect authentic and satisfying. It is not difficult music to interpret, Schubert not being of the "psychological" sort. His message, as conveyed through the movements of this symphony, is purely objective and impersonal, leaving in its wake a host of charming melodies. Indeed, in the entire orchestral pattern, so freely and gracefully woven, there is not an unattractive thread. The music flows on unceasingly, always beautiful, whether the mood be sad or merry. There is dignity to the sonorous opening andante, and a tendency towards reflection and serious meditation in subject matter of the second movement. But neither section encroaches upon the morbid or fatalistic, as those with an eye for the "programme" would probably desire. The tragedy of the composer's life, his early death, in fact, would lead one to expect a gathering of omens and storm clouds in his music.

But not so with the Schubert of this C Major Symphony. In the main, it is full of the joy and vigor of health. The atmosphere is open, exuberant and inviting. A fragrant optimism, devil may care feeling sweeps through the sylvan harmonies of the scherzo. The impression is of woodland nymphs rushing to and fro, dancing, laughing and reveling in the sunlight of a spiritual happiness. Then that entrancing melody in the finale, with its galloping accompaniment, carrys one further into the realization of Schubert's genius. It has been said that the symphony is a veritable "storehouse of melodies."

This is true, as it also is true that Franz Schubert was the most melodious soul the world has ever produced.

Liszt's Concerto in E flat was Busoni's vehicle for the evening. His performance was not in the very best style, although technically proficient. Busoni is one of the great pianists of the day, and therefore there is no limit to what is expected from him. His work in the Liszt piece was not blazed with poetic fire. But Brooklyn is to hear him in recital very soon to much better advantage. It will be a treat of which more will be said later.

Address Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Date FEB 25 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES ITS FOURTH CONCERT

Splendid Programme Played in Splendid Fashion.

BUSONI IS THE SOLOIST

Schubert's Symphony of the "Heavenly Lengths," Liszt Concerto and Two Saint-Saens Works Greatly Please Large Audience.

The Boston Symphony Society played the fourth in their series of five philharmonic concerts before a large and fashionable audience in the opera house of the Academy of Music last night, with Ferruccio Busoni as soloist. Nothing new was attempted in the programme, but it was the most delightful and purely melodious concert that the Brooklyn music lovers have yet heard from Max Fiedler's big orchestra. It consisted of Schubert's symphony in C major; a concerto for piano and orchestra by Liszt, and two exquisite symphonic poems by Saint-Saens.

The Schubert symphony, better known as that of the "Heavenly Lengths," was, of course, the best of the numbers. Absolutely lacking in all technical difficulties, this composition still remains the most beautifully simple and melodious of all the great symphonies. It is played many times each season by other orchestras, but it is doubtful if it could be played any better by any orchestra than it was by the Boston Symphony last night.

Mr. Fiedler's orchestra seems almost peculiarly fitted for the Schubert composition. Every clear tone and blended harmony was brought out to almost perfection, so that the wonderfully simple melody running through the whole symphony was never for a moment lost sight of. The symphony, of course, was shortened considerably, as has to be the case when it is performed in conjunction with other numbers in the same evening. It was divided into four movements: the andante, allegro ma non troppo, andante con moto, scherzo, with an allegro vivace in a trio, and the finale in allegro vivace. The third movement was particularly delicious.

It was unfortunate that the symphony had to be the first number on the programme, as the first two movements were interrupted too often by late comers.

"Busoni was eminently satisfactory," someone was heard to say in the lobby after the performance, but that was putting it mildly, to say the least. That the big audience felt he was something more than "satisfactory" was evidenced by the prolonged applause which greeted the conclusion of his performance, when he was called out repeatedly to bow his thanks for the spontaneous applause. Not only was his playing exquisite throughout, but it would be difficult to discover a composition better suited to his work than the Liszt composition, which is of unusual beauty.

The two Saint-Saens' symphonic poems were replete with grace and beauty, and have seldom been played better. The first was his poem No. 1, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," better known as "Omphale's Spinning Wheel." The second was the "Danse Macabre," after a poem by Henri Cazalis, and was rich in tone and sensuous power.

TELEGRAPH
New York City
ess
FEB 26 1911

The master of all musicians, Ludwig Van Beethoven, was the sole composer represented on the fourth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in the Lyric on Wednesday night, and he was represented by only two works, a concerto for violin and the ninth symphony. The concerto was played by Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. This year, as last, Director Fiedler, of the orchestra, had the assistance of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore, which is led by Mr. Joseph Pache. The soloists were Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso.

WORLD

ess New York City.

FEB 26 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE

Busoni Arouses Enthusiasm by Liszt's "Dance of Death."

The fourth matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Carnegie Hall yesterday with Ferruccio Busoni pianist as soloist. The organization played Schubert's seventh symphony in C major, Handel's overture in D major and the overture to Berlioz's opera "Benvenuto Cellini," with its accustomed tonal beauty and technical precision.

Busoni aroused enthusiasm for his virtuosity in the Liszt "Dance of Death," a paraphrase [illegible] klyn, N. Y.

[177]

25 1911

VES

CERT

ed in

ST

eavand atly

yed haron-the erw it ic
do
d

TRIBUNE

New York City.

FEB 26 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Musicians Go from Strauss to Schubert Successfully.

From the "Don Quixote" of Richard Strauss to the Seventh Symphony of Franz Schubert is a long journey in more ways than one, yet the Boston Symphony Orchestra accomplished it between Thursday night and yesterday afternoon. It was accomplished as if Strauss and musical realism and queer harmonies had been totally forgotten by Mr. Fiedler and his musicians, and the result was a beautifully executed performance of one of the most beautiful of all symphonies.

The perfection of the ensemble was marvellous, the orchestra responding to its conductor as some great, intricate machine responds to the lever of the engineer. But if there was the perfection of the machine, there was as well an informing poetry and regard for the subtlest delicacies of nuance that gave to the lovers of the work the most exquisite pleasure. Mr. Fiedler gave no individual reading of the symphony, but one instinct with reverence for the composer. The light and shade were almost infinite, yet delicacy of treatment was not gained at the sacrifice of power or virility.

The soloist was again Ferrucio Busoni, who gave to Liszt's "Dance of Death" all his remarkable virtuosity. There was alternately power and wonderful lightness in his touch, a splendid clarity of tone, and a prodigious dexterity in his fingers. As to poetry and feeling—those who love Mr. Busoni's virtuosity probably do not miss other qualities.

The other two numbers on the programme were Handel's "Overture in D major, No. 1," and Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini." The audience was of Boston Symphony size.

m .....

ress .....

BUSONI IS STAR OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Wins Much Admiration in Piano Part of Liszt's "Dance of Death."

Of the five symphony concerts which took place in New York during the past week none was of greater interest than that at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony.

While the programme contained one of Schubert's greatest works, his seventh symphony, the interest of the afternoon was centred in Liszt's "Dance of Death," in which Ferruccio Busoni played the piano part.

It has been said that Liszt was very much impressed by a view of an ancient Italian fresco called 'The Triumph of Death," and he has tried in the work to convey his impressions by notes. The usual scenes of festivity and death, angels, fiends and allegorical figures are contained in the picture and Liszt in his "Dance of Death" has written tone-pictures of these with no mercy for his interpreter.

Busoni, with his prodigious knowledge of technique, must have called upon all his resources. He gave a performance that was faultless in expression and bewildering in its brilliancy.

The symphony, while noted for its wealth of sustained melody and the masterly manner in which Schubert has developed and elaborated his thematic material, is also remembered for its uncommon length. This fact has, from the first, prevented its being heard frequently.

In one of the programme notes there is a statement that the last movement alone contains 1150 bars of music, or what would make twenty pages of an ordinary piano piece.

Notwithstanding all this, the audience did not seem to find the symphony a test of patience, and at its finish applauded with such enthusiasm that Mr. Fiedler was compelled to return four times to acknowledge his thanks, and finally shared his honors with his standing orchestra.

Handel's overture in D major, which opened the concert, and the overture to Berlioz's opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," which was the final number, were performed in the Boston orchestra's usual finished style.

At the next two concerts, which will be the last of the season, Anton Witek, concertmaster of the society, and Alwin Schroeder, the veteran first 'cellist, will be the soloists.

SUN

m .....

New York City.

dress .....

te .....

BOSTON ORCHESTRA MUSIC

SCHUBERT'S SYMPHONY IN C MAJOR PLAYED.

Performance of a Composition Seldom Heard—Busoni the Soloist—Liszt's "Todtentanz" for Piano and Orchestra—A Berlioz Overture Heard.

The fourth matinée concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday at Carnegie Hall, was attended by an audience of great size. The programme was one of miscellaneous but characteristic quality. Mr. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist.

The orchestra played as an opening number an overture in D major by Handel. It is one of a series of concert compositions by this master and it received its present arrangement from Franz Wüllner. The two movements of which it consists are in the form of a prelude and fugue and as a whole it serves to show one of the forms of composition to which the word "overture" could be applied in Handel's time.

The second number on the list was Schubert's symphony in C major, No. 7. This long but glorious work takes about an hour for its rendering. Yesterday it received a treatment from Mr. Fiedler that was lavish in the delights it afforded. Throughout the reading of its four movements there was a luscious display of elaborate and brilliant tonal splendors, and which was always sustained by the proper clarity of phrasing. It was a performance of exquisite finish. At its conclusion the applause was prolonged and it was shared by Mr. Fiedler and his orchestra.

Liszt's "Todtentanz," for pianoforte and orchestra, came next. It is a composition seldom heard. It includes a set of five variations and their following episodes, founded on the cantus of the "Dies Iræ" as a theme. The introduction illustrates possibly the verse occurring in the old Dances of Death and now occasionally to be found on old New England tombstones. The verse has been thus Englished by Philip Hale:

So here lie all our bones; and to us both great and small come dancing!
As you are now so once were we; as we are now so shall you be!

Liszt received his first impressions for his fantastic composition from the fresco attributed to Andrea Orgagna in the Campo Santo at Pisa, "The Triumph of Death." The painting presents groups of mortals in the midst of earthly pleasures. Others are reflecting upon the crowds of the dead which lie before them.

Above these, in the centre of the picture, Death, robed in black, carrying a scythe and in the form of a woman, is flying through the air. All states and conditions are among those she has deprived of life. Potent themes of such and other suggestions Liszt has woven with marvellous skill and much frequent power into his "Dance of Death." Quite demoniacal in effect is the artistry of sounds he produces and the rich masses of tone color, fiery in their fury of speed. For an intelligible performance of the work prodigious feats of virtuosity are required, a virtuosity in which are displayed the entire gamut of piano technics. Mr. Busoni was fully ready for his task. He played with ease and brilliance and he was assisted by the orchestra in a manner quite complete in its understanding. The overture to the opera "Benvenuto Cellini" of Berlioz brought the concert to a close.

rom HERALD

ddress New York City.

Date .....

CHEERS FOR MR. FIEDLER.

Boston Symphony Orchestra and Its Conductor Delight Audience at Concert.

Another huge audience attended yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, and unusual enthusiasm prevailed. After the playing of the Schubert C major Symphony there were cheers for the conductor, Mr. Max Fiedler, and his men. The members arose and took the honor standing. It was well merited, for the orchestra played almost flawlessly and with wonderful quality of tone.

Berlioz's overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" and a Handel overture completed the list of orchestral pieces. The soloist was again Mr. Ferruccio Busoni. He played Liszt's "Dance of Death" in a stirring manner, displaying his remarkable virtuosity and arousing his audience.

m .....

dress .....

ate .....

PRESS

New York City

FEB 26 1911

Busoni with Boston Symphony.

Ferruclo Busoni was the soloist in the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, and again pleased the large and critical audience which had heard him on Thursday night with the same organization. His technique was displayed to advantage in his only number, Liszt's "Totentanz," though to many he did not seem to give an inspired interpretation. But, if Busohi was cold, Max Fiedler was not, and his orchestral numbers delighted because of their virile readings and exquisite perfection.

In the Handel Overture in D Major, No. 1, which opened the programme, the conductor was at his best, his men supporting his every mood with keen sympathy and intelligent force. The symphony, Schubert's in C Major, No. 7, was presented artistically and without marked variation from the score. The second movement, perhaps, was taken rather more slowly than usual, but, if so, did not lose by the conductor's infusion of his own idea. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," familiar to all concert-goers, closed the programme and was its least pleasing feature.

m TELEGRAPH

Address New York City

Date FEB 26 1911

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Max Fiedler, gave their fourth concert on Monday evening, at the Academy of Music. The soloist was Heinrich Warnke, the distinguished 'cellist of the orchestra, who played the violoncello solo part in Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote." This was the feature of the programme, and Mr. Warnke received applause for his work during the selection, as Mr. Fiedler did at the close. The programme began with Weber's overture to to the opera, "Euryanthe," which was followed by the "Don Quixote" selection. The following three selections were Wegner's, being, the Funeral Music from Act III. of "The Dusk of the Gods," "A Siegfried Idyl" and prelude to "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg."

EVE. TELEGRAM

ess New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday afternoon had the assistance of Busoni in that weird "Dance of Death," by Liszt, played with truly Macabaresque power. Schubert's C Major Symphony was played as only the "Big Band from Boston" can play, and the tumultuous applause that followed was well deserved. With a Handel overture to open and one by Berlioz to close, the programme was a varied delight throughout.

s .....

Max Fiedler allowed his orchestra to rest up a trifle after the cacophanies of the Strauss "Don Quixote" tone poem and presented a programme of staid qualities on Saturday afternoon. Busoni was again the soloist, and he devoted his energies to Liszt's "Todtentanz," which is not often heard nowadays. With the accompaniment of the Boston orchestra the brilliancy was really dazzling and effective to a supedlative degree.

The "Todtentanz," or "Dance of Death," is built upon the "Dies Irae," and is unusually weird even in these days. The programme opened with Handel's overture in D major, which was to have been played last time, but which was replaced by a work played in memory of James Higginson, brother of the patron of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Schubert's C major symphony was the most important number of the offering, and it was given with all the wealth of excellence at command of this noble orchestra. The fourth number of the programme was "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz.

* * *

EVENING POST.

ss New York City.

FEB 27 1911

The playing of Liszt's "Dance of Death" was the feature of Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Both the pianist and the orchestra rose to the height of the occasion, making this wonderful paraphrase of the noble "Dies Iræ" one of the great events of the musical season. The opening pages show that, with a virile artist like Busoni at the keyboard, the piano can be made to vie in power and grandeur with the orchestra itself. Liszt can make even variations interesting. The time has come when this splendid work should be heard frequently. Schubert's ninth symphony, which preceded the "Dance of Death," was played by Mr. Fiedler and his men in a perfunctory way, which made it seem like a faded rose without perfume. When Mahler conducted it a few weeks ago at a Philharmonic concert it seemed like a fragrant rose bud just unfolding. It makes such a difference who the conductor it!

rom EVE. WORLD

ddress New York City.

FEB 27 1911

ate .....

(Busoni was the soloist in Liszt's "Todtentanz" for piano and orchestra at the Boston Symphony's concert in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. He played with all the masterfulness and charm that have made him first favorite with a large number of lovers of the piano. Mr. Fiedler and his players in this number as well as in the delightful, if overlong, Schubert's seventh symphony; Handel's first overture, and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture maintained the best traditions of this superb orchestra to the delight of a crowded house.

- in the World SUN

m EVENING

ress BALTIMORE, MD.

Date FEB 24 1911

Beethoven

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's program, presented Wednesday night at the Lyric, was rather unusual, being devoted to one composer and consisting of two works only, opening with a concerto for violin and closing with a choral symphony. On first thought such a choice and arrangement of numbers seemed questionable, and doubtless if any other composer except the immortal Beethoven had been thus represented the program would not have been as satisfying.

Both the numbers which were selected are colossal examples of the art of musical composition, the violin concerto standing pre-eminent in its class and the Ninth Symphony towering monumentally above all other works of its kind. Anton Witek, violinist and concert master of the orchestra, gave a wonderful rendition of this great concerto. While his interpretation was temperamental, it was not, however, too fiery or too sweet in sentiment, but was marked with certain dignity and repose. Mr Witek played with consummate skill and disclosed astonishing technical command, but there was never a moment when virtuosity was allowed to obtrude. His tone is elastic, refined and always pure, full of color and nuance. The cantilina passages were superbly beautiful in quality, and in the rapid technical figuration his tone was always clear. In brief, Mr. Witek's performance of this noble concerto was masterful and he was given an ovation which was truly deserved.

In the Ninth Symphony Beethoven's creative power appears more wonderfully than in his preceding eight. In listening to the first three movements of this symphony we feel that we are in the presence of something far higher and far wider than the mere development of themes, for these movements appeal through their poetic sentiment and touch the emotions and imagination of the hearer. The melodies are full of characteristic significance and their simplicity adds nobility and distinction to the work. A peculiar fact about many of the melodies employed by Beethoven is that they are made up mainly of consecutive tones. This is an individual trait that can be found in many of the earlier compositions of the master, and in the symphony it is noticeable in the Scherzo and Finale, where some of the important themes are constructed in this simple manner, and yet their effect is truly wonderful. The melody of the Adagio is perhaps unparalleled in its beauty, grace and strength. The rhythmic spirit of the Scherzo seems unsurpassable, for although its style has been extensively copied by modern writers, it still sways and charms the hearer.

The last movement, which forms the choral part of the symphony, has been much discussed and criticised, for in it Beethoven has used themes which deteriorate in merit and has given the voices difficulties which are ungrateful, and it must be admitted that this part of the work does not compare with what has preceded. The members of the solo quartet sang their difficult parts admirably and the Beethoven Oratorio Society, which assisted, did remarkably well. The chorus sang with good quality of tone, their intonation being quite satisfactory, considering the highly pitched parts.

Granting that this symphony is a great work, still, as it was given last year, one fails to understand why it should have been repeated this season. Mr. Fiedler read the work in an individual way, but the interpretation was perhaps a bit too heavy and too sentimental at times. On the whole, the orchestra did not play with its accustomed excellence, the intonation in the woodwind being impure and the various sections lacking precision. The clarinets and oboes were prominent at times. This was perhaps due to the different placing of the instruments. The tympany was very much in evidence and the players' capers attracted attention.

F. C. B.

[178]

m EVE. JOURNAL

ress New York City.

te

Music

TO you who read passing comment upon the music that is given forth by orchestras and singers and various instrumentalists as the Winter moves on its way the passing commentator is sometimes moved to express his uncertainty as to just how often and just when his telling of the much-told tale is permissible or apposite.

Have you heard the great symphonic works of the past, for instance, often or seldom? Are you as interested as you should be in the circumstances surrounding their inspiration and conception; the generally sad and discouraging stories that have been woven out of their battles for acceptance; the wondrously beautiful messages they hold of construction and invention, and their pregnant significance of mood and emotion, of life itself in its deepest content of struggle and yearning aspiration?

Is passing comment of this sort too much of a much-told tale?

One wonders.

No musical season is worth the name that is without the manifold expression of Beethoven as set forth in the more complete of his symphonic works. And luckily, we have no such musical seasons in New York. The "Eroica," the brooding and tragic C minor, the joyous Seventh, the Sixth's hymn to nature have all been heard this season, and it is to be hoped that the Ninth will be heard before the end.

Yet, of course, there is not only Beethoven. The masters of a newer idiom, the expression of the spirit of our own time, also have their message, and, too, there are the post-Beethovenians. Among the last there is numbered no genius with a lovelier message than Franz Schubert—and the rounded sum of Schubert is the C major symphony.

Therefore it was very well that Conductor Max Fiedler and his Boston Symphony Orchestra played this great work upon the occasion of their fourth New York visit. And they played it with an understanding and a mastery of orchestral technique that was as warmth to the heart to hear.

Is it part of the much-told tale to recall that the exuberant spirit of Franz Schubert went its way to join the ghostly infinite when he was still but thirty-one, and after he had poured forth its mellifluous stream of beauty as an almost unheeded libation before listless worshippers of mediocre gods?

Perhaps—and perhaps not.

Nevertheless, the much-told tale may be recalled.

The songs of Schubert are the very distillation of his romantic youth; but byt the time he had become thirty the gray pressure of the world upon his shoulders held even his buoyancy beneath its unremitting weight. And it was at thirty that he wrote this C major symphony.

Schubert was not a delver into philosophies, as was Beethoven, but his philosophy of life at thirty—and one may have such a thing at thirty—is revealed in the C major symphony. It was not a philosophy of the schools; it was a philosophy of life—just that.

Here is the fullest expression of Schubert's genius. The slow sweep of the introduction, with its horn calls, fixes the underlying mood of the music. This is not the Schubert of sheer, unthinking poetry, but that of a Schubert whose poetic gaze is fixed upon life itself.

And life reveals both ingratiating pleasures and the contrast of a strange and serious mystery. Both find a masterly expression in the allegro first movement. The mystery has been set forth in anticipation in the introduction, and in the first movement it finds fuller development in the intoning of the trombones.

Nor is even a genius such as Schubert without his defeats. Aspiration ever hovers far above the heights of accomplishment; the staved paper holds only a part. A gloriously melodious march theme in the second movement gives place to soft and mysterious chords in the strings, and even more mysterious horn tones call as from afar. One can do what one must.

The gayety of life has its place in the unconventional scherzo, but even here there is its admixture of sadness. This is not the Schubert who can be given up to gayety alone. And the finale amply verifies this conclusion. It begins in troubled mood and a weft of emotional passages succeed one another with accompaniments of hurrying triplets in the strings. The finale becomes dramatic and of tragic intensity. Life has become the drama of inward conflict, of outward tragedy.

The rest of the Boston Symphony programme consisted of Liszt's "Dance of Death" variations for piano and orchestra, the piano portion played by Ferrucio Busoni; Haendel's overture in D major with the harpischord improvisations filled in for orchestra in Franz Wuellner's arrangement, and Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture.

The Liszt "Dance of Death" is seldom played, probably because of its great difficulties for the piano soloist, but it is one of the Hungarian's works that display his qualities at their best. Mr. Busoni was altogether equal to the technical difficulties of his task and he succeeded most admirably in bringing out the bizarre spirit of the work.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

FEB 21 1911

ANTON WITEK PROVES WORTH AS SOLOIST

He Achieves Brilliant Success In Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave a Beethoven evening, with Anton Witek as soloist.

Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the Boston Orchestra, was called to that distinguished position from Berlin, where he had been at the head of Nickisch's first violins in the Philharmonic Orchestra for 15 years. Herr Witek has remarkably facile fingers and bow arm, exceptional poise of faculties, and a keen sense of proportion. He and his predecessor, Willy Hess, possess very similar virtues as violinists, but Witek is more appealing as a solo performer because of the greater warmth of his tone and the broader geniality of his attitude.

The Beethoven concerto, with which Herr Witek made his Baltimore debut as soloist last evening, has, since its appearance in 1806, tempted violinists having classical trends and ambitions. To play it has been the goal of violinistic aim, and, because of the unique difficulties which it presents, it has probably been oftener inadequately presented than has any other concerto. It not only contains awkward technical episodes, but it is too broad to fit artists who are built on narrow lines. Henri Wieniawski, Joachim, in his prime, and Fritz Kreisler have, in the memory of your reviewer, responded most eloquently to its nobility of form and substance.

Intonation Was Pure.

Herr Witek's intonation and his conception of the concerto, while not entirely conventional, was musicianly. His technic was crystalline, but his tone seemed smaller than usual, probably because of the space, people and draperies behind him, for each and all of these are tone absorbents, and in no degree reflectors. In spite of untoward conditions Herr Witek's cantabile was sometimes ethereal.

The Ninth Symphony was created after Beethoven was entirely deaf—three years before his demise—and still its first three movements and the "Eroico" (third symphony) seem to reach up higher above material things than do any other even of that master's immortal works. The scheme, themes and development of the choral part of the symphony are amazingly transcendental, but the human voices are in it treated with such disregard of their comfort and limitations that it is safe to say that it requires the influence of Beethoven's all-powerful name to keep its place in the world's programs. Hans von Buelow did many eccentric things in the last years of his leadership of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, and the public looked upon them as the freaks of a beloved but spoiled child. He once gave the Ninth Symphony three times during 12 hours—a public rehearsal at 12 M., the first evening performance at 7.30 and the second at 9 o'clock. It has been the custom in many European towns to produce this symphony at the close of their musical seasons, but one seldom hears it even tolerably sung.

Oratorio Society Did Well.

The Oratorio Society did its work surprisingly well last evening, and the vocal quartet came near accomplishing the impossible.

The program was:

Beethoven—
Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, Op. 61.
I. Allegro ma non troppo.
II. Larghetto.
III. Rondo.

Beethoven—
Symphony No. 9, with Final Chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125.
I. Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
II. Molto vivace: Presto.
III. Adagio molto e cantabile.
IV. Presto.
Allegro assai.
Presto.
Barytone Recitative.
Quartet and chorus: Allegro assai.
Tenor solo and chorus: Allegro assai vivace, alla marcia.
Chorus: Allegro assai.
Chorus: Andante maestoso.
Adagio, ma non troppo, ma divoto
Allegro energico, sempre ben marcato.
Quartet and Chorus: Allegro ma non tanto: Prestissimo.

THE CHORUS OF THE ORATORIO SOCIETY OF BALTIMORE.
JOSEPH PACHE, Conductor.

Soloists—
Madame Corinne Rider-Kelser, soprano.
Miss Janet Spencer, contralto.
Daniel Beddoe, tenor.
Claude Cunningham, basso.
Anton Witek, violin.

O. B. B.

NEWS

Baltimore, Md.

ORATORIO CHORUS IN FINAL REHEARSAL

Excellently Trained For Its Part In Beethoven Concert This Evening.

Final preparatory work on the choral movement of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which, in its entirety, will be one of the offerings at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric tonight, is being completed by the chorus of the Oratorio Society this afternoon, the first and only rehearsal with the Orchestra being under way. The last of the general rehearsals for voice alone was held last night at the Peabody and was largely attended. Director Joseph Pache took the chorus over the particularly difficult places in the score during the early part of the evening, and at a later hour delivered the baton to Max Fiedler of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Fiedler again declared himself delighted with the excellent condition in which he found the singers and predicted their success in repeating the Beethoven work. The chorus first sang it under his direction on Washington's Birthday last year. Admission to the stage this afternoon was only by card.

The concert tonight will be exclusively Beethoven, the opening number being the Violin Concerto in D major, to be played by Anton Witek, the new concertmeister. Mr. Witek entered the position of concertmeister upon his departure of Willy Hess, who had held it for a number of years, for Berlin at the beginning of this season. The concert tonight will be the first opportunity Baltimoreans have had of hearing Mr. Witek in the capacity of a soloist. His reading of the Beethoven D major is said to be a noble and distinguished one and among the strongest numbers in his repertoire.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

STAR

m

ress

BALTIMORE, MD.
FEB 22 1911

te

Boston Symphony.

Tonight brings the fourth Boston Symphony concert of the season to the Lyric in a great Beethoven program. There are but two numbers on it, but they represent the very highest achievement in their two different fields of music. The first will be the concerto for violin in D Major, which will be played by Anton Witek, the famous concert master of the orchestra, who will then make his first appearance here as soloist and the second number will be the choral symphony, in which the orchestra will have the assistance of the Oratorio Society of this city and a quartet consisting of Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso.

ORATORIO READY TO DUPLICATE SUCCESS

Give Beethoven Symphony With Boston Orchestra In Lyric Wednesday.

After a week spent in extra hard work preparatory to their appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at the Lyric Wednesday night the members of the chorus of the Baltimore Oratorio Society declare themselves more than ready to duplicate the success of their appearance with the famous orchestra in the colossal Beethoven composition last year.

That event was so eminently satisfactory in every respect that Mr. Fiedler was asked for a repetition this year, and with this end in view the chorus has been devoting a large part of its time this winter to the difficult choral parts of the symphony, rubbing down the rust and striving after even a greater degree of finesse and general excellence than characterized its work in the composition at its premier appearance with the Boston musicians.

All that now remains is the orchestra rehearsal, which will occur during the day Wednesday, and the going over of the music under Mr. Fiedler's personal direction. Joseph Pache, director of the Society, is in a high state of glee over the accomplishments of his big body of singers thus far, and predicts another complete success for Wednesday night. The soloists will be the same that sang last year, the list being inclusive of Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Janet Spencer, contralto; Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Claude Cunningham, basso.

So thoroughly is the Beethoven music at the command of the chorus that it has been justified in dividing its practice time with the tremendous score of Bruch's "Moses." This will be sung with the New York Symphony Orchestra at the Lyric on the evening of March 8, Viola Waterhouse, soprano; Humbird Duffey, tenor, and Frederick Martin being the soloists.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

STAR

m

dress

te

SYMPHONY SCORED TRIUMPH AT LYRIC

Boston Orchestra Gave Notable Concert—Oratorio Work Splendid.

One of the most notable of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was that given last night at the Lyric, when a Beethoven program was presented. The first number was the Beethoven Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra; the second was the choral symphony—the Symphony No. 9, with the final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy."

The audience that assembled was a very large and brilliant one, packing the hall, and was most enthusiastic in its applause. Mr. Anton Witek, the new concert master, was the soloist in the first number, and his playing was greeted with the greatest enthusiasm; in fact, at the conclusion of the number he was given a genuine ovation. Entirely apart from his technical ability, Mr. Witek has that temperament that enables him to interpret Beethoven in most masterly fashion. His art is exquisite, and in the delicate passages of this number, passages that can so easily be marred by a crude interpretation, his effects were well nigh perfect. Perhaps there is no composer who makes greater demands upon the technique than Beethoven. In the last movement of this number the violinist was exceptionally fine.

In the choral symphony the work of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore, of which Mr. Joseph Pache is director, was splendid and reflected great credit upon the local organization. In the great swelling choruses the attack was strong and the large audience thrilled with the volume and unity of the tones that took up the passionate "Ode to Joy," with which the symphony concludes. The beauty of this work is a great impressive beauty, and it was worthily interpreted by the splendidly trained chorus of the Oratorio Society last evening.

The soloists were Madame Corinne Rider-Jelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso. Mr. Cunningham, whose recitative precedes the choruses, gave the number most effectively. But the most interesting was the great ensemble of orchestra and chorus when the audiences thrilled with the following anthem:

Joy, thou star from heaven appearing,
Daughter from Elysium!
We approach thy light so cheering,
To thy altar now we come.

Thou hast power to bind together
What the world would rend apart,
And, where'er thy light wing flutters,
Love and peace are in the heart.

The individual work of the Boston Symphony Orchestra needs no comment; it is always splendid, and Conductor Fielder directed the combined orchestra and chorus in his usual masterly manner. The program, in detail, was as follows:

Beethoven—Concerto in D major for violin and orchestra, op, 61.
I.—Allegro ma non troppo.
II.—Larghetto.
III.—Rondo.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 9, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," op. 125.
I.—Allegro, ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.
II.—Molto vivace: Presto.
III.—Adagio molto de cantalile.
IV.—Presto.
Allegro assai.
Presto.
Baritone recitative.
Quartet and chorus: Allegro assai.
Tenor solo and chorus: Allegro assai Vivace, alla marcia.
Chorus. Allegro assai.
Chorus: Andante maestoso.
Adagio, ma non troppo, ma divoto.
Allegro energicosempre ben marcato.
Quartet and chorus: Allegro ma non tanto: Prestissimo.

The chorus of the Oratorio Society of Baltimore, Joseph Pache, conductor. Soloists—Madame Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor; Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso; Mr. Anton Witek, violin.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

m

ress raised.

Choral Rehearsal Tonight.

The final rehearsal of the choral part of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, which will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Oratorio Society at the Lyric tomorrow night, will take place in the Peabody Conservatory this evening. An urgent call has been made by Director Pache for every singer of the chorus to be present, as Director Fiedler, of the Boston Symphony, will be present to personally conduct the work. The first and only orchestral rehearsal will be held at the Lyric at 2 o'clock tomorrow afternoon, when the work will be gone over in its entirety with the musicians.

[179]

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
AMERICAN
From
Address
Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tonight brings the fourth Boston symphony concert of the season in a great Beethoven program. The first number will be the concerto for violin in D major, by Anton Witek, the famous concert master of the orchestra. The second will be the choral symphony in which the orchestra will be assisted by the Oratorio Society of this city and a quartet consisting of Mme. Corinne Rider-Kelsey, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; Mr. Daniel Beddoe, tenor, and Mr. Claude Cunningham, basso.

EVE. BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

Musical Notes

GIVING its fourth concert of the season at the Academy of Music next Monday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will have Heinrich Warnke, 'cellist of the orchestra, as assisting soloist, in Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," which will be the principal item on the program. "Don Quixote" differs from all the other of Strauss's tone poems in that it comprises as introduction, a set of variations and a finale. Although it is less played than most of his other works, it has been pronounced his highest achievement in symphonic music. The 'cello has an important solo voice, representing the knight, and the viola, not often heard as a solo instrument, portrays Sancho Panza. This part will be played on Monday evening by Mr. Ferir. The program begins with Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, and the second part will be Wagner—the funeral music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung" and the "Siegfried Idyl" and "Meistersinger" preludes.

NORTH AMERICAN

Philadelphia, Pa.

PROGRAM OF CONTRAST BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Orchestra, at Academy of Music, Presents Works of Strauss and Wagner

'DON QUIXOTE' NUMBERS

MUSIC, the product of heaven-born inspiration, and that which is the result largely of almost mathematical cleverness, engaged the attention of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a program of striking artistic contrasts at the Academy of Music last evening.

Richard Strauss, in his most ingenious mood, was represented in the "Don Quixote" variations. There is a bewildering variety of uncommon contrapuntal effects in this composition. By no means all of them are tributes to the shrine of beauty. Occasionally Herr Strauss' persistent musical realism leads him perilously to the domain of the ludicrous.

When the much-discussed wind machine gets going, or when the herd of sheep "baas" through the muted brasses, amused amazement supplants any other emotional appreciation. The fantastic loveliness of the strange finale is indisputable, but the variations as a whole seem lacking in nobility of conception.

It is impossible to hear them and preserve due mental equilibrium without a scrupulous perusal of the accompanying notes. Herr Strauss' musical riddles have answers, of course, but it is seriously to be questioned whether the solution is worth all the investigation of the most studious listener. The appeal, even of descriptive music, should be more obviously direct, and when the work takes on the proportions of an instrumental puzzle the wings of poetic imagination have been fatally clipped.

When Wilhelm Gericke directed the Boston Orchestra in the first Philadelphia performance of "Don Quixote" several years ago, the composition was regarded chiefly in the light of a remarkable curiosity. The radical advancement of modern music has scarcely warranted a change of opinion. There is far too much insistence on objective detail in these ten variations to permit of any unbroken emotional appeal, and without this music, even in its most revolutionary forms, loses one of its principal functions.

The work was played with telling virtuosity. Heinrich Warneke interpreted with facility the cello solo passages, illustrative of the adventures of the "Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance."

Epic grandeur nobly asserted itself in the succeeding number, which was the so-called "Funeral March" from "Die Goetterdaemmerung." The tenderest of poetic fancy followed in the "Siegfried Idyll," and there was a dash of invigorating cordial in the "Meistersinger" Overture, which closed the concert.

om PUBLIC LEDGER
dress Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Strauss's "Don Quixote" Variations Performed, With Warnke as Solo 'Cellist.

PROGRAMME.

1. Weber—"Euryanthe," overture.
2. Strauss—"Don Quixote," fantastic variations.
3. Wagner—Funeral music, Act III., "Goetterdaemmerung."
4. Wagner—Siegfried Idyl.
5. Wagner—"Meistersinger," prelude.

The usual large audience heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night in a programme including not only three characteristic Wagnerian excerpts lately played by our own orchestra, but a seldom-heard work of Richard Strauss, the "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character," written with the life history of Cervantes' hero for its text. The latter work—complicated, difficult and curious as it is—was listened to with the manifest approval and interest which it abundantly deserves, though at the end some of the hearers may have been, like Keats's explorers, silent with a wild surmise.

The solo 'cello, so masterfully handled by Heinrich Warnke, second 'cellist of the orchestra, impersonates the dear old idealist mixture of Sir Roger de Coverley and the White Knight of Wonderland. The cynical yet devoted man-at-arms, Sancho Panza, is delineated by the viola, played last night very beautifully by Emil Ferir. The orchestration carries the knight and his comrade through a graphic sequence of ten adventures, with a prelude and a finale, in which (with a wonderful downward ebbing of the scale) the sands of life run out and the good Knight passes away amid the universal lamentation. It is in musical terms the death of Sir Roger in Addison's description, or Falstaff's demise, as Dame Quickly tells of it.

Over in the corner behind the double basses stood something like a conjuror's cabinet covered with red baize—this was the wind-machine, from which, as from the bag of Aeolus, were released portentous moanings and howlings, most dexterously interwoven with the cries of the wood-wind instruments, in the variation which represents the efforts of the knight and his squire to fly on a wooden horse. Quite as vivid as the procession of sacrificial victims in "Elektra" was the herd of cattle "lowing at the skies," the victims of one of the furiously mistaken onslaughts of the Knight. Strauss carries his fondness for muted brasses in this work even to the point of throttling the tuba—an effect hitherto unimagined. The 'cello's contabile opportunity comes in the "Knight's Vigil," in which the fair Dulcinea appears in answer to his prayer—his Blessed Damozel, his Beatrice. A certain pathetic seriousness, rising even to sublimity, runs all through his madness: however amusing the windmills and the sheep may be, you do not feel like laughing at the Knight any more than you feel like laughing at Hamlet—although according to certain modern wiseacres the Elizabethan Hamlet was supposed to be mirth-provoking.

The Weber overture constituted a tuneful introduction; the Wagner numbers were delivered with contemplative dignity, and Mr. Fiedler evinced again his scholarly understanding, which comprehends and sympathizes with music of every school.

EVE. BULLETIN

Philadelphia, Pa.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote" the Feature at the Academy

That most eccentric and seldom-heard invention of Richard Strauss, "Don Quixote," was the chief ingredient of the fourth concert of the season given at the Academy of Music last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra before a large audience that was cordial almost to the point of enthusiasm.

The Strauss tone poem is designated as "fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character," and it is a frank attempt to express by musical means the mental aberrations of the famous knight of the sorrowful countenance as contrasted with the hard-headed common sense of his devoted squire, Sancho Panza, and to depict with rather amazing realism some of the adventures through which they pass. The knight is subjectively represented by the solo 'cello, which was played with broad intelligence and delicate feeling by Heinrich Warnke, first 'cellist of the orchestra. The squire's music is assigned to the viola and was interpreted with humorous eloquence by Mr. Ferir.

However much one may be inclined to question the artistic wisdom of forcing music to depict with uncompromising realism the discordant bleating of an approaching herd of sheep and the cacophonous clatter of the wind mills against which the brain-sick knight tilts, Mr. Fiedler's spirited reading of the Strauss composition left no doubt of its extraordinary cleverness and originality. In those rare moments of intentional beauty, as, for instance, when Dulcinea appears to Don Quixote while he is keeping his knightly vigil, and when the knight, with reason restored, is lying at the point of death with his sorrowing friends around him, the orchestra played with such charm as to awaken gratitude for the relief to ears and brains rather overtaxed with dissonantes.

The lengths to which Strauss is willing to go in his neurotic striving for effect was illustrated in the "imaginary ride" episode, where a theatrical wind contrivance is introduced against muted brass and strings. The effect of screeching gales was attained, it is true, but the din was appalling.

Mr. Fiedler showed due consideration for his audience by bringing his concert to a close with three beautiful and ever-popular Wagnerian numbers, the Funeral Music from the "Dusk of the Gods;" the "Siegfried Idyl," and the Prelude to the "Mastersingers," which were played with fine poetic feeling. A brilliant interpretation of Weber's "Euryanthe" overture opened the concert.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
RECORD
From
Address
Date

"DON QUIXOTE"

Audience Receives Rapturously the Boston Symphony Program.

The music which preceded and followed the playing by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy last night of Richard Strauss' fantastic conception of "Don Quixote" acted as a nerve restorative and served to palliate, to some extent, the shock to the sensibilities endured in listening to the series of variations which Strauss has thought a suitable melodic expression of the "Knight of the sorrowful countenance" and his adventures. "Don Quixote" consists of an introduction, a theme with variations and a finale. The solo violoncello represents the theme of the Knight, and the solo viola Sancho Panza. There are 10 variations, composed chiefly of noise and monotony, not unmixed with positive nerve-racking torture. Each of these remarkable variations is supposed to represent or portray an incident in the novel. An imagination more susceptible than that attributed to "Don Quixote" is a necessary accompaniment to any degree of enjoyment of this work. It is needless to say that this degree of susceptibility was pretty generally possessed by the audience, which filled the house and applauded rapturously.

There is no denying the beauty of the themes employed by Strauss. And there are tone moments of positive rapture in the orchestration. The motive back of it all, however, is so paplably false that the most ordinary reasoning faculty is compelled to repudiate the entire idea as destructive of music as an art. When music degenerates into noise it becomes a useless medium of expression. The noises of a boiler factory are descriptive, but they are, in no measure, an art. Why should a fantasy, as "Don Quixote" is freely admitted to be, express the ugly and bizarre? Schumann, who was particularly fond of the fantasy form, wrote, not ugly or noisy things to express his ideas, but some of the most ravishingly beautiful compositions. His great "Fantasie" and the studies known as "Kreisleriana," after Hofmann's ideations, are proof of this, to say nothing of the "Fantasiestrietle." Schumann, without conforming to ordinary methods, and without reducing his music to absurdity, produced music that was full of eccentricities, but at the same time so fascinating that its spell is never escaped. Strauss produces themes of great beauty, developed into hideousness. Even Berlioz, in his "Symphonie Fantastique," holds the imagination by the double bond of beauty and eccentricity. Nothing so confirms the taste for Beethoven as a dose of the Strauss "program music," such as "Don Quixote" and the "Sinfornia Domestica." As representing a type they are worthy of study, but they are not a type that will endure, because the first essential of art is lacking.

Warnke, who played the solo parts of the variations displayed a lovely tone and was warmly applauded. The viola work of Ferir was also enjoyed.

The beautiful reading of the Weber Overture to "Euryanthe" and the three Wagner numbers, Funeral Music from "Die Goetterdaemmerung," "Siegfried Idyl" and "Meistersinger" prelude, quite compensated for the doubtful pleasure of "Don Quixote." Max Fiedler gives the Wagner music with truly great expression and power and succeeds in lifting the listener into realms of delight.

ss

Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert of the season at the Academy, and it was, perhaps, the most interesting of the year, as Mr. Fiedler had chosen a program of great variety that represented the widely different musical schools of Carl Maria Von Weber, of Richard Strauss and of Wagner. The excellence, the perfection, indeed, of the Boston Symphony is a constant surprise even to those familiar with its history and with the abilities of the eminent directors who have guided its fortunes. Mr. Fiedler maintains the high tradition of his predecessors for dignity and breadth of interpretation, for catholicity and sympathy for all that is best in musical literature. Last night's program was opened with a spirited rendition of Weber's Overture to the opera, "Euryanthe," and this number was followed by the feature number of the program, Strauss' "Don Quixote," for orchestra and violoncello. Mr. Fiedler led his musicians through the mazes of this bizarre composition with an intelligence that was as informing to the audience as it was essential to the best presentation of the Strauss problem music. In Cervantes' Don Quixote Strauss has found an emitional and spiritual abnormality, admirably suited to his own genius that revels in the musical exploitation of high-strung feeling and unwonted experience. This extraordinary musical composition that is a revelation of Strauss' almost diabolic mastery of technique, reminds strongly of his "Electra" in the passages of weird fantastic musical realism that conjure up before the imagination the fields of battle, the rides through the air on the pastoral scenes in which Cervantes' hero performs his erratic exploits. These passages are varied with startling suddenness by others of greatest poetic beauty; for the rapture of love or the sublimity of death have, perhaps, nowhere found more exquisite expression than in this same musical creation, which, like Strauss' "Tod und Verklarung," remains a paradox for musical critics. In comparison, however, Wagner's music dramas appear to possess perfect lucidity, even as they possess a robust vigor and a noble idealism that are entirely lacking in this other more modern problem music that only occasionally touches the vital in life in its mad effort at effect, in its appeal to introspection, in its realistic representation of the commonplace as well as the noble. The three concluding numbers were the funeral music of "Dusk of the Gods," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the prelude to the "Meistersinger." It is to the credit of musical Philadelphia that these deeper expressions of genuine feeling were received with marked favor. The

om PHILADELPHIA PRESS
dress FEB 21 1911

"DON QUIXOTE," BY RICHARD STRAUSS

Program.

Weber. Overture to the opera "Euryanthe"
Strauss. "Don Quixote" (introduction, theme with variations and finale): Fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character. Op. 35.
(Solo Viola, Mr. Ferir).
Wagner. Funeral Music, Act. III. from "Dusk of the Gods."
Wagner ..... "A Siegfried Idyl"
Wagner. Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Soloist. Mr. Heinrich Warnke

"Don Quixote," a fantastic tone poem by Richard Strauss, which dates back to 1897, was the principal number on the program for the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music last evening. Mr. Fiedler, as if he felt it were not sufficiently daring to introduce this eccentric composition, contrasted it with Weber's delightful overture to "Euryanthe," with its brilliancy and tenderness, which opened the concert, and the three characteristic selections from Wagner, which followed the "Don Quixote." Strauss terms his work "fantastical variations on a theme of a knightly character," and it comprises an introduction, theme with ten variations, and finale. It is uneven and inconsistent. Its measures range from passages of uplifting harmony to a disconcerting confusion of discords, and from some unfortunately rare, inspiring moments, when the theme is endowed with melodic originality, to a conclusion that is conventional and commonplace.

A Musical Anarchist.

Strause, the musical anarchist, offends against both taste and the sensibilities of his audience by introducing a "wind machine" such as is used behind the scenes of theaters to simulate a storm. Flutes, harp, drum rolls, bassoon and other instruments contribute to the discord which is supposed to represent the wind whistling around Don Quixote and Sancho Panza as they sit blindfolded on a wooden horse and fancy it is bearing them through the air. An earlier variation representing the bleating of sheep in the episode where the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance charges the flock, thinking it is a great army and puts it to flight. Here the bleating of the sheep was imitated by the muted brass instruments. It may be noted here that in the introduction at one point all the instruments, brass, wood wind and string, are muted. This bleating of sheep and the noisy confusion produced by the Knight's attack resembled nothing so much as the noise made on Hallowe'en by the crowd blowing tin horns on Chestnut Street. The audience was moved to laughter, but it is questionable whether they did not laugh at the composer rather than with him.

Yet there were delightful moments among the variations, including the Knight's vigil and the meeting with Dulcinea. The Knight was represented in the orchestra by the solo violoncello, and the Squire by the solo viola. Mr. Warnke's execution of the solo violoncello passages, including the vigil, well deserved the special applause which he received from the audience which recalled him as well as Mr. Fiedler at the end of "Don Quixote." There was orchestral ingenuity in the scoring of the variation descriptive of the journey in the enchanted bark, when the Knight and the Squire are upset into the water, but succeed in gaining the shore and give thanks for their safety. The finale representing the death of Don Quixote is peaceful and the harmonies based on the theme of the Knight (solo violoncello) are free from eccentricity just as they are free from inspiration.

Tribute to Orchestra.

The applause which followed the Strauss composition was generous, but a tribute to Mr. Fiedler, Mr. Warnke and the orchestra as distinguished from any sentiment of approval for the Strauss composition, interesting though it may have been to hear it once. "Siegfried's Funeral Music" from "Dusk of the Gods," with its brilliant collection of prominent "leit-motive," which are associated with the hero and with the Volsung race; "A Siegfried Idyl," with all its tenderness of slumber song, cradle song and love scene, and the bold and energetic instrumentation of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," all exhibited the perfect co-ordination and the delicate precision which has been attained by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the sureness with which under the direction of Mr. Fiedler they produce effects of lightness or tenderness, or of breadth and volume. Each of the three Wagner numbers was followed by spontaneous and general applause.

WILMINGTON

INQUIRER

Philadelphia, Pa.

ess FEB 2

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Boston Symphony Orchestra Heard in Strauss and Wagner Program.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening, when it was heard by a large audience in a program was substantially derived from the compositions of Richard Strauss and Richard Wagner. It began with the former's fantasia of "Don Quixote," which had not been played here for several years and which is regarded by many competent judges as its composer's masterpiece. It is in a form which Strauss very seldom employs, that of the theme with variations, and it is developed through a series of ingenious and eloquently graphic transformation to a resounding and extremely effective finale.

Its purpose is to illustrate some salient episodes in the adventurous career of its chivalrie hero, and that it does so with a striking originality and an extraordinarily graphic power no impartial and intelligently appreciative listener, whatever he may think of the means employed to suggest the bleating of the sheep, etc., will care to dispute. It is all diabolically difficult, but difficulty is a word which has no meaning for the organization which Mr. Fiedler directs and its performance was so nearly faultless in its technical brilliancy and illuminative eloquence as to call for nothing but praise. It was really a remarkable exhibition of virtuoso playing.

Other numbers on the program were funeral music, from "Die Gotterdamerung," the Siegfried Idyll, and the overture to "Die Meistersinger," which were all admirably given. The fifth and last of these concerts will take place on Monday evening, March 20.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

ITEM.

ess

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT ACADEMY

The usual large audience heard the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night in a programme including not only three characteristic Wagnerian excerpts lately played by our own orchestra, but a seldom-heard work of Richard Strauss, the "Fantastic Variations on a Theme of Knightly Character," written with the life history of Cervantes' hero for its text. The latter work—complicated, difficult and curious as it is—was listened to with the manifest approval and interest which it abundantly deserves, though at the end some of the hearers may have been, like Keats' explorers, silent with a wild surmise.

This was followed by the impressive "Funeral March" from "Gotterdammerung," the "Siegfried Idyl," and the often-heard Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

The Weber overture constituted a tuneful introduction. The Wagner numbers were delivered with contemplative dignity, and Mr. Fiedler evinced again his scholary understanding, which comprehends and sympathizes with music of every school.

m lress

e

Symphony Concert.

A great audience assembled in Infantry Hall for the fourth concert of the season Tuesday evening. In the gathering were noted Mr. William B. Weeden, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, the Misses Hunt, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelaide Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Smith, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mrs. W B. M. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Prof. Lorenso Sears, Miss Sears, Mr. Frederick W. Allen, Mr. Richmond Allen, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Miss Mary D. Phillips, Miss Harriet J. Miller, Judge and Mrs. William H. Sweetland, Mrs. E. R. Trowbridge, Mr. Thomas Crosby, Mrs. William O. Todd, Mrs. Willard C. Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. Walter J. Towne, Mrs. Charles W. Alexander, Miss Fanny Alexander, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Helen B.

tis, Miss Ada Johnson, Mrs. Grace L. on, the Misses Hall, Mr. and Mrs. A. Rooke, Mr. and Mrs. George eman, Mrs. Samuel Amies, Miss Bowen, Mrs. William H. Rowiss Ethel Parks, Prof. and Mrs W. Brown, Miss Helen M. Capron.

RECORD, THURSDAY

MARCH 9, 1911

The sale of seats for the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony orchestra next Sunday evening, which is now in progress.

HERALD, WEDNESDAY,

MARCH 8, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Will Play at New Bedford Theatre on Monday Evening, March 13.

The Boston Symphony orchestra is to give another concert in the New Bedford theatre, New Bedford, on Monday evening, March 13, and, as has been the custom in the past, a large number of music lovers from Fall River will attend the concert. The soloist will be Heinrich Warnke, the celebrated solo violoncellist of the orchestra, who will play Saint-Saens Concerto in A-Minor, which is the most melodious of all the works of its kind.

The concert will begin with the immortal C-Major symphony of Schubert, which has been called—and justly so—a veritable storehouse of melodies. It was the performance of this symphony by the orchestra which so aroused enthusiasm in New York a few weeks ago. Another delightful work on the program is Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," in which the Bohemian composer seeks to celebrate the beautiful river that cuts through his native country. The final number will be Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia." Arrangements have been made by which prospective patrons of this concert may reach home at an early hour.

TRANSCRIPT, THURSDAY

MARCH 9, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

LIGHT MUSIC, PENSION FUNDS AND RECIPROCATION

A Memory of Vienna and an Impending Incident—"The Sacrifice" Repeated—"Tristan" and Those That Hear—Verses for Miss Farrar — The Unsung Bass-Drummer—Mr. Amato as Scarpia at the Opera House—The Programme for Mr. Clement's Concert—Miss Garden's New Adventure — Wolf - Ferrari's Operatic Trifle

YEARS ago, when the Opera House at Vienna used to give an annual performance to increase various charitable funds for its employees, it mounted a very light opera—an operetta even—in which its eminent singers disported themselves in parts very unlike those that they ordinarily undertook. Opera singers did not take themselves so seriously in those days as they do now; they had even a saving sense of humor, and if these performanees in Vienna and in other German cities were not exactly finished, they were highly amusing. The Symphony Orchestra, when it would increase its Pension Fund, can hardly turn to operetta. Its functions and distinctions are instrumental, not vocal. Tonally, it may caper to Strauss, to Debussy and to the rest of those troublesome ultra-moderns, who like to pull the instruments about as though they were so many puppets for their fancy or their feats; actually it sits and plays with the gravity that befits an exacting task to be done to high standards. When it would be light and amusing, its only outlet is to choose its music accordingly. Sometimes, and wisely, it decides to be so at its Pension Fund Concerts, and thus next Sunday evening, it will have its sport—and make ours—with such music as Tschaikowsky's dances in the ballet of "The Nut-Cracker" and Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz." It is the orchestra's nearest approach to the old custom of the Vienna Opera House.

In its way, the Pension Fund is one of the distinctions of the Symphony Orchestra. Its existence sets the band apart from the other American orchestras that have none and affiliates it with the great European orchestras with which it ranks. The fund is a sign of the permanence of the orchestra, of the assured future that those who control it would give the men and so be assured in turn of their best abilities and their full loyalty. The fund is token, too, since twice each year the public helps to swell it, of the dependence of the orchestra upon those that week after week and year after year listen gladly to it. To found an orchestra, to meet its deficits, to carry it to higher and higher standards is but half the task—for munificent wealth ambitious of the arts, ambitious of the community whence that wealth has sprung. The other half of the task falls to those that receive these things. They must give their support when they see that they are good, they must make the atmosphere in which they can flourish. Every Friday afternoon and every Saturday night the reciprocation that makes the Symphony Concerts possible fills Symphony Hall. Twice every year, it can fill it again at the concerts for the Pension Fund—the return to the men for their share in the glories of the orchestra. In an earlier day, the Pension Fund existed for accumulation. Now, when the orchestra has flourished thirty years, it exists, quite as much, for disbursement. The more the need that the two should keep pace.

H. T. P.

GLOBE—FRIDAY, MARCH 10, 1911.

CONSTANTINO TO SING WITH SYMPHONY

Appearance at Pension Fund Concert Sunday a Reciprocation of Courtesies.

FLORENCIO CONSTANTINO,
Who Will Sing at the Symphony Pension Fund Concert Sunday Night.

The appearance of Mr Constantino, the genial Spanish tenor of the opera, as soloist at the Symphony pension fund concert Sunday night at Symphony hall, is a felicitous reciprocation of courtesies between the two principal music interests of the city.

A year ago Mr Constantino graciously and gratuitously proffered his services, as did Mr Russell his consent, but arrangements for the season's concerts had then been made.

Mr Constantino will sing two arias, that in the third act of "The Girl of the Golden West" in which Johnson tells of his love for Minnie, and the exquisite air, "Cielo e mar" from the second act of "La Gioconda," in which Mr Constantino, as Enzo, has many times addressed his golden notes to the moon-kissed waves upon which rides his frigate Hecate.

There will also be the interesting prospect of hearing Mr Fiedler turn the Symphony orchestra for the moment into an opera band in these excerpts for the theatre from Puccini and Ponchielli.

The purely orchestral numbers, to be of a popular character, are as follows: Liszt's "Les Preludes," Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite and the overtures to "Merry Wives of Windsor" and "Tannhauser."

GLOBE—SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Overture by Sinigaglia For the First Time.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Brilliantly Played.

The program of the 18th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Brahm's first symphony; Tschaikowsky, "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia; Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl"; Sinigaglia, overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzette."

This overture was played for the first time in Boston. It was composed for the comedy "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte," written by Goldoni in 1760. Chiozza is the name of a small village near Venice inhabited by fisher folk. One summer Sinigaglia was engaged as clerk to a magistrate who held court in this village and thus was able to observe at close range the squabbles and volubility of these fishermen and their wives. There is a pair of lovers whose soft addresses make graceful phrases for oboe and violins, and a breathing space for the villagers.

The piece bristles with chatter and provincial vivacity. It goes with much the same zest and lightness as Smetana's overture, "The Bartered Bride." The contrasting theme has the characteristic Italian suaveness of outline. The overture was brilliantly played.

Brahms was at work on his first symphony for 10 years, and was 43 years old when it was first performed. One might reasonably suppose a composer's first symphony to be a work of youth, of a few feverish years or months of ardent and spontaneous imagination.

On the contrary, this is sedate, restrained, deeply serious and introspective. It is as though the composer had altered and remodeled, and had been slow to permit his judgment to accept what may have been the utterance of his fancy. The first movement was much changed before attaining its present form.

The symphony has been called dry and tedious. Nevertheless, when played at Cambridge, with Joachiin conducting, in 1877, as Brahms' thesis for a doctor's degree, it is said to have been vociferously acclaimed by the English, and their delight in music, both serious and profound, is well known.

Romantic ardor is to be missed in the slow movement and spontaneity and lightness of touch in that substituted for the scherzo, but the last movement is laid out on a broad scale. It ascends to a climax of orchestral passion. There is within it a depth of emotional thought. While the hearer may miss the facile turn of invention and the sudden surprises of fancy which pique attention and interest, there is a sane and sound reasonableness, a lucidity in musical thinking and in orchestral expression, that makes for wholesome musicianship.

The last movement was played with understanding and with splendid power.

Mr Fiedler was recalled and shared the applause with the men.

It was with his "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia that Tschaikowsky at once attained the first rank as a tone poet. In characterization and in the beauty of its love music it surpasses "The Tempest," which succeeded it, although it scarcely equals the "Francesca da Rimini," the next of the group, which has been considered his finest piece of program music.

The best music, inspired by Shakspere's "Romeo and Juliet" cannot be said to have been written for the stage. Tschaikowsky has avoided the pitfall of making his work an intermittent love duet. Individual profile is given the characters. Friar Laurence is recognized as an active force in the drama and the grave-voiced woodwind speak of him in the opening measures.

Balakireff was the godfather of the work and Tschaikowsky may have owed to a suggestion from him the exceedingly graphic disintegration of rhythmical accents by which he suggests the sword thrusts of the feud-embittered Montagues and Capulets. This portion was played yesterday with superb fire and abandon.

In the sensuous beauty of the lovers' music, Tschaikowsky is for the moment himself imbued with Italian grace, passion and longing, and has added the note of foreboding melancholy.

In many weeks there has not been more delightful orchestral playing or more sympathetic conducting than was yesterday displayed in the Siegfried Idyl. If pure loveliness is immortal, then this exquisite tribute to the sublimated beauty of motherhood must remain imperishable.

Next week the program will be as follows: Strauss, "Macbeth" (first time in Boston); Faure, suite, "Pelleas and Melisande"; Goldmark, "Sakuntala"; overture, Beethoven, fifth symphony.

[181]

SYMPHONY CONCERT IS ALL ORCHESTRAL

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Yesterday afternoon's programme at the Symphony was entirely an orchestral one, and one of the finest of the season. Mr. Fiedler's conducting of the Brahms Symphony No. 1, in C minor, was a masterly piece of work—and, by the way, he conducted without the score—every instrument in the orchestra being at his lightest command. It was a bit of inspirational work on the part of conductor and orchestra, and it reached its audience with remarkable force. Mr. Fiedler and the entire orchestra were enthusiastically applauded till they bowed in acknowledgment.

The opening chords of the allegro movement form a wonderful ensemble, all the throbbing, pulsating life of the great symphony being compressed in them—they unite in sounding the keynote of all that is to follow. There are, too, wonderful moments of ensemble throughout the symphony, moments when it seems as if the composer had for an instant touched and felt every note of human existence, and just for this instant felt them all harmonized in one great chord. The instrumental values of these ensembles yesterday were of remarkable fineness, like so many tiny strands of silk twisted in a close-woven cordon. The first movement is full of struggle, at times each tiny cord seeming to pull in a separate direction, but never being quite rent. The melody running through it is querying, questioning, the soul's cry of "Why?" The second, the andante sostenuto, is a conscious sigh, only half suppressed; it contains some of the finest moments of a human soul. Following this, in the place of a "jumpy" scherzo, is a movement of exquisite grace, with a sad and pretty pastoral wreathed in it. The closing finale is the greatest triumph of joy that the human mind can conceive of, not the joy that leaps and bounds, but the joy that throbs in every nerve and lives forever. Here again are some remarkable ensembles. The movement opens with a minor adagio, which gradually melts and dissolves into an episode of the strings that is of tremulous beauty. As the movement progresses the melody deepens and enriches; to follow it is like following the pearl diver into the sea. Veiled and clouded harmonies are embedded in it, like the pearls in the bed of the sea.

The Tschaikowsky "Romeo and Juliet" overture following the symphony is a romance of pathos and beauty, the strife of rival houses, the love youth, with the hand of Fate hanging over it like a dark shadow. The pathos and melancholy of Tschaikowsky is unlike that of any other composer; it is never morbid, hopeless, even in its darkest moments, for it is enlightened by a glow of the spirit which penetrates its darkest recesses. The "Romeo and Juliet" overture contains in vague suggestion all the passions of the drama itself, commingling them in a wonderfully dramatic and compact piece of work.

The Wagner "Siegfried Idyl," coming immediately after, was less poignant, for it is conceived in the calmer moments of the great composer. It contains reminiscent themes of the music-drama "Siegfried," painted with the "idyl" touch. Only in pastels do we see the great moments of stress and passion of the opera; they tell their story in quite another way. Its delicacy was exquisitely handled by the orchestra; they reproduced it in the tones in which it was painted.

The closing Sinigaglia comedy overture to "Le Baruffe Chizzotte" made a sharply contrasting close.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The long-promised performance of Richard Strauss' earliest tone poem, "Macbeth," has been set by Mr. Fiedler for the 19th programme of the Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is the only important work of Strauss that has not yet been heard here, and so far as known it has had but one performance in this country, by the Chicago orchestra on Oct. 26, 1901. It was written in 1887, between the symphonic fantasia "Aus Italien" and the "Don Juan." Another interesting work on the programme will be Faure's suite "Pelleas and Melisande," incidental music written by Faure a number of years ago to go with Maeterlinck's play. The other number will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," and Beethoven symphony in C minor, No. 5. There will be no soloist.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of this season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening. The committee of the pension fund institution were fortunate enough to secure the services of Mr. Constantino, the principal tenor of the Boston Opera Company, as soloist. He is to sing two numbers, the tenor aria from the last act of Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West" and the "Cello e Mare" from Ponchinelli's "La Gioconda." The orchestra will also be assisted by the male chorus of the Cecilia in the Johann Strauss waltz, "The Beautiful Danube," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," the Tannhauser overture, the "Nut Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky and Nicolai's popular overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor." are the orchestral numbers placed on the programme by Mr. Fiedler.

GREAT PERFORMANCE OF BRAHMS' C MINOR

(From L. C. Elson's Review in The Advertiser.)

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. First Symphony, C minor.
Tschaikowsky. "Romeo and Juliet" overture.
Wagner. "Siegfried Idyll."
Sinigaglia. Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte."

The concert of yesterday afternoon was of exceptionally enjoyable character. It was modern without being erratic; rich in romance without shattering every trace of musical form; full of varied orchestral coloring without straining after experimental combinations.

There was a time, and not so very long ago, when Brahms's first symphony was held to be too complicated for the auditor to comprehend, but that is all changed now, and concert-goers look down from the tangled heights of Strauss, Reger, Mahler, Elgar, D'Indy, etc., and wonder how they ever could have thought this shapely work incomprehensible.

Yet we think that Brahms first came properly into his own in Boston when Dr. Muck woke us all up with a memorable interpretation of this work, a few years ago. The performance on this occasion reached the same remarkable height. Mr. Fiedler has a habit of playing such works analytically; that is he brings every little sub-theme clearly to notice so that, in the words of the saintly bore in the "Pipe of Desire"—"Nothing is wasted!"

There were some liberties taken with the tempo, but these were to the advantage of the interpretation. The glory of this symphony is its finale, which is as great as any symphonic finale of Beethoven. The first movement is great music, but the finale is sublime. How the glorious folk-song was sung in this! There was virility and power in every note. Mr. Fiedler conducted the work without score, from memory. At the close of the splendid performance the greatest enthusiasm burst forth and continued loud and long until the orchestra had risen and the conductor bowed again and again.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening. The admirable purpose served by these concerts and the attractiveness of the concerts themselves always insure a large audience and tomorrow evening will be no exception to the rule. For the first time in a number of years the Symphony Orchestra will give a popular programme.

The committee of the Pension Fund Institution were fortunate enough to enlist the services of Mr. Constantino, the principal tenor of the Boston Opera Co., as soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A soloist brings an air of formality to a symphony concert. An expensive soprano makes the right effect only when the program is so designed as to put her arias and songs in the high light. A distinguished pianist makes an impression, provided the symphony which precedes his concerto makes a striking contrast with it. The appearance of a cosmopolitan artist has to be regarded as an occasion to which the program must conform; therefore the pieces chosen in a Farrar or a Busoni week do not always express the real orchestral feeling of the conductor.

Programs with soloist must be planned to start off with music that will create in the audience the habit of applause; then solo brilliancies, when their turn comes, will be twice brilliant. But let us have once in a while a selection of pieces that excludes the modern startling effects, a selection that leaves the orchestra with some reserve force of expression. Let us have a little study in color scoring; let us go back to the composers who developed the instrumental tone combinations to the highest results of beauty ever attained; let us hear Brahms, Tschaikowsky and Wagner, and try to bring a little conservatism into our standards of orchestral judgment.

Mr. Fiedler put himself completely in the feeling of the Brahms first symphony, the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasia and the "Siegfried Idyl" at the Friday rehearsal. Perhaps he found the large tone volume which he has developed in the string section of the orchestra a little against him in some of the more subtly colored passages of the three works, but he found the Symphony men on the whole a pliant instrument. Brahms, symphony No. 1 in C minor, op. 68; Tschaikowsky, overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; Wagner, "A Siegfried Idyl"; Sinigaglia, overture, "La Baruffe Chiozzotte" ("The Squabbles of the People of Chiozza"), op. 32. First time in Boston).

GREAT PERFORMANCE OF BRAHMS' SYMPHONY

COMPOSER'S C MINOR PLAYED ANALYTICALLY

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" Overture and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" Also on the Programme.

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Brahms. First Symphony, C minor.
Tschaikowsky. "Romeo and Juliet" overture.
Wagner. "Siegfried Idyll."
Sinigaglia. Overture, "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte."

Although this opinion is not shared by the general public, the present reviewer is always glad when our magnificent orchestra is heard without the assistance of any soloist. But the line of waiting ones on Huntington ave. shrinks perceptibly when this is the case.

The concert of yesterday afternoon was of exceptionally enjoyable character. It was modern without being erratic; rich in romance without shattering every trace of musical form; full of varied orchestral coloring without straining after experimental combinations.

There was a time, and not so very long ago, when Brahms's first symphony was held to be too complicated for the auditor to comprehend, but that is all changed now, and concert-goers look down from the tangled heights of Strauss, Reger, Mahler, Elgar, D'Indy, etc., and wonder how they ever could have thought this shapely work incomprehensible.

Yet we think that Brahms first came properly into his own in Boston when Dr. Muck woke us all up with a memorable interpretation of this work, a few years ago. The performance on this occasion reached the same remarkable height. Mr. Fiedler has a habit of playing such works analytically; that is he brings every little sub-theme clearly to notice so that, in the words of the saintly bore in the "Pipe of Desire"—"Nothing is wasted!"

There were some liberties taken with the tempo, but these were to the advantage of the interpretation. The glory of this symphony is its finale, which is as great as any symphonic finale of Beethoven. The first movement is great music, but the finale is sublime. How the glorious folk-song was sung in this! There was virility and power in every note. Mr. Fiedler conducted the work without score, from memory. At the close of the splendid performance the greatest enthusiasm burst forth and continued loud and long until the orchestra had risen and the conductor bowed again and again.

Tschaikowsky's "Romeo and Juliet" overture is held by some of his admirers to be his best orchestral work. Without going as far as this, we can certainly recognize it as one of the best outcomes of this much-set theme. "All the world loves a lover," and here there were two of them ready to the hand of the composer. Therefore they have been translated into music all the way from Gounod's treacle to the French parody of "Rhum-et-Eau en Juillet." Tschaikowsky has been very responsive to the fighting side of this subject. There are "alarums and excursions" in many of the measures of the work, and Mercutio and the fiery Tybalt, and the feuds of the Montagues and Capulets are emphatically portrayed.

Nevertheless one can easily identify Romeo, and his love-theme combines the two most melancholy instruments of the orchestra—the viola and the English horn. The battles of the two factions were made the most of by Mr. Fiedler and it was the Kettle-drum's busy day. The great Brahms work dwarfed the romantic overture somewhat, but it was applauded to the point of recalling the conductor nevertheless.

The "Siegfried Idyll" is Wagner's "Sinfonia Domestica." He did not, to be sure, parade his household before all the world. He did not use all the forces of the modern orchestra to illustrate the nursing-bottle and the wails of the baby. He wrote a simple score and a tender development of themes, a sweet suggestion of Peace and Tranquility, with a heart-felt poem, and gave the whole, with its initial performance, as a birthday surprise to his wife. It was long before he would consent to allow the world to share in the enjoyment of this work, before he allowed its publication. Which shows that even in commercial enterprise the moderns have advanced beyond Wagner, who was once thought an adept in getting the utmost possible for his wares.

The delicacy of the work seemed rather fragile after the combats of Shakespeare and Tschaikowsky, for the "Siegfried Idyll" is as quiet as Romeo and Juliet were turbulent, and there were a few blurs in the pianissimo effects. None-theless another recall was given by the unusually responsive and ebullient audience.

Sinigaglia is among the "still living" of the musical biographies. He is one of the few good instrumental composers of Italy. In this overture he pictures (a la Goldoni) the squabbles of the fisher-folk of Chiozza, a village not far from Venice. The overture is for an orchestra of average dimensions, but with the "battery" well represented. There is naturally much bustle and activity in the development of the work, and the themes themselves are characteristic.

In Chiozza the fishermen speak, or rather gargle, a strange dialect, chiefly in their throat, and they are somewhat bacchanalian in habits and generally sociable and convivial. Something of the last-named quality is found in Sinigaglia's overture, which has been performed in all the leading capitals of Europe. It is a magnified light opera overture, but made of better material than one finds in this school. It is full of swingy rhythms, and as chattering as Mozart's "Magic Flute Overture." In fact it seemed to us the work of a Mozart who had become modernized. It leaned somewhat to the folk-style, was well-scored, and made a genial ending to the most successful purely orchestral concert that we have heard for a long time.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The first of the season's concerts in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall tomorrow evening. The admirable purpose served by these concerts and the attractiveness of the concerts themselves always insure a large audience and tomorrow evening will be no exception to the rule. For the first time in a number of years the Symphony Orchestra will give a popular programme.

The committee of the Pension Fund Institution were fortunate enough to enlist the services of Mr. Constantino, the principal tenor of the Boston Opera Co., as soloist.

SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

Brahms' C Minor Work Given Masterly Performance — Fiedler Repeatedly Recalled

By Olin Downes

Brahms' C minor symphony, one of the great epics of modern music, headed the programme of the 18th public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Mr. Fiedler gave what was upon the whole a superb reading of the impressive work. Enthusiasm ran high, and he was repeatedly recalled after the performance.

The C minor symphony holds its place as a modern classic of extraordinary virility of workmanship, and loftiness of thought. The music has a severe grandeur, even sternness of expression, which is peculiarly grateful as an antidote to the highly-colored music so generally prevalent. The symphony towers like a high mountain peak above more luscious valleys. A great man looks into himself, looks back on life, and reflects aloud. The striving harmonies of the introduction, above the pounding drums, are as a battle of Titans, but the issue is within and aloof from the consciousness of the crowd. This introduction tinctures the entire work. It is heard as a question in the lofty, slow movement and finally the artist, like Hamlet, asks of eternity the question become too banal to quote: the orchestra rises again in agitation, and then as a wonderful C major chord shimmers out, a horn calls straight from heaven.

Mr. Fiedler interpreted a work which must be among those nearest his heart with extraordinary enthusiasm and conviction. He strengthened the original instrumentation in a number of places, as, for instance, the triplet figures, scored for wood-wind only, which were re-enforced by horns in the finale. He prepared and built up his climaxes magnificently, and he gave the utmost coherence to each movement—except, perhaps, the finale, which is in itself somewhat episodic. This movement was played without gloves, and the fact that the brass was decidedly brassy, that the bows dug into the strings with a bite, and so on, did little harm. It is said that when Brahms conducted this movement he could never get sufficient tone from his orchestra. But the rhythmic stride of this finale, in spite of retards and accelerations, should not be too broken. Yesterday the pace was too fast at the last. The responses of the horns to the strings, in triplets, before the concluding measures, could hardly be distinguished at all, and it is indeed a credit to the virtuosity of the orchestra that so few notes were dropped by the men. The performance as a whole was one of the most stirring of the season and the ensuing applause was well deserved.

The contrast of this heroic music, with the rich sensuousness of Tschaikowsky's overture, "Romeo and Juliet," was well considered. This overture is not a perfect whole. The music describing the strife of the two houses is bombast, but the introduction and the yearning passion of the long cantalina of middle section so wonderfully instrumentated, the final apotheosis of this melody, and the tragic conclusion, are among the finest pages in all Tschaikowsky. Few composers, indeed, have shown themselves adequate to such a subject.

An overture to Goldoni's comedy, "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte," was played for the first time at a Symphony concert. The overture is lively and humorous. Simgaghia does not seek to write in a dignified manner. His music sparkles with Italian good spirits. The instrumentation is simple, but effective, even witty. The music gave pleasure.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

ORCHESTRA HAS AN AFTERNOON TO ITSELF

The Pleasures of Familiar Music and of a Concert Without a Soloist—The Italian Contrasts of Sinigaglia's Light Overture and of Tschaikowsky's Impassioned "Romeo and Juliet"—The Russian's and the Italian's Italy—The Wagner of "A Siegfried Idyl" Beside the Brahms of the First Symphony—The Illuminating Fiedler and the Coloring Players

MR. FIEDLER and the Symphony Orchestra had an unusually applausive audience at the concert of yesterday afternoon. At the end of Brahms's symphony in C minor, which led the programme, it recalled the conductor twice and finally brought the band to its feet. The house warmed to Tschaikowsky's glowing fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," and heard Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" as gladly. Then, seemingly, though the concert was shorter than Mr. Fiedler sometimes makes them, its attention and appreciation were exhausted. Departures were unusually numerous before the "brilliant overture" with which the conductor likes to "round off" his programmes, and Sinigaglia's piece had hardly the applause that it deserved. The audience knows what to expect when the overture to "Tannhäuser" or to "Oberon" or to "Egmont" finishes the concert, and stays accordingly. With an unknown piece, it is less resolved. Besides, the title of Sinigaglia's overture is forbidding. The imagination does not exactly warm to a prelude to "The Squabbles of the People of Chiozza," though it was Goldoni who named his comedy and Sinigaglia had no choice when he would write an overture to it. The conductor and the orchestra thus had the concert to themselves, and no one, unless it were some of the inveterate curiosity-seekers of the second balcony, seemed to miss a "soloist," a species that has been unusually plentiful this year. Except Sinigaglia's overture, moreover, all the music was familiar and plainly grateful to those that heard. Once more, too, there were signs of the new appreciation of Brahms that Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler have gradually developed. Time was when the audiences of the Symphony Concerts applauded his music because it was safe and dutiful so to do. Now, under the emotional vitality that the two conductors have restored to Brahms's symphonies, the listeners applaud because the music really moves them. At last, here in Boston, Brahms is escaping from his injudicious and pedantic friends.

Sinigaglia is one of the rare Italians who deliberately shuns the opera house and cultivates the music of the concert-room, and in the overture to Goldoni's comedy, he has written Italian music to an Italian play. Tschaikowsky, like Hugo Wolf and Rimsky-Korsakoff, was one of the composers of a more northern race whose imagination often turned southward. Hugo Wolf, they say, had never set foot in Spain, and his Spanish songs and his Spanish opera, "Der Corregidor," were feats of unmixed imagination. Tschaikowsky, however, knew his Italy at first hand. He paid long visits to it; he delighted in Italian air and light, in the life around him as it was, in the variegated past that all else recalled. For him there were passion and glow in it all. He set himself to the writing of an orchestral fantasia that might serve as an overture to Shakspeare's tragedy, "Romeo and Juliet." According to the title and the records, it was born of the poet's play. Quite as much, and more intimately, it sprang out of his Italian imaginings and, maybe, his Italian memories. Sinigaglia knows his Italy at first hand, takes it for granted as most of us do our own dwelling places. Tschaikowsky, in spite of his visits, imagined his Italy, and perhaps the two points of view play in the music of the two composers that the programme set side by side.

Goldoni's comedy is a gay little piece. The "Chiozzotte" of the title are the fisherfolk of a Venetian village. They sit in the sunshine and chatter, and there are amorous interchanges. A cloud, as it were, obscures the sun, and there are voluble quarrels and amorous bickerings. The cloud passes, with a pacifying magistrate for the sun-god, and there are feasting, dancing and kisses. Sinigaglia's music catches the general course, the pervading mood of the comedy. It runs simply and none too formally. The melodic ideas come and go, and no one thinks twice about them. They make orchestral chatter even as the "Chiozzotte" chattered; the instrumental choirs gossip; gossip instrument for instrument their more intimate interchanges; it is possible to hear the wooing lovers. The squabble begins; and the orchestral voices are very voluble, very high pitched; the melody of the lovers is enmingled in the general bickering; the merry chatter returns and the overture is done. The music is light and bright; playfully invented, neatly colored; it has gayety and humor; Italian accent is in it—the accent of babbling life in the sunshine, taking the day, the hour for itself, and thinking it none the worse if a momentary quarrel give tang to it. Galdoni's "Chiozzotte" of 1760 are also Sinigaglia's Italians of 1908. Tschaikowsky's Italy is the Italy of romantic imagination—the land of glowing passion in its due environment. Hear the melody of the lovers as it rises against the dying din of the brawl, the melody that Tschaikowsky once destined for a duet in which their voices, with the instruments, should sing their passion. It is languorous with the star-lit softness of Italian nights; it is still with their deep stillness; there is less ecstasy than longing in it. The music is less of the fires of Shakspeare's lovers than of the composer's visions of [illegible] and the passion that they [illegible]'s music k[illegible] with the music [illegible] moonlights. Stripped of [illegible] glamours what are these troops of Montagues and Capulets but what the magistrates nowadays—and doubtless in a mediæval Verona too—would call common ralliers and brawlers, gang against gang. Tschaikowsky in his music summons another glamour. He hears them as the disturbing voices of his Italian nights, as the echoes, so to say, of the figures that he has seen in pictures of the Italian renaissance; he sees them still phantom-like coursing the high wall of some alley to fling themselves into the brawl upon the piazza. Again, when he would write his musical epilogue of a tragedy ended, because fate will not pity, his is an elegiac mood, the mood of one who sits under a crumbling column, in the still afternoon light, who looks across the hills with their olive trees, who hears a faint piping that is all of the life that once peopled it. He is melancholy at fate that spares not. Now Shakspeare's Romeo is frenzied Elizabethan wise; Tschaikowsky's is only mournful: "After 'Romeo and Juliet'" goes Tschaikowsky's title to his fantasia; "after the Italy of my visions" would be the truer designation. Sinigaglia's Italian accent is of prose and chatter; Tschaikowsky's of poetry and passion.

Perhaps Mr. Fiedler was making a programme of interesting juxtapositions, for the other two items of it set Wagner and Brahms side by side. Only the Wagner was the Wagner of "A Siegfried Idyl," which, after all, is only a pleasurable trifle, and the Brahms was the Brahms of his first symphony, which, as every one knows, and somewhat to weariness, is a very serious "work." In both the orchestra and the conductor shone. Mr. Fiedler is not remarkable for reticence; but for once he recalled that "A Siegfried Idyl" was not in intent or execution a concert or an operatic piece. An orchestra in a concert-hall may not play it as Richter's little band played it on the stairs of Cosima's villa for the Christmas morning that was also her birthday; but it can, and yesterday it did, keep the due proportion, make the music as intimate, as whispering almost as Wagner designed it. The idyl runs in gentle little melodic curves that seem always ruffling into trills; it seldom speaks in more than half voice; it is all softness of accent. Wagner remembers happily and does not re-state forcibly its fragments of his music-dramas. He would merely suggest them to the mother and of the son whom he likes to fancy has quickened him with them and given them new meaning. It was this intimate, this musing voice, this lightness of detail, this softness of accent that Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra [illegible]d in their performance. They kept [illegible]o all soft glow, and yet never [illegible] pulpy, as the way, too often, of Ger[illegible] sentimentality is. For "A Siegfried [illegible]yl" is a very sentimental piece—else it would not be so long. If Wagner had [illegible] chosen to lead the little orchestra that first played it he would surely have listened holding Cosima's hand.

Mr. Fiedler's conducting of Brahms's music is illuminating and vitalizing. Of course, he was expository. He would have us know, for example, beyond any mistaking that the chief theme of Brahms's finale has its resemblance to the chief theme of Beethoven's finale in the Choral Symphony. He was resolute that we should not miss the briefly mysterious passage for oboe and violin that insinuates itself into the slow movement only to die out of it again. He was sedulous of expository emphasis, and of so revealing an accent that sometimes he sharpened his string tone over much. But Mr. Fiedler, as he has proved with Schumann, is sensitive and skilful to "open up" seemingly thick instrumentation, to give it clear voice, luminosity even, and eloquence too. Brahms's writing for orchestra is oftener closely and thoughtfully knit than it is thick, but his music gains by the freer spacing, the warmer colors that Mr. Fiedler seeks to give it. There is gain also in the rhythmic life of the music upon which Mr. Fiedler laid such stress. He was eager to keep it moving, curving. He made the little intermezzo before the finale almost rippling. The pedants—Brahms himself was not one—would surely have shaken doubting heads over some of his modulations of pace, his crescendos and diminuendos, his persistent quest for changeful force of tone and suppleness of movement. But Brahms, their Brahms, so played is no longer crabbed. Like Dr. Muck before him, Mr. Fiedler gives emotional sweep and largeness to the finale, finds a reticent and contemplative passion, but a passion no less in the second movement. In spite of the extremists on both sides, Brahms felt as well as thought, when a discerning conductor and a responsive band release him. He may lack tonal color; but if he does, the orchestra yesterday gave it to him—the strings, the horns, the clarinets, the trombones. There was brightness as well as shadow in the instrumental voices, glow as well as depth. The strings accented, the clarinets warmed, the horns were of manifold beauty. There was reason to suspect that Brahms, the unsensitive, theoretically, to instrumentation, really awaited an orchestra of imaginative virtuosi.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Strauss's "Macbeth" for the First Time at the Symphony Concerts—Light Music for the Pension Fund — Mr. Clement's Recital of French Songs—The Witeks in a Chamber Concert with a Curious Piece —Mr. Townsend and His Song-Cycle

WITH Strauss's tone-poem, "Macbeth," to be played for the first time here at the Symphony Concerts, and with Mr. Clément, the eminent tenor, in a recital of his own, the new week has its interesting promise. Again the Symphony Orchestra will be unassisted and again, outside "Macbeth," Mr. Fiedler has made a programme of comparatively familiar pieces. Mr. Clément will sing through a diversified list of French songs, interspersed with three by American composers. The Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] has a concert for the increase [illegible] Pension Fund with the assistance of [illegible] Constantino, the tenor of the Boston [illegible] House; Mr. and Mrs. Witek announce a concert of chamber music for violin and pianoforte; and Mr. Townsend, the baritone, for his annual concert, will sing Schubert's song-cycle Die Schöne Müllerin.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

MACBETH is the overlooked and neglected tone-poem of Strauss. Nowadays—or indeed at any other time—it is rarely performed anywhere, and in all probability it has not been heard in America since the Chicago Orchestra played it in Theodore Thomas's time. Yet Strauss, by report, cherishes it and Mr. Fiedler thinks so well of it that for two seasons he has purposed to make it known here. Accordingly he has made it the first number on his programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Written in 1887 "Macbeth" is chronologically the first of Strauss's tone-poems; but he did not publish it until three years later he had revised the music. Mr. Newman, in his monograph on Strauss, praises the piece. "'Macbeth,'" he says, "is all psychology and no action. . . . Strauss makes no attempt whatever to cover the whole ground of Shakspeare's drama; no other character is introduced but Lady Macbeth, and she is really kept in the background of the picture while absolutely nothing happens, not even the murder of the king. The whole drama is enacted in the soul of Macbeth; apart from the comparatively few bars that depict his wife, the score is entirely concerned with the internal conflict of the three main elements of his character—his ambitious pride, his irresolution, and his love for Lady Macbeth. There is nothing here that is not pure 'stuff for music,' as Wagner would have said. The musical texture of the work is extraordinarily strong and well-wrought; already the young man of twenty-two makes Liszt seem like an amateur in comparison. For the first time in the history of the symphonic poem, in fact, a musical brain of the best kind, endlessly fertile in ideas and with a masterly technique, is cultivating the form. The score, youthful as it is, already shows the rich polyphonic structure that is characteristic of Strauss, and beside which the homophonic, lyrical style of Liszt seems decidedly thin." The remaining items of the programme are the Suite that Fauré arranged from his incidental music to Maeterlincke's "Pelléas and Mélisande," unduly neglected nowadays beside Debussy's opera Goldmark's glowing Oriental overture, "Sakuntala"; and Beethoven's fifth Symphony which better suits Mr. Fiedler's love of orchestral eloquence than some of the rest.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Pension-Fund Concert

THE Symphony Orchestra has deferred unusually long, this year, its two annual concerts for the profit of its Pension Fund, and the first is set for Sunday evening, at eight, in Symphony Hall. Of the just and beneficent purpose to which the fund ministers, of the support from the audiences of the regular concerts and from the miscellaneous public that it deserves, much has been said many times in this place. Yet less the purpose than the anticipated pleasure of concerts assembles audiences for them, and accordingly Mr. Fiedler and the committee in charge of the fund have made a programme of light or well-liked music; the suite of dances from Tschaikowsky's ballet of "The Nutcracker"; Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser," Nicolai's to his operatic comedy, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Préludes," and Johann Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz in its original form as a piece for men's choir and orchestra. The Cecilia will provide the chorus, and at the invitation of the committee, Mr. Constantino, the tenor of the Boston Opera House, will assist. His pieces are Johnson's monologue from the third act of Puccini's "La Fanciulla del West" and Enzo's invocation of sky and sea in the second act of Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

BOSTON HERALD
MARCH 13, 1911.

CAMPAIGN FOR CURRENCY BILL

Monetary Commission Seeking to Create Sentiment for New Measure.

TO VISIT LARGER CITIES

WASHINGTON, March 12—Plans for the reform of the currency laws will be prosecuted with vigor by the means of the national monetary commission during the summer and fall. A campaign of education will be started within a few weeks to create sentiment for a bill which probably will be introduced in Congress next December.

Thus far the work of the commission has not been regarded as political, and care is to be taken to avoid the introduction of partisan views in the campaign for the bill. A majority of the members who have been working on the proposed legislation are not new members of Congress, and most of them are regarded as out of politics. This is particularly true of the chairman, ex-Senator Aldrich of Rhode Island, who expects to devote a great deal of time to the work during the year.

Beginning with the hearings of the

MARCH 11, 1911

SYMPHONY PROGRAM MOST ATTRACTIVE

Work of Orchestra Arouses Audience to High Pitch of Enthusiasm.

At the close of the performance of Brahms's first symphony yesterday afternoon the Symphony Orchestra was applauded until, after bowing several times all by himself, Mr. Fiedler called to the players to stand up. The final movement of the symphony brought out an exhibition of orchestral virtuosity that raised the large matinee audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

The program this week is one of the most attractive of the season and it is entirely for orchestra. The Brahms symphony is offered for the first time since Conductor Fiedler made his initial bow in October, 1908; and yesterday, as at the concerts of two seasons ago, it was read without a score. This is a feat which Mr. Fiedler seldom performs, but it is evident that few works have taken hold of him so powerfully as this vigorous and remarkably melodious symphony. The result is a performance at once respectful and affectionate, brilliant and beautiful—rivaling the recent interpretations of the "Tannhaeuser" overture and Strauss's colossal fantasia, "Don Quixote."

But equally polished and sympathetic was the performance of Tschaikowsky's superb overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," which has not been on a symphony program for nearly four years. Nor were the multiform beauties of "A Siegfried Idyl," the more familiar Wagner piece, slighted; nor was the true comic spirit of Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte," played here for the first time. This vivacious work was introduced to the public several years ago by Toscanini.

The third quarter of the symphony season thus ends with even more than the usual brilliancy.

SUNDAY GLOBE
—MARCH 12, 1911.

Tone Poem by Strauss
the Symphony Novelty.

Richard Strauss' "Macbeth," which Mr Fiedler has long promised to perform here in Boston, will be the novelty at the Symphony concerts this week. This is the only Strauss tone poem which has yet to be heard in Boston, and curiously enough so far as there is any record it has been played but twice in the United States, Oct 26, 1901, by the Chicago orchestra under Theodore Thomas, and in October, 1906, under Mr Stock.

There is but little explanation or guide to an analysis furnished by Strauss himself save the title, and the acknowledgment — after Shakspere's drama. There are but two references in the score to the theme.

Over an imperious phrase for violins, horn and wood-wind near the beginning, the word "Macbeth" occurs, and above a passage on page 12 there is a phrase marked appassionata, molto rubato and a quotation in German from Lady Macbeth's speech in act 1, scene 5, beginning "Hie thee hither, that I may pour my spirits in thine ear."

The tone poem was written in 1887, a year later than "Don Juan," although its opus number is 23, and that of the sketch of the amorous knight is 20.

Another interesting number on the program will be Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas and Melisande," incidental music written by him for Maeterlinck's play of the same name and preceding by some years Debussy's opera. The suite has been played twice by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr Gericke in 1904 and under Mr d'Indy the following year. It was played recently at a private concert of French music at the Boston opera house, directed by Mr Caplet. The other numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," and Beethoven's symphony in C minor.

Symphony Pension Fund
Concert This Evening.

A concert of popular music played by the entire Symphony orchestra under its own conductor is something decidedly out of the ordinary and the program which has been arranged for the first concert in aid of the Pension fund of the orchestra, which is to be given in Symphony hall tonight, should have a wide appeal, not only to the regular patrons and friends of the orchestra but to the public in general.

The committee was fortunate enough to enlist the services of Mr Constantino, principal tenor of the Boston opera company, as soloist. Mr Constantino is down for two numbers; the tenor aria from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West" and the familiar "Cielo e Mare" from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

The orchestra will also have the assistance of the male chorus of the Cecilia society and with these gentlemen will give Johann Strauss' waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube." The fact that this classic waltz was written originally for male chorus and orchestra is not generally known. Several years ago it was sung here by the Apollo club with much success.

The program will begin with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Then will come the Puccini aria, which will be followed by the "Tannhauser" overture. The first number of the second part will be the ever-popular "Nut-Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky. The suite will be followed by the Ponchielli aria, after which will come Nicolai's popular overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and finally Strauss' waltz.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

THE ORCHESTRA HAS AN AFTERNOON TO ITSELF

The Pleasures of Familiar Music and of a Concert Without a Soloist—The Italian Contrasts of Sinigaglia's Light Overture and of Tschaikowsky's Impassioned "Romeo and Juliet"—The Russian's and the Italian's Italy—The Wagner of "A Siegfried Idyl" Beside the Brahms of the First Symphony—The Illuminating Fiedler and the Coloring Players

MR. FIEDLER and the Symphony Orchestra had an unusually applausive audience at the concert of yesterday afternoon. At the end of Brahms's symphony in C minor, which led the programme, it recalled the conductor twice and finally brought the band to its feet. The house warmed to Tschaikowsky's glowing fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," and heard Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" as gladly. Then, seemingly, though the concert was shorter than Mr. Fiedler sometimes makes them, its attention and appreciation were exhausted. Departures were unusually numerous before the "brilliant overture" with which the conductor likes to "round off" his programmes, and Sinigaglia's piece had hardly the applaunse that it deserved. The audience knows what to expect when the overture to "Tannhäuser" or to "Oberon" or to "Egmont" finishes the concert, and stays accordingly. With an unknown piece, it is less resolved. Besides, the title of Sinigaglia's overture is forbidding. The imagination does not exactly warm to a prelude to "The Squabbles of the People of Chiozza," though it was Goldoni who named his comedy and Sinigaglia had no choice when he would write an overture to it. The conductor and the orchestra thus had the concert to themselves, and no one, unless it were some of the inveterate curiosity-seekers of the second balcony, seemed to miss a "soloist," a species that has been unusually plentiful this year. Except Sinigaglia's overture, moreover, all the music was familiar and plainly grateful to those that heard. Once more, too, there were signs of the new appreciation of Brahms that Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler have gradually developed. Time was when the audiences of the Symphony Concerts applauded his music because it was safe and dutiful so to do. Now, under the emotional vitality that the two conductors have restored to Brahms's symphonies, the listeners applaud because the music really moves them. At last, here in Boston, Brahms is escaping from his injudicious and pedantic friends.

Sinigaglia is one of the rare Italians who deliberately shuns the opera house and cultivates the music of the concert-room, and in the overture to Goldoni's comedy, he has written Italian music to an Italian play. Tschaikowsky, like Hugo Wolf and Rimsky-Korsakoff, was one of the composers of a more northern race whose imagination often turned southward. Hugo Wolf, they say, had never set foot in Spain, and his Spanish songs and his Spanish opera, "Der Corregidor," were feats of unmixed imagination. Tschaikowsky, however, knew his Italy at first hand. He paid long visits to it; he delighted in Italian air and light, in the life around him as it was, in the variegated past that all else recalled. For him there were passion and glow in it all. He set himself to the writing of an orchestral fantasia that might serve as an overture to Shakspeare's tragedy, "Romeo and Juliet." According to the title and the records, it was born of the poet's play. Quite as much, and more intimately, it sprang out of his Italian imaginings and, maybe, his Italian memories. Sinigaglia knows his Italy at first hand, takes it for granted as most of us do our own dwelling places. Tschaikowsky, in spite of his visits, imagined his Italy, and perhaps the two points of view play in the music of the two composers that the programme set side by side.

Goldoni's comedy is a gay little piece. The "Chiozzotte" of the title are the fisherfolk of a Venetian village. They sit in the sunshine and chatter, and there are amorous interchanges. A cloud, as it were, obscures the sun, and there are voluble quarrels and amorous bickerings. The cloud passes, with a pacifying magistrate for the sun-god, and there are feasting, dancing and kisses. Sinigaglia's music catches the general course, the pervading mood of the comedy. It runs simply and none too formally. The melodic ideas come and go, and no one thinks twice about them. They make orchestral chatter even as the "Chiozzotte" chattered; the instrumental choirs gossip; gossip instrument for instrument their more intimate interchanges; it is possible to hear the wooing lovers. The squabble begins; and the orchestral voices are very voluble, very high pitched; the melody of the lovers is entangled in the general bickering; the merry chatter returns, and the overture is done. The music is light and bright; playfully invented, neatly colored; it has gayety and humor; Italian accent is in it—the accent of gabbling life in the sunshine, taking the day, the hour for itself, and thinking it none the worse if a momentary quarrel give tang to it. Galdoni's "Chiozzotte" of 1760 are also Sinigaglia's Italians of 1908.

Tschaikowsky's Italy is the Italy of romantic imagination—the land of glowing passion in its due environment. Hear the melody of the lovers as it rises against the dying din of the brawl, the melody that Tschaikowsky once destined for a duet in which their voices, with the instruments, should sing their passion. It is languorous with the star-lit softness of Italian nights; it is still with their deep stillness; there is less ecstasy than longing in it. The music is less of the fires of Shakspeare's lovers than of the composer's visions of Italian nights and the passion that they [illegible] music keeps [illegible] with the music of the warring households. Stripped of Shakspearean glamours what are these troops of Montagues and Capulets but what the magistrates nowadays—and doubtless in a mediæval Verona too—would call common rallers and brawlers, gang against gang. Tschaikowsky in his music summons another glamour. He hears them as the disturbing voices of his Italian nights, as the echoes, so to say, of the figures that he has seen in pictures of the Italian renaissance; he sees them still phantom-like coursing the high wall of some alley to fling themselves into the brawl upon the piazza. Again, when he would write his musical epilogue of a tragedy ended, because fate will not pity, his is an elegiac mood, the mood of one who sits under a crumbling column, in the still afternoon light, who looks across the hills with their olive trees, who hears a faint piping that is all of the life that once peopled it. He is melancholy at fate that spares not. Now Shakspeare's Romeo is frenzied Elizabethan wise; Tschaikowsky's is only mournful: "After 'Romeo and Juliet'" goes Tschaikowsky's title to his fantasia; "after the Italy of my visions" would be the truer designation. Sinigaglia's Italian accent is of prose and chatter; Tschaikowsky's of poetry and passion.

Perhaps Mr. Fiedler was making a programme of interesting juxtapositions, for the other two items of it set Wagner and Brahms side by side. Only the Wagner was the Wagner of "A Siegfried Idyl," which, after all, is only a pleasurable trifle, and the Brahms was the Brahms of his first symphony, which, as every one knows, and somewhat to weariness, is a very serious "work." In both the orchestra and the conductor shone. Mr. Fiedler is not remarkable for reticence; but for once he recalled that "A Siegfried Idyl" was not in intent or execution, a concert or an operatic piece. An orchestra in a concert-hall may not play it as Richter's little band played it on the stairs of Cosima's villa for the Christmas morning that was also her birthday; but it can, and yesterday it did, keep the due proportion, make the music as intimate, as whispering almost as Wagner designed it. The idyl runs in gentle little melodic curves that seem always ruffling into trills; it seldom speaks in more than half voice; it is all softness of accent. Wagner remembers happily and does not re-state forcibly its fragments of his music-dramas. He would merely suggest them to the mother and of the son whom he likes to fancy has uickened him with them and given them new meaning. It was this intimate, this musing voice, this lightness of detail, this softness of accent that Mr. Fiedler and the orchestra [illegible]d in their performance. They kept [illegible]c all soft glow, and yet never [illegible] pulpy, as the way, too often, of Ger[illegible] sentimentality is. For "A Siegfried [illegible]yl" is a very sentimental piece—else [illegible] would not be so long. If Wagner had [illegible] chosen to lead the little orchestra that first played it he would surely have listened holding Cosima's hand.

Mr. Fiedler's conducting of Brahms's music is illuminating and vitalizing. Of course, he was expository. He would have us know, for example, beyond any mistaking that the chief theme of Brahms's finale has its resemblance to the chief theme of Beethoven's finale in the Choral Symphony. He was resolute that we should not miss the briefly mysterious passage for oboe and violin that insinuates itself into the slow movement only to die out of it again. He was sedulous of expository emphasis, and of so revealing an accent that sometimes he sharpened his string tone over much. But Mr. Fiedler, as he has proved with Schumann, is sensitive and skilful to "open up" seemingly thick instrumentation, to give it clear voice, luminosity even, and eloquence too. Brahms's writing for orchestra is oftener closely and thoughtfully knit than it is thick, but his music gains by the freer spacing, the warmer colors that Mr. Fiedler seeks to give it. There is gain also in the rhythmic life of the music upon which Mr. Fiedler laid such stress. He was eager to keep it moving, curving. He made the little intermezzo before the finale almost rippling. The pedants—Brahms himself was not one—would surely have shaken doubting heads over some of his modulations of pace, his crescendos and diminuendos, his persistent quest for changeful force of tone and suppleness of movement. But Brahms, their Brahms, so played is no longer crabbed. Like Dr. Muck before him, Mr. Fiedler gives emotional sweep and largeness to the finale, finds a reticent and contemplative passion, but a passion no less in the second movement. In spite of the extremists on both sides, Brahms felt as well as thought, when a discerning conductor and a responsive band release him. He may lack tonal color; but if he does, the orchestra yesterday gave it to him—the strings, the horns, the clarinets, the trombones. There was brightness as well as shadow in the instrumental voices, glow as well as depth. The strings accented, the clarinets warmed, the horns were of manifold beauty. There was reason to suspect that Brahms, the unsensitive, theoretically, to instrumentation, really awaited an orchestra of imaginative virtuosi.

H. T. P.

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Strauss's "Macbeth" for the First Time at the Symphony Concerts—Light Music for the Pension Fund — Mr. Clement's Recital of French Songs—The Witeks in a Chamber Concert with a Curious Piece —Mr. Townsend and His Song-Cycle

WITH Strauss's tone-poem, "Macbeth," to be played for the first time here at the Symphony Concerts, and with Mr. Clément, the eminent tenor, in a recital of his own, the new week has its interesting promise. Again the Symphony Orchestra will be unassisted and again, outside "Macbeth," Mr. Fiedler has made a programme of comparatively familiar pieces. Mr. Clément will sing through a diversified list of French songs, interspersed with three by American composers. The Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] has a concert for the increase of its Pension Fund with the assistance of Mr. Constantino, the tenor of the Boston Opera House; Mr. and Mrs. Witek announce a concert of chamber music for violin and pianoforte; and Mr. Townsend, the baritone, for his annual concert, will sing Schubert's song-cycle, "Die Schöne Müllerin."

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Concerts

MACBETH is the overlooked and neglected tone-poem of Strauss. Nowadays—or indeed at any other time—it is rarely performed anywhere, and in all probability it has not been heard in America since the Chicago Orchestra played it in Theodore Thomas's time. Yet Strauss, by report, cherishes it and Mr. Fiedler thinks so well of it that for two seasons he has purposed to make it known here. Accordingly he has made it the first number on his programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Written in 1887 "Macbeth" is chronologically the first of Strauss's tone-poems; but he did not publish it until three years later he had revised the music. Mr. Newman, in his monograph on Strauss, praises the piece. "'Macbeth,'" he says, "is all psychology and no action. . . . Strauss makes no attempt whatever to cover the whole ground of Shakspeare's drama; no other character is introduced but Lady Macbeth, and she is really kept in the background of the picture while absolutely nothing 'happens,' not even the murder of the king. The whole drama is enacted in the soul of Macbeth; apart from the comparatively few bars that depict his wife, the score is entirely concerned with the internal conflict of the three main elements of his character—his ambitious pride, his irresolution, and his love for Lady Macbeth. There is nothing here that is not pure 'stuff for music,' as Wagner would have said. The musical texture of the work is extraordinarily strong and well-wrought; already the young man of twenty-two makes Liszt seem like an amateur in comparison. For the first time in the history of the symphonic poem, in fact, a musical brain of the best kind, endlessly fertile in ideas and with a masterly technique, is cultivating the form. The score, youthful as it is, already shows the rich polyphonic structure that is characteristic of Strauss, and beside which the homophonic, lyrical style of Liszt seems decidedly thin." The remaining items of the programme are the Suite that Fauré arranged from his incidental music to Maeterlincke's "Pelléas and Mélisande," unduly neglected nowadays beside Debussy's opera Goldmark's glowing Oriental overture, "Sakuntala"; and Beethoven's fifth Symphony which better suits Mr. Fiedler's love of orchestral eloquence than some of the rest.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Pension-Fund Concert

THE Symphony Orchestra has deferred unusually long, this year, its two annual concerts for the profit of its Pension Fund, and the first is set for Sunday evening, at eight, in Symphony Hall. Of the just and beneficent purpose to which the fund ministers, of the support from the audiences of the regular concerts and from the miscellaneous public that it deserves, much has been said many times in this place. Yet less the purpose than the anticipated pleasure of concerts assembles audiences for them, and accordingly Mr. Fiedler and the committee in charge of the fund have made a programme of light or well-liked music; the suite of dances from Tschaikowsky's ballet of "The Nutcracker"; Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser," Nicolai's to his operatic comedy, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Préludes," and Johann Strauss's "Blue Danube" waltz in its original form as a piece for men's choir and orchestra. The Cecilia will provide the chorus, and at the invitation of the committee, Mr. Constantino, the tenor of the Boston Opera House, will assist. His pieces are Johnson's monologue from the third act of Puccini's "La Fanciulla del West" and Enzo's invocation of sky and sea in the second act of Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

BOSTON HERALD
MARCH 13, 1911.

CAMPAIGN FOR CURRENCY BILL

Monetary Commission Seeking to Create Sentiment for New Measure.

TO VISIT LARGER CITIES

WASHINGTON, March 12—Plans for the reform of the currency laws will be prosecuted with vigor by the means of the national monetary commission during the summer and fall. A campaign of education will be started within a few weeks to create sentiment for a bill which probably will be introduced in Congress next December.

Thus far the work of the commission has not been regarded as political, and care is to be taken to avoid the introduction of partisan views in the campaign for the bill. A majority of the members who have been working on the proposed legislation are not now members of Congress, and most of them are regarded as out of politics. This is particularly true of the chairman, ex-Senator Aldrich of Rhode Island, who expects to devote a great deal of time to the work during the year.

Beginning with the hearing of the

SYMPHONY PROGRAM MOST ATTRACTIVE

Work of Orchestra Arouses Audience to High Pitch of Enthusiasm.

At the close of the performance of Brahms's first symphony yesterday afternoon the Symphony Orchestra was applauded until, after bowing several times all by himself, Mr. Fiedler called to the players to stand up. The final movement of the symphony brought out an exhibition of orchestral virtuosity that raised the large matinee audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm.

The program this week is one of the most attractive of the season and it is entirely for orchestra. The Brahms symphony is offered for the first time since Conductor Fiedler made his initial bow in October, 1908; and yesterday, as at the concerts of two seasons ago, it was read without a score. This is a feat which Mr. Fiedler seldom performs, but it is evident that few works have taken hold of him so powerfully as this vigorous and remarkably melodious symphony. The result is a performance at once respectful and affectionate, brilliant and beautiful—rivaling the recent interpretations of the "Tannhaeuser" overture and Strauss's colossal fantasia, "Don Quixote."

But equally polished and sympathetic was the performance of Tschaikowsky's superb overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," which has not been on a symphony program for nearly four years. Nor were the multiform beauties of "A Siegfried Idyl," the more familiar Wagner piece, slighted; nor was the true comic spirit of Sinigaglia's overture to Goldoni's "Le Baruffe Chiozzotte," played here for the first time. This vivacious work was introduced to the public several years ago by Toscanini.

The third quarter of the symphony season thus ends with even more than the usual brilliancy.

SUNDAY GLOBE
—MARCH 12, 1911.

Tone Poem by Strauss
the Symphony Novelty.

Richard Strauss' "Macbeth," which Mr Fiedler has long promised to perform here in Boston, will be the novelty at the Symphony concerts this week. This is the only Strauss tone poem which has yet to be heard in Boston, and curiously enough so far as there is any record it has been played but twice in the United States, Oct 26, 1901, by the Chicago orchestra under Thodore Thomas, and in October, 1906, under Mr Stock.

There is but little explanation or guide to an analysis furnished by Strauss himself save the title, and the acknowledgment — after Shakspere's drama. There are but two references in the score to the theme.

Over an imperious phrase for violins, horn and wood-wind near the beginning, the word "Macbeth" occurs, and above a passage on page 12 there is a phrase marked appassionata, molto rubato and a quotation in German from Lady Macbeth's speech in act 1, scene 5, beginning "Hie thee hither, that I may pour my spirits in thine ear."

The tone poem was written in 1887, a year later than "Don Juan," although its opus number is 23, and that of the sketch of the amorous knight is 20.

Another interesting number on the program will be Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas and Melisande," incidental music written by him for Maeterlinck's play of the same name and preceding by some years Debussy's opera. The suite has been played twice by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr Gericke in 1904 and under Mr d'Indy the following year. It was played recently at a private concert of French music at the Boston opera house, directed by Mr Caplet. The other numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," and Beethoven's symphany in C minor.

Symphony Pension Fund
Concert This Evening.

A concert of popular music played by the entire Symphony orchestra under its own conductor is something decidedly out of the ordinary and the program which has been arranged for the first concert in aid of the Pension fund of the orchestra, which is to be given in Symphony hall tonight, should have a wide appeal not only to the regular patrons and friends of the orchestra but to the public in general.

The committee was fortunate enough to enlist the services of Mr Constantino, principal tenor of the Boston opera company, as soloist. Mr Constantino is down for two numbers; the tenor aria from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West" and the familiar "Cielo e Mare" from Ponchielli's "La Giaconda."

The orchestra will also have the assistance of the male chorus of the Cecilia society and with these gentlemen will give Johann Strauss' waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube." The fact that this classic waltz was written originally for male chorus and orchestra is not generally known. Several years ago it was sung here by the Apollo club with much success.

The program will begin with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Then will come the Puccini aria, which will be followed by the "Tannhauser" overture. The first number of the second part will be the ever-popular "Nut-Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky. The suite will be followed by the Ponchielli aria, after which will come Nicolai's popular overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and finally Strauss' waltz.

RALD, BOSTON, MARCH 12, 1911

FLORENCIO CONSTANTINO

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Richard Strauss's "Macbeth," which Mr. Fiedler has long promised to perform here in Boston, will be the novelty of the program for Friday afternoon, the 17th, and Saturday evening, the 18th. This is the only tone poem of Strauss which has yet to be heard in Boston. It was played on Oct. 26, 1901, by the Chicago orchestra under Theodore Thomas. The work has no explanation or guide aside from the word "Macbeth" written over one of its themes and later over another theme the words "Lady Macbeth" and a quotation from the tragedy. It was written in 1887, and although its opus number is 23 and is later than that of "Don Juan," which is 20, it was written a year before the latter.

Another interesting number on the program will be Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas and Melisande," incidental music written by him from Maeterlinck's play of the same name and preceding by some years Debussy's opera. It was first performed in Boston at a concert of the New England Conservatory orchestra. The other numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala" and Beethoven's symphony in C-minor.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

A concert of popular music played by the entire Symphony orchestra under its own conductor is out of the ordinary. The program arranged for the first concert in aid of the pension fund of the orchestra in Symphony Hall tonight should make a wide appeal. Only once in many years has the orchestra given a popular program: that was five years ago at the concert given in aid of the sufferers from the San Francisco disaster.

The committee of the pension fund institution was fortunate to enlist the services of Mr. Constantino of the Boston opera company as soloist. He and Mr. Russell, the director of the Boston opera, fell in readily with the suggestion and Mr. Constantino's presence must necessarily add interest to the concert. He will sing the tenor aria from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West" and "Cielo e Mare" from Ponchielli's "La Giaconda."

The orchestra will have the assistance of the male chorus of the Cecilia Society and with it give Johann Strauss's waltz, 'The Beautiful Blue Danube," written originally for male chorus and orchestra.

The concert will begin with Liszt's "Preludes." Then will come the Puccini aria followed by the "Tannhaeuser" overture, the ever-popular "Nut Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky, the Ponchielli aria, Nicolai's popular overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and finally Strauss's waltz.

SUNDAY POST, MARCH 12, 1911

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A concert of popular music played by the entire Symphony Orchestra under its own conductor is something decidedly out of the ordinary, and the programme which has been arranged for the first concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the orchestra, which is to be given in Symphony Hall tonight, should have a wide appeal not only to the regular patrons and friends of the orchestra but to the public in general. The former Pension Fund concerts have presented Wagner programmes, Richard Strauss programmes and Beethoven programmes, but only once in many years has the orchestra given a popular programme, that being five years ago at the concert given in aid of the sufferers from the San Francisco disaster. The pleasure given by that concert has encouraged the committee to attempt another one of similar description for tonight.

The committee of the Pension Fund Institution were fortunate enough to enlist the services of Mr. Constantino, the principal tenor of the Boston Opera Company, as soloist. Mr. Constantino will sing the tenor aria from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West," and the familiar "Cielo e Mare," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

In addition to Mr. Constantino the orchestra will have the assistance of the male chorus of the Cecilia Society, and with these gentlemen will perform Johann Strauss' waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube." The fact that this classic waltz was written originally for male chorus and orchestra is not generally known. Several years ago it was sung here by the Apollo Club with much success.

The programme will begin with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Then will come the Puccini aria, which will be followed by the "Tannhauser" overture. The first number of the second part will be the popular "Nut-Cracker," suite of Tschaikowsky. This was first given at a Pension Fund concert two years ago, and such was its success that Mr. Fiedler placed it in one of the Symphony programmes of the following season. Since then the orchestra has played it in nearly all the cities it has visited. The "Nut-Cracker" suite will be followed by the Ponchielli aria, after which will come Nicolai's popular overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and finally Strauss' waltz.

Symphony

Richard Strauss's "Macbeth," which Mr. Fiedler has long promised to perform here in Boston, will be the novelty on the Symphony programmes of Friday afternoon, the 17th, and Saturday evening, the 18th. This is the only Strauss tone poem which has yet to be heard in Boston, and curiously enough, so far as there is any record, it has been played but once in the United States, on Oct. 26, 1901, by the Chicago Orchestra under Theodore Thomas. It was written in 1887 and although its opus number, 23, would indicate a later date than that of "Don Juan," which is 20, it was written a year before the latter. It followed the Symphonic Fantasia "Aus Italien," and it shows more plainly than that work the artistic influence exerted over Strauss by his friend Alexander Ritter, who, according to Strauss, was the first one to give him an appreciation of Liszt and Wagner. "Aus Italien" was written in 1886, shortly after the composer had left Meiningen, where he had been assistant conductor under Buelow. In 1887 came "Macbeth," in 1888, "Don Juan," in 1889, "Death and Transfiguration," in 1895, "Till Eulenspiegel, in 1896, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Don Quixote," in 1897, "Ein Heldenleben," in 1899, and Symphonia Domestica in 1904.

Another interesting number on the programme will be Gabriel Faure's Suite "Pelleas and Melisande," incidental music written by him for Maeterlinck's play of the same name and preceding by some years Debussy's opera. It was first performed in Boston by Mr. Gericke in 1904 and was played again under Vincent d'Indy in 1905. The other numbers will be Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala" and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor.

TRAVELER, MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1911

SYMPHONY PENSION CONCERT A SUCCESS

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra given in Symphony Hall last evening drew a large audience, and one of the most demonstrative that has been assembled in that hall this winter. That it was not just an ordinary concert seemed to be in the air, and the orchestra was in the holiday mood throughout, playing for the sheer love of it. Mr. Fiedler, too, conducted in this same spirit, particularly in the Tannhauser overture, when without a score he led the orchestra as if at a triumphal fete. Surely the enthusiasm of the audience must have communicated itself to the players also. A tremendous ovation was given to Signor Constantino at his first appearance on the stage. The famous tenor gave his services, and in offering them he was concurred with heartily by Manager Russell of the Boston Opera Company. That his generosity was appreciated there was no room for doubt. A large beribboned laurel wreath was part of the demonstration. In this fusion of Boston's two great music institutions the Symphony and the Boston Opera, which are two of the most distinctive musical organizations of the country, there was a peculiar delight.

The orchestral numbers consisted of the Liszt Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes," Wagner Tannhauser overture, Tschaikowsky Nutcracker Suite, the Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," by Nicolai, concluding with the Johann Strauss waltz, "The Blue Danube," with male chorus from the Cecilia Society. A programme of this nature is seldom given by this orchestra, but novelty seemed to add inspiration to the rendering of it. The Liszt Poem, such a lovely mingling of the lyric and the epic, was a fitting opening to the programme. The Tschaikowsky Suite was of course the most interesting number, full of varying moods, curiously and oddly expressed. Although it is Tschaikowsky in the lighter vein, at times showing him as the humorist instead of the humanist, as we more often know him, it yet has in its fifth movement a strain of the Tschaikowsky melancholy. The closing Strauss waltz, with full male chorus, is a combination seldom heard, and the more the pity, for it is exceedingly brilliant and thrilling. The supplementary work of the chorus adds greatly.

Signor Constantino sang for his first aria the "Cielo e Mare" from "La Gioconda," which is one of his best, and last evening he sang it with smooth, radiant voice. He was encored so enthusiastically that he responded with the "Questa O Quella" from "Rigoletto," the aria in which he has won repeated ovations. His second aria was the one from the last act of "The Girl of the Golden West." It was an interesting fact—one which adverse critics of the latest Puccini opera might be surprised to note—that this aria took its audience by storm, called for the greatest applause of the evening. Heard side by side with the "Cielo e Mare" and two "Rigoletto" arias, it stood out with a distinction that was not to be denied. Signor Constantino was recalled many times and repeated the aria, and again recalled he sang the "La Donna E Mobile" from "Rigoletto." The Puccini music was played with full and expressive utterance by the Symphony orchestra—a full instrumentation reveals new musical depths.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY, MARCH 13, 191

News of Music

THE concert of the Symphony Orchestra, last evening, for the profit of the Pension Fund was less interesting than such occasions, in previous years, have usually been. Though this town—opera house or no opera house—hears none of Wagner's music except occasional scraps of it at the regular Symphony Concerts, Mr. Fiedler put only one such piece on his programme yesterday—the overture to "Tannhäuser," the most familiar of th all. The other items were pieces traditio to "popular" programmes, like Liszt's to poem "Les Préludes"—it is easy to w der why since the music is no more th sonorous rhetoric—and Nictolai's overtu to his folk-opera, "The Merry Wives o Windsor," which Mr. Fiedler carried to such a racing end that even the virtuosi of the orchestra could hardly keep pace with him. There were amends in interest and in execution in the suite of dances from Tschaikowsky's ballet of "The Nut-Cracker," which Mr. Fiedler has happily rediscovered for this town, and once more the tinkle of the celesta for the Sugar-Plum Fairy, the exotic languors of the Arabian Dance, the miniature and piping clatter of the Chinese episode, the rough-and-tumble of the Trépak, the bright rhythms of the Dance of the Mirlitons and the sensuous curves of the final waltz renewed pleasures that ought to be still more familiar. Ballet-music, which can be as truly imaginative as a symphony or a tone-poem has yet to come into its true place at the Symphony Concerts regular or occasional. Curious and interesting to hear as well was the "Blue Danube" waltz as Strauss originally wrote it for orchestra and male choir. The men of the Cecilia assisted the band in this piece, and at the invitation of the committee of the orchestra in charge of the Pension Fund concert, Mr. Constantino, the familiar tenor of the Boston Opera House, sang five operatic pieces, each of which brought him prolonged and boisterous applause. He might have been better accompanied, since Mr. Fiedler is not expert in Italian song, and he has certainly sung much better. The upshot of all these things was an audience, the numbers of which must have surely increased the Pension Fund—presumably the main thing—but which differed significantly from those that such concerts usually attract. It was the miscellaneous assemblage of an idle Sunday evening and the fine public of the Symphony Concerts themselves was conspicuously absent.

Mr. Fiedler has not abandoned his purpose to perform Debussy's "Ibéria"—the most considerable and the most interesting of the Parisian's new "Images" for orchestra—at the Symphony Concerts this season. He is reserving the piece for the relative leisure of April, when the orchestra has ended its monthly journeys for the season and is undertaking few concerts in neighboring cities. For these final concerts he is keeping, like his predecessors, other large and difficult undertakings. In the five pairs of concerts that will then remain, he will have a freer hand, too, with purely orchestral pieces. Only two more "soloists" are to come—Miss Parlow, the violinist, on March 31 and April 1 and Mme. Rider-Kelsey, the singer, on April 21 and 22. Beethoven's Choral Symphony, moreover, will not be performed this spring.

In each of the three performances—on Friday and Saturday evenings and on Saturday afternoon, in which Miss Pavlova and Mr. Mordkine will appear at the Opera House, they will dance in the fragments from the first act of "Coppélia" (as they did last Thursday) and in the miscellaneous numbers, like the Bacchanale and the Arrow Dance, in which here as elsewhere their audiences so applaud them. Apparently we are not to have "Coppélia" as a whole with the scene of the automatons.

By present outgivings, the Philadelphians have heard with resentment the proposal that they make up the deficit which their scanty attendance has caused in the treasury of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company. They reply with candor and also with acerbity that Mr. Dippel's opera has not pleased them; that it has been untactfully managed; and that those who brought it to Philadelphia had best open their own wallets. All of which, being interpreted, indicates that the Philadelphians prefer the Metropolitan Company once a week to opera of their own via Chicago.

Minor items of news run that Mr. Loeffler's choral piece, "For One Who Fell in Battle," once performed here by the Choral Art Society will be sung for the first time in New York by the Musical Art Society next Thursday evening; that Mme. Mazarin, who impressed New York and Boston as the Electra of Strauss's music-drama last year, is to join the Chicago Opera Company next week; and that, by official statement, Mr. Mahler's relations with the Philharmonic Society in New York are dove and not hawk-like.

Progress—Incidentally, Mr. Hertz has been making great strides of late with the English language. Desiring to test both his knowledge of the language and the "Opera in English" idea at a single stroke, he listened, he said, intently to the singers in Victor Herbert's opera. Suddenly out came Alvarado with something which he caught. "Ah," said Mr. Hertz, "I have it. He said 'San Francisco.' That I can understand clearly." Failing to get the gist of the following context he let his eye drop to his libretto. "Alas," he exclaimed, "I am undone. I thought that I had understood at least one thing in the opera, but even in that I must be disappointed. It is n't 'San Francisco,' but 'Don Francisco.'" [Musical America.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY, MARCH 12, 1911.

Pension Fund Concert

A concert of popular music played by the entire Symphony Orchestra under its own conductor is something decidedly out of the ordinary, and the program which has been arranged for the pension fund concert to be given in Symphony Hall tonight should have a wide appeal, not only to the regular patrons and friends of the orchestra, but to the public in general.

Florencio Constantino, the principal tenor of the Boston Opera Company, will sing the tenor aria from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West" and the familiar "Cielo e Mare," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda."

In addition to Mr. Constantino the orchestra will have the assistance of the male chorus of the Cecilia Society, which will give Johann Strauss's waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube." The fact that this classic waltz was written originally for male chorus and orchestra is not generally known. Several years ago it was sung here by the Apollo Club with much success.

The program will also include Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes;" the ever-popular "Nut-Cracker" suite of Tschaikowsky and the overture to Nicolai's "The Merry Wives of Windsor."

Symphony Program

Richard Strauss's "Macbeth," which Mr. Fiedler has long promised to perform here in Boston, will be the novelty on this week's Symphony program, to be played on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is the only Strauss tone poem which has yet to be heard in Boston, and curiously enough, so far as there is any record, it has been played but once in the United States, on Oct. 26, 1901, by the Chicago Orchestra under Theodore Thomas.

Another interesting number on the program will be Gabriel Faure's suite, "Pelleas and Melisande," incidental music written by him for Maeterlinck's play of the same name, and preceding by some years Debussy's opera. It was first performed in Boston by Mr. Gericke in 1904, and was played again under Vincent d'Indy in 1905. The other numbers will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," and Beethoven's symphony in C minor.

MONITOR, BOSTON MARCH 13, 191

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Three exquisitely performed numbers at the Symphony pension fund concert Sunday night: the "Nuteracker" set of ballet dances, the "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture and Johnson's aria from the last act of "The Girl of the Golden West." Mr. Fiedler usually gives a good account of music that has a humorous turn anyway, and of course he played Tschaikowsky's dance of the sugar plum fairy with his eye on the steps of an imaginary Pavlowa. Did you not yourself in one of the dances see Mordkin spinning in the air? Surely you were not, as you thought, surprised by the music coming to a queer pizzicato close, but by Mordkin suddenly descending to the ground and turning into a brazen statue.

Mr. Constantino made a multitude of new friends for his outlaw, Johnson, and renewed the goodwill of old ones. He was applauded for many things—for his noble work for opera in Boston, for his lending his assistance to the Symphony pension cause and for his beautiful singing and the generous measure of it.

The performance of the Viennese waltz in its original form proved indeed that the piece was correctly conceived by Strauss as a male chorus. Those who heard it can never accept it in its transcribed form as the real "Blue Danube" music.

Works performed by the Symphony orchestra: Liszt, symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; Wagner, overture, "Tannhauser"; Tschaikowsky, suite, "Nutcracker"; Nicolai, overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor"; Johann Strauss, waltz, "The Beautiful Blue Danube" (male chorus and orchestra).

Arias sung by Mr. Constantino: Ponchielli, "Cielo e Mare," from "La Gioconda"; Verdi, "Questa o quella," from "Rigoletto"; Puccini, aria from "The Girl of the Golden West"; Verdi "La donna e

BOSTON POST, MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1911

RECALLS FOR CONSTANTINO

Tenor as Soloist at Pension Fund Concert

There was tremendous enthusiasm last night at the Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, when Florencio Constantino of the Boston Opera Company sang as assisting soloist, and received an ovation after every one of his solos. There was a big audience, and this audience soon became very demonstrative. The programme, in addition to Mr. Constantino's part in it, consisted of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; the "Nut-Cracker" suite for orchestra of Tschaikowsky; the overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor," by Nicolai; the "Blue Danube" waltz, sung by the male singers of the Cecilia Society.

Mr. Constantino's solos were the big aria from the last act of "The Girl of the Golden West," and the aria, "Cielo e mar," from Ponchielli's "La Gioconda." In addition to these songs, the tenor sang two airs from "Rigoletto," the air which occurs at the very beginning of the first act, and the famous "Donna e mobile." The popular singer was greeted with salvos every time that he appeared, and in no instance was he recalled less than five or six times in succession. Constantino seemed to enjoy this as much as anyone else. He was in excellent voice and he sang with the utmost gusto. The music served to display various qualities of his voice, such as the light and sweet tone which he produces so beautifully in the "Donna e mobile," and the more dramatic qualities with which he infuses Puc[illegible] air. There are few tenors, more[illegible], who can give a better interpretation of Ponchielli's fine aria, the best thing in that composer's best opera. The audience not only applauded, but shouted its approval.

Only a few know that "The Blue Danube" waltz was originally composed by Strauss for male chorus, that Strauss had no idea of the "hit" his waltz was going to make, and that it was not until some years later that the waltz was finally scored for small orchestra. It was sung last night with admirable swing and a splendid, resonant body of tone. The entire programme was such as to make a particular appeal to the man in the street, while preserving the line between good and common music. Mr. Fiedler gave a graphic performance of Liszt's tone-poem, "Les Preludes," which was disconcertingly modern when it was composed, but is now appreciated by everybody. The Tannhauser overture, which, as few masterpieces, has stood the test of time, came in for a big share of the plaudits. So did the pretty and graceful music of Tschaikowsky—music which one would never associate with the master who wrote the great tragic tone-poems, "Manfred," "Francesca da Rimini" and the "Symphonie Pathetique" which will be played here later in the season.

Former Pension Fund concerts have presented Wagner, Richard Strauss, Beethoven programmes, and these programmes have been much appreciated; but for last night Mr. Fiedler had determined to give a programme of semi-popular music, and the attitude of the audience certainly showed how great was its appreciation of the music of gifted and generally "understood" composers, interpreted as it was by an organization of virtuosos.

ADVERTISER, MONDAY
MARCH 13, 1911

PENSION FUND CONCERT OF THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Star Features Were Solos of Constantino and Singing of Strauss' Waltzes by St. Cecilia Male Chorus.

The first concert of the current season, for the benefit of the pension fund of the Symphony orchestra, occurred last night, and was attended by an audience which filled Symphony hall. Not in years has our learned orchestra, in the midst of their busy season, accorded us the privilege of listening to a programme so "popular" in every sense of the word. It was an evening when artificiality and profundity were exiled, and when lightness, relaxation and charm held sway. On the programme were: "Les Preludes," Liszt's symphonic poem; the Tannhauser overture; portions of Tschaikowsky's "Nut-Cracker" suite; overture to the "Merry Wives of Windsor"; and most interesting of all, the "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltzes, presented in their original state—for male chorus and orchestra, members of the Cecilia society assisting. Mr. Constantino performed the graceful act of volunteering his services as assisting soloist, and was heard in arias from "La Gioconda" and from "The Girl of the Golden West."

If, to the great majority of mankind, life were as turbulent and as moving as Liszt has stated it in "Les Preludes" we might as well give up the ghost now, for to endure such conflict and such violence for more than 10 minutes—not to speak of three score years and ten—would be incredible. Lamartine's rather tame words which form the nucleus for this tone poem might not have suggested to other minds such a tempest as is here portrayed. Mr. Fiedler's reading was superb. The sharp contrasts, the marvellous crescendo leading to the middle section, the prodigious climaxes were portrayed as our orchestra alone can picture them.

That the great Tannhauser overture, now one of the most popular works of its kind, should ever have been denounced as ugly, strained and impossible music seems incredible. But even that prince among critics, Fetis, the elder, with an enthusiasm worthy of a better cause called it "an ill-harmonised chorale tune, without a single spark of melody in the whole production." Mr. Fiedler's reading bore the stamp of originality, and although he took it in the strictest of tempi, one never felt the want of flexibility or suppleness.

We can conclude complacently that no orchestra at any time has ever approximated the perfection and the finish with which our band plays this overture.

Last night was a particularly strenuous evening for the "hardware" department. Kettle-drums, cymbals, castanets, bells, gongs, glockenspiel and tambourine labored heavily to produce the requisite amount of noise. Our virtuoso kettle-drummer especially should receive extra salary for overtime and for his splendid work. There were many soloists beside Sig. Constantino. Everyone seemed to have a solo and even Mr. Nagel's Celesta came for its turn in the Tschaikowsky suite.

Sig. Constantino received a great ovation. Encore followed encore; nor was the audience content until they had heard "La donna mobile." Never has the famous tenor appeared in concert to greater advantage.

The statement that the Strauss waltzes were first performed here some years ago by the Apollo club is an error. In antediluvian times the Orpheus Musical society sang them in German. The "Beautiful Blue Danube" is undoubtedly the jolliest male chorus that has ever been penned. Many of the puns and witticisms of the original German version suffer by translation, but the music is ever the same—rollicking, frolicking and irresistible. The men of the Cecilia society filled the bill quite satisfactorily.

Thus ended a concert which should add many dollars to a worthy cause and a concert which will go on record as the most genial that we have had for many a day.

G. S. M.

JOURNAL—MONDAY,
MARCH 13, 191

CONSTANTINO HEARD IN SYMPHONY HALL

Wins Acclaim at Popular Concert for Orchestra's Pension Fund.

It isn't often that the Symphony Orchestra gives a popular concert, but when it does give one it's what a former President would call a "corker." Such a concert it gave last night at Symphony Hall in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. Nearly every seat was taken.

There was a two-hour program, overflowing with tuneful delights, and there was a popular soloist—Florencio Constantino. It was the famous tenor's first experience in Symphony Hall, and the acoustics bothered him a bit in his opening number, the beautiful "Cielo e Mar" from "Gioconda," but his nervousness quickly disappeared, leaving him free to display his happy style and his extraordinary mastery of both the grave and the light forms of lyric song. After the air from "Gioconda," he gave as an encore the duke's lively song about belles and posies, from the first act of "Rigoletto," in tones as tinkling as those of the Glockenspiel heard later in the charming Tschaikowsky suite. Afterward the pride of the Boston Opera House sang the impassioned air from the last act of Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West"—the song Johnson sings as he awaits the noose—and this he had to give over again. Then, to cap the climax, he sang "La Donna e mobile," from "Rigoletto," in brilliant style. The orchestra rewarded him with a giant wreath, decorated with the Spanish colors, and the audience acclaimed him after each song.

There was an unusual number in the shape of Strauss's "Beautiful Blue Danube" waltz, performed by the orchestra and a male chorus composed of members of the Cecilia Society. The celebrated waltz was originally given in this way. The Apollo Club revived the original form a few years ago. This selection was also greatly enjoyed.

Enthusiastic applause was the rule throughout the concert. The orchestra played Lisst's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," the "Tannhaeuser" overture, Tschaikowsky's "Nutcracker" suite and the overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor." The "Nutcracker" number made a particularly pleasing impression, and Mr. Nagel, who played the Glockenspiel, and the admirable trio of flutists were compelled to make bows all by themselves.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1911.

STRAUSS TONE POEM SYMPHONY FEATURE

By EDITH BURNHAM.

Another Strauss tone-poem, "Macbeth," opened yesterday afternoon's Symphony program. This is the fourth Strauss tone-poem that Mr. Fiedler has placed on his programs this season, Death and Transfiguration, Hero of Life, and Don Quixote preceding. That Strauss is the greatest composer of tone-poems there is no doubt. The peculiar and subtle relation between an idea and its tonal equivalent he understands deeply, suffusing it all with emotional and atmospheric color. He is the psychologist-composer; musical composition to him is a medium of soul expression. He confides and entrusts to it his best thoughts, believing that through it he can most truly express them to the world. His themes and figures take definite shape in his own mind and they become creatures incarnate when they are vitalized with musical sound; and inwrought with all these ideas that are more real than things of flesh and blood are the poet's dream and the artist's love of color.

A Strauss tone-poem is a great poetic-dramatic tone pageant. The Macbeth tone-poem is less complex, more sharply delineated than others of Strauss. The Macbeth theme has great definiteness of expression, yet it subtly mingles Macbeth the man of human kindness and even love with Macbeth the man of "vaulting ambition" and "treasonous malice." In his Lady Macbeth theme Strauss has sided with the modern commentators in making her possess the tenderest of woman's sentiments as well as the hardest cruelty. The flutes and clarinets introduce this theme, and once introduced, like Lady Macbeth herself, it never quite leaves the scene.

Strauss, like Wagner, can express double entendre, dual personality, in his musical themes. A delicate love theme is interwoven in the tone-poem, full of melody and tenderness. Strauss tells the Macbeth tragedy, not in clang and clash, but in a half sad mystery and a complex, highly suggestive and, at times, sinister commingling of motifs. Macbeth "supped full of horrors" is a terrific spectacle. But Macbeth at the end of life is a stilled soul—stilled in the mystery of "death and transfiguration." Mr. Fiedler knows full well how to bring out the wonderful subtleties of a Strauss tone-poem.

The Faure "Pelleas and Melisande" suite was the second number on the programme. Faure tells the pathetic "Pelleas and Melisande" story in low, plaintive note, even its third or tragic movement is a soft-threaded tragedy, youth and beauty die, but dying love and a kind of mute spiritual joy thrills even its saddest moments. The second spinning movement is exceedingly delicate, one sees soft, delicate fingers plying the threads, and hears the light touch of a dainty foot on the tread of the wheel. Faure images the story with much beauty and exactitude.

The Goldmark "Sakuntula" overture has two themes of romantic, sensuous beauty and almost intoxicating rhythm; also a hunting theme and a serious theme, the foundation of the Sakuntula story. The somewhat druidical, mythical story is told simply and appealingly, woodland spirits, the forest peace, the hunter's clarion, the grove of Ilex and its sacred calm, the love of a King and the daughter of a nymph—these tell its musical story.

The Beethoven C Minor was the symphony for the afternoon. Here we have Beethoven at his best, at his spiritual heights, in his introspective depths, and we have withal that lucid beauty of pure music for music's sake. Its compact form of composition was very noticeable coming after a group of moderns. Mr. Fiedler, as in the Brahms symphony of last week, conducted without the score. It is at these times that sheer love of the work in hand commands his baton and the orchestra which it directs. The second Andante movement and the Final Allegro were full of force and beauty.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AWAY ON LAST SOUTHERN TRIP.

There will be no Symphony concerts next week, as the orchestra is out of town on its fth and last southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and on Monday night, the 27th, the only concert of the season will be given in Springfield. This trip practically closes up the out-of-town concerts of the orchestra; for only two more will remain, one in New Bedford and one in Providence. The season, which is rapidly coming to its end, is the most successful the orchestra has ever had. During the remaining concerts in Boston Mr. Fiedler is expecting to bring out several interesting novelties.

RECORD, SATURDAY,
MARCH 18, 1911

FIEDLER READS MACBETH FINELY

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. Tone-poem. "Macbeth."
G. Faure. Suite. "Pelleas and Melisande."
Goldmark. "Sakuntala" overture.
Beethoven. Symphony in C minor. No. 5.

Mr. Fiedler is steeped in Strauss to the very eyelids, and one may be sure that everything will be made as intelligible as possible when he directs a Strauss work. It was so on this occasion. Every point was brought out so that the complex score became comparatively clear. All the orchestra played excellently, the trumpets especially so.

Faure's Suite has been heard before in these concerts. It is far less elusive than Debussy's treatment, but it is poetic and interprets the text well, all the same. The pathos of the prelude is very fitting to the picture of the weeping girl in the forest, the timid one who does not care for the crown she has lost or for the dignity which comes to her.

The impressive orchestral trills were well given, and the triumphant end, well punctuated with kettle drum, was as powerful as lungs and bows could make it. The horns and trumpets had some work to do at a furious pace, but they achieved the perilous passages without a break.

It is impossible to read anything new into Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It came after the three diverse modern styles chronicled above, with a power that proved that some points of formal classical music are unapproachable even by the roar of modern license, and remain imperishable.

BOSTON JOURNAL
MARCH 18, 1911.

SYMPHONY GIVES NOTABLE PROGRAM

Boston heard for the first time, at yesterday's Symphony matinee, the "Macbeth" tone poem by Richard Strauss. It is the oldest of these famous tone poems, having been written twenty-five years ago, after the composer's epoch-marking Italian journey. Although the tone poem, "Don Juan," bears a younger number, "Macbeth" is the oldest of all, and it is the last to be performed here. "Death and Transfiguration" and "A Hero Life" were heard earlier in the season, and not for the first time; while "Don Juan," which has enjoyed the largest number of performances, was last given at the beginning of the season of 1909-10.

"Macbeth," like the symphonic fantasia, "Aus Italien," which preceded it, reveals the transition period of Strauss's career as a composer. It has both the melodic charm that von Buelow admired so much and the rude, weird power that characterizes Strauss's later compositions. The performance yesterday lacked the virtuoso assurance that usually distinguishes the playing of the Symphony orchestra. Mr. Fiedler, to do the work and the orchestra justice, might repeat "Macbeth" before the season is over.

The orchestra was at its grandest in the fifth Beethoven symphony, which was last performed here when the glorious work reached its centennial celebration, in December, 1908. Mr. Fiedler, conducting without a score, brought out all the varied beauties of the classic composition with loving care. The third movement, with its wonderful colorings, was especially enjoyed by the usual large matinee audience. But the performance was splendid as a whole.

The suite taken from the music that Gabriel Faure wrote for the Maeterlinck play, "Pelleas and Melisande," and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture complete this week's program, which is remarkable for the fact that three of the four composers represented in it are still in the land of the living.

HERALD, BOSTON,
MARCH 19, 1911.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA AWAY.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra is out of town on its fifth and last southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and on Monday night, the 27th, the only concert of the season will be given in Springfield. This trip practically winds up the out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, for only two more will remain, one in New Bedford and one in Providence. The season now rapidly coming to its end is every respect the most successful the orchestra has ever had. In fact, when the general state of music in this country during the past winter is considered, the success which has attended without exception all the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra may be regarded as nothing less than phenomenal. During the remaining concerts in Boston Mr. Fiedler is expecting to bring out several interesting novelties.

[185]

SYMPHONY IN 19TH REHEARSAL

Strauss's Tone Poem "Macbeth" Is Played for First Time in Boston.

THE WORK IS TEMPESTUOUS

Little Appreciated as a Concert Piece—Rest of Program Well Received.

By PHILIP HALE.

The 19th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Fiedler, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. There was no soloist. The program was as follows:

Tone poem "Macbeth".....R. Strauss
Suite from stage music for "Pelleas and Melisande".....G. Faure
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Symphony in C minor, No. 5...Beethoven

Richard Strauss's "Macbeth" was played for the first time in Boston. It was first played in the United States at Chicago under Theodore Thomas's direction in 1901, and there was another performance in Chicago about five years ago. The tone poem has never been a favorite concert piece, and it seldom appears on a European program. There are some who say that Strauss himself is vexed because it is not appreciated. This may or may not be true. Composers, like poets, novelists, and parents, are not always sound and discriminative judges of their own works.

"Macbeth" is the first of the series of tone poems by Strauss. It was composed before "Don Juan," although it bears a later opus number, and at Munich, in 1886-87, when Strauss was an assistant conductor. It was revised at Weimar, where it was first performed, under the composer's direction, in October, 1890. He had been brought up in a rigorous school, and nourished on Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Later he became acquainted with the music of Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann and Brahms.

It was through Alexander Ritter that he was led to the knowledge of Berlioz, Liszt and Wagner, and he dedicated to Ritter this "Macbeth," which is the first of his peculiarly characteristic works; for "Aus Italien," composed in 1886, is a mixture of the old and new styles. There are some who find in "Macbeth" rather than in "Don Juan" the Strauss of the latest compositions. I cannot agree with them. "Don Juan" is more brilliant and audacious; more sensuous, more imaginative and dramatically emotional. It may be said that this is so on account of the subject. It might more justly be said that it is by reason of the treatment.

Strauss gives no "program" to his music; but he writes "Macbeth" over this first and chief motive, and this quotation from Lady Macbeth's first soliloquy is published in the score as a commentary on another theme which has an important part in the development of the composition:

Hie thee hither,
That I may pour my spirits in thine ear,
And chastise with the valor of my tongue
All that impedes thee from the golden round
Which Fate and metaphysical aid doth seem
To have thee crown'd withal.

But the professional analyzers have been busy. Dr. Seidl informs us that Strauss's subject is the madness of relentless cruelty; that this poetry is "strong, ruthless, incisive"; that it is "psychological" music, not narrative. Mr. Hermann Teibler has gone still further; he has written a pamphlet in which the reader is told what every page of the composition "means"; thus, a certain progression of quarter notes and leaps for strings, clarinets and oboes represent respectively the hero's "heroic determination and his cruelty"; a motive for other instruments is "characteristic of soul torturing conflict," etc., etc. Sunbeams from cucumbers; and the crop of cucumbers grows larger each year!

There is nothing in the music that suggests the three witches, the ghost of Banquo, the apparitions, the sleep-walking scene. There is no music that can be called descriptive or panoramic. The composer evidently intended to portray in music Macbeth's character and the influence of his wife over him. This may be reasonably inferred from his own indications.

The performance yesterday did not allow full understanding of the music. There were passages that evidently needed more rehearsal, as in the march movement. A work like this even when it is performed by the Boston Symphony orchestra demands more diligent preparation. Mr. Fiedler's unfortunate habit of exaggerating the pace of any allegro, however the word allegro may be modified, too often brought unsteadiness and confusion. Passages that should have been clear were almost smeared, and the character of the musical thought was not respected. Mr. Fiedler, like Job's horse, saith among the trumpets, "Ha, ha." He is inclined to goad his brass to madness, and Mr. Kloepfel, the admirable first trumpeter, has been out of the orchestra for some time on account of sickness.

Nevertheless, it is doubtful whether an ideal performance would induce the hearer to believe in the inherent greatness of the work. That "Macbeth" has been neglected by conductors is not inexplicable, for as a whole this music is sombre without great significance, and its coloring is monochromatic. The chief themes have not a distinguished profile; that given to Lady Macbeth, for example, is singularly inexpressive. The very robustiousness of the music—for "Macbeth" is robustious rather than robust—becomes monotonous and depressing. Only at the end, in the final measure, the funeral speech, do we recognize the later Strauss in his glory.

The performance of the other works gave much pleasure to the audience, especially that of Goldmark's overture and the second movement of the symphony; yet to some the feature of the concert was the opportunity of hearing again the exquisite music of Gabriel Faure to Maeterlinck's tragedy, for Debussy is not the only one who has expressed the strange melancholy with which "Pelleas and Melisande" is charged.

There will be no concerts next week. The program of the concerts on March 31 and April 1 will include Enesco's Suite for orchestra (first time in Boston); Tschaikowsky's violin concerto (played by Miss Kathleen Parlow), and Schumann's symphony in D minor.

Miss Carolina White will sing airs from Catalani's "La Walla" and Boito's "Mefistofele" at the concerts of April 7 and 8.

There will be one other soloist this season, Mme. Rider-Kersey, soprano.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MARCH 18, 19

STRAUSS' "MACBETH" AT THE SYMPHONY

SYMPATHETIC READING BY CONDUCTOR FIEDLER

Audience Burst Into Applause Over Beethoven's Fifth Symphony—Goldmark's "Sakuntala."

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Strauss. Tone-poem. "Macbeth."
G. Faure. Suite. "Pelleas and Melisande."
Goldmark. "Sakuntala" overture.
Beethoven. Symphony in C minor. No. 5.

Again an entirely orchestral programme, and one which ought to have satisfied every cultured auditor, even without any solo displays of any kind. Of course, the chief interest centred in the Strauss number, which, although not of his later works, has as yet not been heard in Boston. "Macbeth" was Strauss's first step toward the free and gigantic tone-poems which gradually replaced his classical forms of instrumental music. It was composed before "Don Juan" and directly after his free symphony "Aus Italien."

It is not a series of pictures, as the Italian symphony, and not nearly so objective as the series of tone-poems which began over a year later (1888) with "Don Juan" and continued until the culmination in the "Symphonia Domestica" in 1903. "Macbeth" was written in 1886-7, and was not intended to be a sketch of the events of the Shakespearean tragedy, but a portrayal of the dark and brooding character of the Scottish chief, its vacillation, its ambition, and the catastrophe which finally fell upon it.

Naturally the composer felt the need of the feminine to contrast with the masculine character, and the "ewig-weibliche" is also present. Lady Macbeth is represented by some expressive measures on flutes and clarinettes. But "Macbeth" is not one of the favorite works of Strauss. It is perhaps too purely a translation of moods, and one looks in vain for the familiar events that crowd the tragedy.

The Lady Macbeth theme at first rather tepid, is subsequently treated with great tenderness, suggesting anything but the dauntless heroine of Shakespeare. As regards Macbeth himself, it is Macbeth the warrior, and Macbeth the lover, that we have here, but not a trace of Macbeth the murderer. The ambitious side of the character is well suggested by turning his motive into a marchlike form in the central portion of the work.

Strauss uses the woodwind in the deepest depths, a la Tschaikowsky, in certain passages that give premonition of the evil that is coming upon the pair, and contra-bassoon and bass-clarinette are occasionally prominent. When one thinks that this great score was achieved by a young man of 22 years of age it becomes phenomenal. It at once goes beyond the symphonic poems of Liszt. The subtle changes of the Macbeth theme, (which first enters at the very beginning of the work,) the treatment of the contrasted Lady Macbeth measures, the astounding polyphony, cause us to rank this with the remarkable works of musical history.

It is one kind of precocity to write a minuet at five years of age, as Mozart did, but it is another, and a higher kind, to achieve a permanent orchestral work in young manhood, as Mendelssohn and Richard Strauss have done. But Mendelssohn stood still after his precocity, while Strauss went on, perhaps even too far.

Mr. Fiedler is steeped in Strauss to the very eyelids, and one may be sure that everything will be made as intelligible as possible when he directs a Strauss work. It was so on this occasion. Every point was brought out so that the complex score became comparatively clear. All the orchestra played excellently, the trumpets especially so. We have spoken of certain resemblances to Tschaikowsky in this work; the character of some of the martial touches of Macbeth suggested the savagery of the finale of the Tschaikowsky fifth symphony vividly.

Faure's Suite has been heard before in these concerts. It is far less elusive than Debussy's treatment, but it is poetic and interprets the text well, all the same. The pathos of the prelude is very fitting to the picture of the weeping girl in the forest, the timid one who does not care for the crown she has lost or for the dignity which comes to her. But the menacing premonitions which Maeterlinck has woven through his play, the ever-present voice of the sea, is not absent either. But it was like painting black upon black to add the melancholy of Melisande to the gloom of Macbeth.

The Spinning Woman, the second movement, portrays that part of the play where Melisande is spinning in a dark room with Pelleas beside her, and where little Yniold has the first presentiments of coming evil, as his "little mother" hushes him to sleep. An impressive monotony is here produced by the reiterations of the strings against the plaintive oboe melody. That instrument of innocent tenderness was beautifully played on this occasion, and the short movement was the best of the three which constituted the Suite.

The death-scene of the finale also achieves the pathos of the play, or rather intensifies it, for Maeterlinck wrote much in outline and always left something for music to fill in. It would be heterodox to say that Debussy's perfect union of tone to word has been attained, yet we may confess to thoroughly enjoying this suite, which we cannot say of every part of Debussy's music. Yet, coming directly after "Macbeth," the Faure suite seemed to fail of part of its effect although it was excellently read and performed.

Goldmark's "Sakuntala" presented another phase of this concert with its display of three different species of modern music. At times it seems big with fate, but there is nothing in it which the trained auditor cannot easily grasp, which is apt to make him very contented with himself and to cause him to prize the overture the more, for there are still some concert-goers who do not hold the belief that only that is great music which they cannot understand at all. Nobody can miss the five-noted figure (a, B flat, c, d, c) that bubbles up continually during the work, and the gloom that is in parts of the overture is not too overwhelming to remain attractive.

The impressive orchestral trills were well given, and the triumphant end, well punctuated with kettle drum, was as powerful as lungs and bows could make it. The horns and trumpets had some work to do at a furious pace, but they achieved the perilous passages without a break.

It is impossible to read anything new into Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. It came after the three diverse modern styles chronicled above, with a power that proved that some points of formal classical music are unapproachable even by the roar of modern license, and remain imperishable. Every detail of the four movements was well brought out although the Finale was whipped up to very great speed. The contra-basses deserve especial mention for their work in the Scherzo, which they gave clearly, although it borders upon the impossible. The variations of the second movement and the Trio of the third were especially well-done by the strings, but we have come to recognize that our string orchestra is almost super-human in all matters of ensemble and shading and technique. At the reprise of themes in the first movement Mr. Fiedler dallied somewhat with the tempi, in a new and very "adagio" manner. It was a keen pleasure to see the audience burst into great enthusiasm at the end of the second and fourth movements. After all Beethoven is not abolished yet!

IN THE REALMS OF MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven seems to have wondered to himself when well on in the last movement of the fifth symphony, "whither am I going? What does the thing I am saying now have to do with my original conception? Why is this superfluous obligation of a closing allegro imposed on me? I can carry it through, but I am doing Mozart's and Haydn's will, not my own. Let me suspend formalities here a moment and go back to my scherzo."

Thus the great composer made protest number one against the inherited formula of an overture finale. He spoke protest number two in the choral movement of the ninth symphony.

Beethoven is restored to honor at the Boston Symphony concerts. The performance of the "Egmont" overture in November, of the C minor piano concerto in February and of the C minor symphony on Friday afternoon all attest it. Distinguished reading of a work from each of the master's three orchestral fields gives Max Fielder rank with the Beethoven interpreters who have preceded him at the conductor's desk of Boston Symphony. The Beethoven number of the nineteenth program was given in all three of its characteristic divisions an extraordinary lucid presentation. The honesty and vigor of composer and the honesty and vigor of conductor became interchangeable. Here was not Fiedler the German conservatory professor appreciating the art of Beethoven, the early nineteenth century symphonist, but here was one good man recognizing another good man when he saw him. What becomes of our art affectations, can you tell, when Mr. Fielder is reading a piece he likes? One thing we know, they cease to stand between our real life and the music. The Fifth symphony, with all its certainty of aim in first movement, slow movement and scherzo, with its open minded concession to usage, under protest, in the finale, was given to the rehearsal audience for a new possession, the richest so far, perhaps, of the whole year.

Let it not be supposed, though, that the symphony was given in four separate parcels. If anybody went from the concert of Friday saying that he had sensed the logic of the first movement, felt the poetry of the second or caught the humor of the third as never before, he thereby admitted that he had never heard either Dr. Muck or Mr. Gericke conduct this work. The performance of Mr. Fiedler, as has been the rule with him in Boston, was not so remarkable for detail, for emphasis of particular mood, as for complete effect, for expression in the large.

You will find, Symphony subscriber, if you study yourself candidly, that Max Fiedler has made over your musical thinking in three years as effectually as he has made over the tone of his orchestra, left, right and rear—strings and brass. He has reformed American listeners and German players. But his French woodmen? Ah, neither he nor his audiences would try to improve perfection.

Something hitherto unplayed of Richard Strauss was on the nineteenth program, a piece Mr. Strauss wrote in his young manhood after discharging that impressive duty of every intellectual German, the reading of Shakespeare. The dramatist who understood a number of things about the stage not so well as Schiller inspired Mr. Strauss to compose a tone poem describing the events that caused Birnam wood to come to Dunsinane. The music is an instructive study in orchestration, a valuable document for throwing light on the early thoughts of a great composer. It gives no such explicit account of the tragic doings of Macbeth and Lady Macbeth as a certain other tone poem gives of the adventures of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. It has not the power for inducing a sustained mood in the listener that the work which stands next to it in point of time has—"Death and Transfiguration." If the tone poem theory had to stand or fall by this piece of music, it would be likely to go down. A dauntless composer kept on from "Macbeth" to that favorite of Mr. Fiedler's in the Strauss repertory, "A Hero's Life." R. Strauss, tone poem, for full orchestra "Macbeth," op. 23 (first time in Boston); G. Faure, suite from stage music to "Pelleas and Melisande," op. 80; Goldmark, overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13; Beethoven, Symphony in C minor, No. 5, op. 67.

There will be no Symphony concerts next week, as the orchestra is out of town on its fifth and last southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and on March 27 the only concert of the season will be given in Springfield.

* * *

THE BOSTON AMERICAN SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1911.

There will be no Symphony concerts next week as the orchestra is out of town on its fifth and last Southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York, and Brooklyn, and on Monday night, the 27th, the only concert of the season will be given in Springfield. This trip practically winds up the out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, for only two more will remain, one in New Bedford and one in Providence. The season which is now rapidly coming to its end is in every respect the most successful the orchestra has ever had.

SUNDAY GLOBE—MARCH 19, 1

Fifth Trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

There will be no Symphony concerts this week as the orchestra will be out of town on its fifth and last southern trip. The usual concerts will be given in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, New York and Brooklyn, and Monday night, March 27, the only concert of the season will be given in Springfield. This trip practically closes the out-of-town concerts of the orchestra, for only two more will remain, one in New Bedford and one in Providence.

When the general state of music in this country during the past winter is considered, the success which has attended without exception all the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra may be regarded as phenomenal.

Next week's program will include the

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1911

THE MUSIC OF YESTERDAY

YOUTHFUL STRAUSS AND PLAYFUL DONIZETTI

Strauss's "Macbeth," for the First Time Here, at the Symphony Concert—A Curiosity of Young Strength—Faure's Undeservedly Neglected Music to "Pelleas and Melisande"—Beethoven and Mr. Fiedler—The Pleasures of "Don Pasquale" as Fore-Piece to the Russian Dancers

By report Strauss has long regarded "Macbeth" as the hapless and neglected child among his tone-poems. It was the first piece that he wrote in the species when he was barely twenty-three. In a few years it was performed and applauded in sundry German cities. Meanwhile he was writing other, more interesting and more mature tone-poems that quickly displaced "Macbeth." It fell out of orchestral repertories; it lay on the shelf while conductors, the world over, were making speed to play its successors. It became "early Strauss" and it began to be treated as a curiosity. When conductors do play it, Strauss has complained, they spend no such pains upon it as they do upon "Zarathustia" or "Don Quixote." Therefore he repines and cherishes "Macbeth" only the more. Yet, as some prying cynics have noted, he does not include the piece in concerts of his music at which he himself conducts.

These auguries were fulfilled at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon when "Macbeth" was played for the first time in Boston or anywhere in America outside Chicago, where Theodore Thomas in the nineties discovered the piece. Mr. Fiedler had undertaken to rehearse it in three days, and the preparation had seemingly proved more exacting than he anticipated. The orchestra was plainly insecure in the music; it slipped audibly in the march; it fell into roughness of tone beyond even the roughness that Strauss is often seeking. The conductor himself was in none too good care. Time and again, when Strauss is most intricate in the other tone-poems, Mr. Fiedler has made the structure and the purely musical contents transparently clear, while at the same time he has abated not a whit of the delineative, the characterizing, the dramatizing, the dramatic and the emotional purpore. Now, "Macbeth," like all of Strauss's earlier tone-poems, is a masterful union of musical development and expressive significance. The musical structure is irreproachable; yet at every turn the music fulfills Strauss's "programmatic" design. Mr. Fiedler failed on both scores. He blurred the music as music; he did not discover much that it is to believe it would import. Moreover, as is usual with the conductor, when he is not at ease with himself, his music and his hand, excess came upon him. He oversped; he over-emphasized; he was content with mere vehemence of pass and sound. The whole piece seemed clouded.

It is difficult to characterize "Macbeth" heard in such circumstances. Strauss has not attempted to follow the course of Shakspeare's tragedy or to suggest particular scenes in it. He has ignored all Scottish suggestion; he is concerned with nothing in the play but Macbeth and, as incidental foil to him, Lady Macbeth. Macbeth is a rude warrior in a rude time; he is a strong man, loving power, consumed by ambition. Yet he is sensitive, too; he can be irresolute; he can fall into wild frenzies; he cherishes his wife, and her affection for him can play upon. All this Strauss tries to suggest in his musical ideas and in the development, contrast and culmination of them. After a few measures of introductory tumult Macbeth strides upon the musical scene, but with no such impression of an individualized and vivid figure in tones that the similar introduction of Don Juan and the Hero of "Heldenliben" yield. At due interval comes the warmer and gentler suggestion of Lady Macbeth. There is sinister music for the Macbeth consumed by scrupleless ambition; frenzied music for the Macbeth torn by fear and remorse; music for the Macbeth who would wreak his fury upon whatever object is nearest to him; softened music, as of Lady Macbeth, comforting yet goading, and a curious end that is as meditative lament for the dead warrior. He has worn himself out upon the tortures of his own spirit; the tragedy shall close in pity. The pervading atmosphere is sombre, ruthless, tumultuous. The trmpets scream; the wood-winds are hollow-voiced; the strings are sharp. Until the tranquil close it is wild music.

In spite of Strauss, the interest of "Macbeth," after twenty-five years, is an interest of curiosity. The music of the tone-poem spurs to wonder that at twenty-three Strauss could have written with such command of his means, such assurance of power and pliancy. Already he is master of his chosen form. He can invent his musical ideas significantly of the character and of the moods and the traits he can suggest. Out of those ideas, he ca nwrite music that evolves itself out of itself, that nowhere seems arbitrary or forced; and that yet follows exactly the course that he has set for it that summons the atmosphere in which he would clothe it. Already he can combine and contrast his musical ideas in a closely-knit and clearly suggestive poly phony. Already he is searching out an utilizing his resources of instrumental color. Already he can fire all his means to the desired end. "Macbeth" is a youthful town deforce.. A maturer Strauss would not be so unretrevedly sombre, so insistently strenuous, so resoultely wild. He would have given the music more varied and less persistently clanging voice. Yet, even then, he had the vitality that to this day drives "Macbeth" home. The tone-poem interests, holds stirs. The listener sits before it as he might sit befor the exercises of some senewy musical altitude who is conscious of the fullness and the suppleness of his strength, and who rejoices in all that he may acomplish with it. Perhaps the music of "Macbeth" is a little inhuman music. It is evidently made out of mind resolved to its task as to a feat. It is not sensuous. It lacks the humanity, the passion, the exaltation that were to come.

The rest of the concert traversed familiar ground. By this time, Debussy's opera, "Pelléas and Mélisande" has become so completely the accepted musical vesture for Maeterlinck's play that the incdental music of Fauré to the piece has fallen into undeserved neglect. Mr. Fiedler revived it yesterday, and the orchestra playd with due beauty of subdued tone and finesse of phrase. In a sense, it was easy to differentiate it from Debussy's. The opera follows the drama in its minutest course; it would read out of the hearts and the minds of the personages what they may not or dare not sepak, and the sum of these reiterated whisperings shall make its atmospheric quality. Fauré is concerned only with the general mood and mystery of the play. He approaches it as a piece of the theatre. Therefore he makes his music readily and wholly undersetandable; it has even its moments of obvious effect. He writes amply, he uses subdued instrumental colors; he seeks tenderness. His music is less of Maeterlinck's drama than of the moods it awakes in the spectators. It is written as though it would hold them within the play, while the curtain is lowered or prepare them in momentary pause for the special or the incdent that is to come. It is incidental music sublimated.

Thus far in the concert, the audience had listened with decorous interest and decorous applause. It had its unfeigned joy of all the rest of Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala" and of Beethoven's fifth symphony. It applauded theconductor at every pause, and after the overture, he called the band to his feet as part and parcel of his deservings. Goldmark's music holds its own well; and it is hard to believe that it was written in the sixties. It is still lush music, rich in melody, though it is a little sarrharine, warmly colored, of a certain richness, with a touch of display in it. It never puzzles; it is never austere, never mysterious. The ear sings deep into it. As hitherto this winter with Beethoven, Mr. Fiedler manipulated the fifth symphony little and so kept it in its own sufficient eloquence. The admiring Berlioz could not have complained of the transition from the scherzo to the finale. It was mysterious, expectant, thrilling when the due moment came. Mr. Fiedler had his joy of the rushing tumults of the finale; he emphasized to his heart's content the reiterated places of the slow movement; he spared not a contrast of the first allegra. His clarity opened Beethoven's music. His emphases were usually of it. H. T. P.

NEXT week, the Symphony Orchestra will make its final journey for the season to New York and the cities to the south that it regularly visits. Hence at home there will be no Symphony Concerts. The wandering singers and virtuosi have seemingly left us for the rest of the musical year; so that outside the orchestral and the choral concerts already appointed, only a few secondary concerts remain to complete it. Two of these befall next week—a recital by Charles Bennett at Jordan Hall on Tuesday evening and a concert by the Boston Singing Club and the Adamowski Trio at Chickering Hall on Wednesday evening.

ADVERTISER, TUESDAY MARCH 21, 19

SECOND CONCERT FOR SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

The second regular concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, April 9. Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, has volunteered to appear as soloist. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-Major No. 4. The second half of the programme will be devoted entirely to Wagner. The tickets will go on sale Friday, March 31.

RECORD, TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1911

SECOND CONCERT FOR SYMPHONY PENSION FUND

The second regular concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall on Sunday evening, April 9. Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, has volunteered to appear as soloist. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-Major No. 4. The second half of the programme will be devoted entirely to Wagner. The tickets will go on sale Friday, March 31.

BOSTON JOURNAL MARCH 21, 1911

Pension Fund Concert

The second regular concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, April 9. Josef Hofmann, the pianist, has volunteered to appear as soloist. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in C major, No. 4. The second half of the programme will be devoted entirely to Wagner.

BOSTON POST MARCH 22, 1911

Second Concert of Symphony Pension Fund

The second concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 9. Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, has volunteered to appear as soloist. He will play Beethoven's Concerto in G-major No. 4. The second half of the programme will be devoted entirely to Wagner. The tickets will go on sale Friday, March 31.

---

[137]

---

n Courant

ress Hartford Conn

FEB 28 1911

LAST CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY.

WAGNER'S MUSIC FOR THE FIRST TIME.

Mr. Busoni, Soloist, Recalled Seven Times.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY—A GREAT AUDIENCE.

The last of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at the Parsons Theater last evening before an audience huge in size and vehement in its expressions of approval. Mr. Fiedler was applauded to the echo, and Mr. Busoni, the soloist, had the unusual Hartford experience of being recalled some seven times to the platform. The program played was admirably constructed and the playing of orchestra and soloist alike was wonderfully effective.

The Weber Overture to "Euryanthe" was first on the program, and the reading was spirited in every measure. The strings, under the mute, were superb in tone color and the whole number appealed strongly to the audience. The symphony of the evening was the ever-welcome "Seventh," and Mr. Fiedler showed, for the first time in Hartford, his idea of its interpretation. He does not play the work in as "romantic" a manner as do some of his brothers in the art of conducting, but his reading serves to bring out all the splendors of the melodies and the glories of Beethoven's exquisite harmonies in this, one of the most gladsome of symphonies.

In the first movement last evening the beauty of the wood-winds' tones was especially noticed and the charm of the melody of the famous Allegretto proved as potent as ever. The climax in the third movement was of particularly tonal magnificence and the great applause that followed the conclusion of the work showed the audience's appreciation of Mr. Fiedler's reading and the orchestra's playing.

Mr. Busoni played the splendid E-flat major Concerto No. 1, with the orchestra and proved his title as a player of Liszt from the very first measures of the work. His tone is remarkably fine, his technical mastery of the score is complete, he plays with great charm of personality and with the ease of one whose art is certain. The familiar orchestral phrases that begin the work were beautifully played and then the solo instrument sang as richly and as beautifully in its part. The melodic passage over muted strings glittered brilliantly but still more sparkling was the solo playing after the advent of the triangle and the coming of the splendid tones of the undimmed strings. The playing to the climax was superb and it seemed as if the audience could not be induced to allow the smiling artist to make his final bow. Mr. Busoni made many friends in Hartford last evening who would welcome any opportunity to become better acquainted with his artistic excellence; he certainly demonstrated his abilities as a player with orchestra and his solo work, in its brilliant color and technique, made one wish for more of it.

For the first time this season Mr. Fiedler put Wagner's name on his program and the "Funeral Music" from the third act of "Gotterdaemerung" and "Wotan's Farewell' and the "Fire Music" from "Die Walkuere" were played to the intense satisfaction of the audience. The tremendousness of Wagner's power in crashing brass and the wondrous weaving of themes are always recognized by concert-audiences though the effects intended by the composer are not to be found in concert renditions of his works. The dramatic element always entered into Wagner's scheme of music and there is no drama in the tearing forth from a great orchestra of the tremendous mass of sound that goes to make up much of Wagner's music. But even in concert, without the benefits of dramatic and vocal aids to the orchestra's expression of the story, what a wonderful thing is the music that Wagner poured out in such rich profusion of sound. The themes shine brightly in their own beauty and strength as they are sounded alone, but in the weaving, the mingling, the harmonies and the dissonances, how much more splendid are they teo the ear! The playing last evening was wonderfully virile and strong, effective in every measure. The sonorous brasses of the orchestra were heard at their height of effectiveness and in the exquisite "Fire Music" the strings did their full share of fine work. Mr. Fiedler made no mistake in showing his abilities as a conductor of Wagner's music, nor in proving his orchestra's tonal possibilities to the utmost. There are many ardent music-lovers, who consider every great orchestral concert as a thing by no means to be missed, whose feelings will be all in gratitude to Mr. Fiedler should he favor Hartford with more of Wagner's music in the future than he has in the past.

HARTFORD, CONN.

FEB 27 191

Boston Orchestra Tonight.

The concert in the Parsons Theater tonight will be the last appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city this season. Max Fiedler will conduct and Ferruccio Bursoni, a piano virtuoso of world-wide fame, will be the soloist. The entertainment will long be remembered as a rare occasion and a large audience is expected. Patrons are requested to be seated early. Tickets of admission to the gallery may be obtained at J. M. Gallup & Co.'s music store during the day or at the box office of the theater. The doors will be open at 7:30 o'clock.

---

om HERALD

dress Washington, D. C.

te FEB 1 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The eminent Dutch soprano, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, is to be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the New National Theater, Tuesday afternoon, March 21, at 4:30 o'clock. Mme. Jomelli will sing as her first number the recitative and aria of Lia, from Debussy's opera, "The Prodigal Son." Her second number will be the vocal part of the "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde," which, with the prelude, will make the final number on the programme. The symphony will be Brahms' No. 1, in C minor, and the other orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

---

n

ress

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Dutch soprano, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, is to be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 21, at 4:30 o'clock. Mme Jomelli will sing as her first number the recitative and aria of Lia from Debussy's opera "The Prodigal Son." Her second number will be the vocal part of the "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," which, with the prelude, will make the final number on the program. The symphony will be Brahms' in C minor, No. 1, and the other orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

TIMES

ess Washington, D. C.

NATIONAL—Boston Symphony.

Mme. Jomelli, the admired Dutch soprano, will make her first appearance here as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its fifth and last concert, which will be given in the New National Theater next Tuesday afternoon, March 21, at 4:30 o'clock. She is down for two numbers. The first is the recitative and air of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," and her second is the vocal part in the Prelude and "Love Death" of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

The Wagner excerpt in which Mme. Jomelli takes part is the Prelude, to which is joined the dying scene of Isolde, which comes at the end of the third act of the music drama.

The symphony will be Brahms in C Minor, No. 1, a work, when it was published, that was dubbed by Van Buelow as the "tenth" symphony. This is one of Mr. Fiedler's favorites and he gives a striking interpretation of it.

The other number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," which is considered by many the best of his series of works of this character.

---

om TIMES

ldress Washington, D. C.

te MAR 12 1911

NATIONAL—Boston Symphony.

The eminent Dutch soprano, Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, is to be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the New National Theater Tuesday afternoon, March 21, at 4:30 o'clock.

Mme. Jomelli will sing as her first number the recitative and aria of Lia from Debussy's opera, "The Prodigal Son." Her second number will be the vocal part of the "Liebestod," from "Tristan and Isolde," which, with the prelude, will make the final number on the program. The symphony will be Brahms' in C Minor, No. 1, and the other orchestral number will be Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

EVENING SUN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 11 1911

SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT

Boston Orchestra To Play At Lyric March 22.

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 22. The program makes no provision for a soloist, because Mr. Witek, who was originally scheduled to play at the last concert, was put in by Mr. Fiedler at the fourth with the performance of the ninth symphony. This enables Mr. Fiedler to devote the entire program to Wagner.

The program will include the preludes to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde," and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 11 1911

Boston Symphony Comes For Last Time Wednesday

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 22. The program makes no provision for a soloist because Mr. Witek, who was originally scheduled to play at the last concert, was put in by Mr. Fiedler at the fourth with the performance of the Ninth Symphony. This enables Mr. Fiedler to devote the entire program to Wagner. Such a concert has not been given in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years, and should prove to be very attractive. The program will include the preludes to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde" and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

AMERICAN
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 12 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fact that Mr. Witek's engagement as soloist in the Baltimore series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was moved up from the fifth concert to the fourth leaves the final concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 22, without a soloist and enables Mr. Fiedler to carry out the purpose that he has had in mind for a long time to give Baltimore a program composed entirely of Wagnerian music. It is a number of years since such a program has been played here by the Boston Symphony, and unquestionably it will arouse the deepest interest.

The scheme of the program calls for the preludes to The Meistersingers of Nuremberg, Lohengrin and Parsifal; the prelude and finale to Tristan and Isolde, the Tannhaueser overture, the Siegfried Idyll and the funeral music from Goetterdammerung.

These selections cover the best of Wagner's different periods.

STAR
BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 11 1911

ALL WAGNERIAN MUSIC

Boston Symphony to Give an Unusual Treat Here.

The fact that Mr. Witek's engagement as soloist in the Baltimore series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was moved up from the fifth concert to the fourth leaves the final concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 22, without a soloist and enables Mr. Fiedler to carry out the purpose that he has had in mind for a long time to give Baltimore a program composed entirely of Wagnerian music. It is a number of years since such a program has been played here by the Boston Symphony, and unquestionably it will arouse the deepest interest.

The scheme of the program calls for the preludes to The Meistersingers of Nuremberg, Lohengrin and Parsifal; the prelude and finale to Tristan and Isolde, the Tannhaueser overture, the Siegfried Idyll and the funeral music from Goetterdammerung.

These selections cover the best of Wagner's different periods.

BALTIMORE, MD.
MAR 12 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE fact that Mr. Witek's engagement as soloist in the Baltimore series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was moved up from the fifth concert to the fourth leaves the final concert which will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening without a soloist and enables Mr. Fiedler to carry out the purpose he has had in mind for a long time to give Baltimore a program composed entirely of Wagnerian music. It is a number of years since such a program has been played here by the Boston Smyphony and unquestionably it will arouse the deepest interest.

The scheme of the program calls for the preludes to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the prelude and finale to "Tristan and Isolde," the "Tannhauser" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll" and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung."

These selections cover the best of Wagner's different periods.

TELEGRAPH
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MAR 11 1911

Music Notes.

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the operatic and oratorio contralto, will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season a week from Monday in the Academy.

PUBLIC LEDGER
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MAR 12 1911

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the admired English contralto, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens's ballad for contralto and orchestra, "The Drummer's Betrothed," and Adriano's great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott."

The orchestral numbers will comprise Schubert's great symphony in C major, Sibelius's symphonic poem "Finlandia" and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's suite in G major, No. 3, which includes the stirring Polacca with which this comes to an end.

EVE. BULLETIN
Philadelphia, Pa.
MAR 11 1911

Mme. Kirby-Lunn, the English contralto, is to be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens's ballad, "The Drummer's Betrothed," and an aria from Wagner's "Rienzi." The orchestral selections will comprise Schubert's C-major symphony, Sibelius's symphonic poem, "Finlandia," and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's Suite in G-major, No. 3.

INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the admired English contralto, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens' ballad for contralto and orchestra, "The Drummer's Betrothed," and Adriano's great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott."

The orchestral numbers will comprise Schubert's great symphony in C major, Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia," and the Theme and Variations from Tschaikowsky's Suite in G major, No. 3, which includes the stirring Polacca with which this comes to an end.

RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MAR 12 1911

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the admired English contralto, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens' ballad for contralto and orchestra, "The Drummer's Betrothed" and Adriano's great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott." The orchestral numbers will comprise Schubert's symphony in C major, Sibelius' symphonic poem "Finlandia" and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's suite in G major, No. 3, which includes the stirring

PRESS
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MAR 13 1911

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the admired English contralto, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens' ballad for contralto and orchestra, "The Drummer's Betrothed," and Adriano's great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott."

The orchestral numbers will comprise Schubert's great symphony in C Major, Sibelius' symphonic poem "Finlandia," and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's Suite in G Major, No. 3, which includes the stirring polacca with which this comes to an end.

EVE. JOURNAL
New York City.
MAR 10 1911

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 23, and the following Saturday afternoon. At the first concert Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven concerto. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme.

The orchestral numbers for the Thursday night concert comprise Brahms's symphony in C minor and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyll" and Beethoven's symphony in C minor.

EVE. GLOBE
New York City.
MAR 11 1911

The final pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, March 23, and Saturday afternoon, March 25. At the Thursday evening concert Anton Witek, new concert master of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto. Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. He will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Roccoco Theme." The orchestral numbers for Thursday comprise Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinée Saturday the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner, and Beethoven's symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Daily Citizen,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 11 1911

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 24. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Daily Times,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 11 1911

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 24. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven Concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

TOWN & COUNTRY
New York City
MAR 11 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February twenty-third and the following Saturday afternoon. The house was sold out some time in advance for both occasions. The chief orchestral features of the two programs were Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," and Schubert's seventh symphony, in C major, respectively. Strauss's tone poem consists of a long set of fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, as suggested by its title, and it further requires two solo performers for viola and violoncello parts. The latter were beautifully played by Mr. Ferir and Mr. Warnke, who are members of the orchestra. Strauss's work, as a whole, is of a style treatment belonging to the extreme period of his development in orchestral writing. Following this number on the program came Beethoven's seldom-played pianoforte concerto, in C minor, No. 3. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist. At the matinee concert he played Liszt's "Todtentanz," with orchestral accompaniment. This composition derives its name from Orgagna's fresco in the Campo Santo of Pisa, as it was here that Liszt derived his first impressions for his "Dance of Death." A complete mastery of pianoforte technique is required in its performance. It bristles with difficulties of a startling nature, both in effects of tonal color and speed. Mr. Busoni's playing of the work was satisfactory in every respect and of a dazzling virtuosity.

NEW YORK MAIL
FEB 11 19

The final concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra of this season will be given in Carnegie hall Thursday evening, March 23, and the following Saturday afternoon. Thursday evening the soloist will be Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, who will play the Beethoven concerto. Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a Roccoco theme.

The orchestral numbers for Thursday night include Brahm's symphony in C minor, Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The Siegfried Idyll and Beethoven's Fifth symphony will be given.

Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 11 1911

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 24. The soloist is to be Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven Concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

From
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y. LIFE
MAR 11 1911

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra dr a very large audience to the Academy of Music on Friday ev ning, Feb. 24. The program, beginning with Schubert's lo but exquisitely melodious symphony in C major, was re dered with that uniformity and perfect shading which plac this orchestra under its present leadership almost beyor criticism. The Schubert symphony was followed by Liszt Concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat No. 1 with Fe ruccio Busoni as the soloist. The latter's execution displaye consummate mastery while so perfectly attuned were th piano and orchestra that the former seemed as much a part the latter as any one of the violins.

WORLD,
New York City.
MAR 12 1911

Boston Symphony.

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1910-1911 will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 23, and Saturday afternoon, March 25. At the Thursday evening concert Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on A Roccoco Theme. The orchestral numbers for the Thursday night concert com prise Brahms's Symphony in C Minor No. 1, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and the Siegfried Idyll' and Beethoven's sym

om EVENIN' SUN
dress BALTIMORE, MD.
te MAR 11 1911

SYMPHONY'S FINAL CONCERT

Boston Orchestra To Play At Lyric March 22.

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 22. The program makes no provision for a soloist, because Mr. Witek, who was originally scheduled to play at the last concert, was put in by Mr. Fiedler at the fourth with the performance of the ninth symphony. This enables Mr. Fiedler to devote the entire program to Wagner.

The program will include the preludes to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde," and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

om ... VS
dress BALTIMORE, MD.
te ... 1911

Boston Symphony Comes For Last Time Wednesday

The final concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Lyric on Wednesday evening, March 22. The program makes no provision for a soloist because Mr. Witek, who was originally scheduled to play at the last concert, was put in by Mr. Fiedler at the fourth with the performance of the Ninth Symphony. This enables Mr. Fiedler to devote the entire program to Wagner. Such a concert has not been given in Baltimore by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for many years, and should prove to be very attractive. The program will include the preludes to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the prelude and finale of "Tristan and Isolde" and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung," the "Siegfried Idyl" and the "Tannhauser" overture.

om AMERICA
dress BALTIMORE, MD
te

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fact that Mr. Witek's engagement as soloist in the Baltimore series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was moved up from the fifth concert to the fourth leaves the final concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 22, without a soloist and enables Mr. Fiedler to carry out the purpose that he has had in mind for a long time to give Baltimore a program composed entirely of Wagnerian music. It is a number of years since such a program has been played here by the Boston Symphony, and unquestionably it will arouse the deepest interest.

The scheme of the program calls for the preludes to The Meistersingers of Nuremberg, Lohengrin and Parsifal; the prelude and finale to Tristan and Isolde, the Tannhaueser overture, the Siegfried Idyll and the funeral music from Goetterdammerung.

These selections cover the best of Wagner's different periods.

rom ... STAR
ddress BALTIMORE, MD.
ate

ALL WAGNERIAN MUSIC

Boston Symphony to Give an Unusual Treat Here.

The fact that Mr. Witek's engagement as soloist in the Baltimore series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was moved up from the fifth concert to the fourth leaves the final concert, which will be given in the Lyric Theater next Wednesday evening, March 22, without a soloist and enables Mr. Fiedler to carry out the purpose that he has had in mind for a long time to give Baltimore a program composed entirely of Wagnerian music. It is a number of years since such a program has been played here by the Boston Symphony, and unquestionably it will arouse the deepest interest.

The scheme of the program calls for the preludes to The Meistersingers of Nuremberg, Lohengrin and Parsifal; the prelude and finale to Tristan and Isolde, the Tannhaueser overture, the Siegfried Idyll and the funeral music from Goetterdammerung.

These selections cover the best of Wagner's different periods.

BALTIMORE, MD. SUN
MAR 12 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY

THE fact that Mr. Witek's engagement as soloist in the Baltimore series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was moved up from the fifth concert to the fourth leaves the final concert which will be given in the Lyric Theatre on Wednesday evening without a soloist and enables Mr. Fiedler to carry out the purpose he has had in mind for a long time to give Baltimore a program composed entirely of Wagnerian music. It is a number of years since such a program has been played here by the Boston Smyphony and unquestionably it will arouse the deepest interest.

The scheme of the program calls for the preludes to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," "Lohengrin" and "Parsifal," the prelude and finale to "Tristan and Isolde," the "Tannhauser" overture, the "Siegfried Idyll" and the funeral music from "Gotterdammerung."

These selections cover the best of Wagner's different periods.

ess TELEGRAPH
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Music Notes.

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the operatic and oratorio contralto, will be the soloist at the last Boston Symphony concert of the season a week from Monday in the Academy.

n PUBLIC LEDGER
dress PHILADELPHIA, PA.
te

• • •

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the admired English contralto, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens's ballad for contralto and orchestra, "The Drummer's Betrothed," and Adriano's great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott."

The orchestral numbers will comprise Schubert's great symphony in C major, Sibelius's symphonic poem "Finlandia" and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's suite in G major, No. 3, which includes the stirring Polacca with which this comes to an end.

rom EVE. BULLETIN
ddress Philadelphia, Pa.
ate

Mme. Kirby-Lunn, the English contralto, is to be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens's ballad, "The Drummer's Betrothed," and an aria from Wagner's "Rienzi." The orchestral selections will comprise Schubert's C-major symphony, Sibelius's symphonic poem, "Finlandia," and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's Suite in G-major, No. 3.

INQUIRER
ess Philadelphia, Pa.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the admired English contralto, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Acedemy of Music on Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens' ballad for contralto and orchestra, "The Drummer's Betrothed," and Adriano's great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott."

The orchestral numbers will comprise Schubert's great symphony in C major, Sibelius' symphonic poem, "Finlandia," and the Theme and Variations from Tschaikowsky's Suite in G major, No. 3, which includes the stirring Polacca with which this comes to an end.

RECORD
s

• • •

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the admired English contralto, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens' ballad for contralto and orchestra, "The Drummer's Betrothed" and Adriano's great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott." The orchestral numbers will comprise Schubert's symphony in C major, Sibelius' symphonic poem "Finlandia" and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's suite in G major, No. 3, which includes the stirring Polacca.

PRESS
ss TA.
911

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, the admired English contralto, will be the soloist at the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in the Academy of Music on Monday evening, March 20. She will sing two numbers, Saint-Saens' ballad for contralto and orchestra, "The Drummer's Betrothed," and Adriano's great aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "Gerechter Gott."

The orchestral numbers will comprise Schubert's great symphony in C Major, Sibelius' symphonic poem "Finlandia," and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's Suite in G Major, No. 3, which includes the stirring polacca with which this comes to an end.

om EVE. JOURNAL
ddress New York City.
te

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 23, and the following Saturday afternoon. At the first concert Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven concerto. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme.

The orchestral numbers for the Thursday night concert comprise Brahms's symphony in C minor and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyll" and Beethoven's symphony in C minor.

rom EVE. GLOBE
ddress New York City.
MAR 11 1911
ate

The final pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season will be given in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, March 23, and Saturday afternoon, March 25. At the Thursday evening concert Anton Witek, new concert master of the orchestra, will make his début in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto. Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. He will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Roccoco Theme." The orchestral numbers for Thursday comprise Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinée Saturday the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Siegfried Idyll," by Wagner, and Beethoven's symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Daily Citizen,
dress Brooklyn, N. Y.
te MAR 11 1911

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 24. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Daily Times,
ess Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 11 1911

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 24. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven Concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

Clipping Bureau in the World
TOWN & COUNTRY,
om New York City
dress
MAR 11 1911
te

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth pair of concerts at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, February twenty-third and the following Saturday afternoon. The house was sold out some time in advance for both occasions. The chief orchestral features of the two programs were Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," and Schubert's seventh symphony, in C major, respectively. Strauss's tone poem consists of a long set of fantastic variations on a theme of knightly character, as suggested by its title, and it further requires two solo performers for viola and violoncello parts. The latter were beautifully played by Mr. Ferir and Mr. Warnke, who are members of the orchestra. Strauss's work, as a whole, is of a style treatment belonging to the extreme period of his development in orchestral writing. Following this number on the program came Beethoven's seldom-played pianoforte concerto, in C minor, No. 3. Ferruccio Busoni was the soloist. At the matinee concert he played Liszt's "Todtentanz," with orchestral accompaniment. This composition derives its name from Orgagna's fresco in the Campo Santo of Pisa, as it was here that Liszt derived his first impressions for his "Dance of Death." A complete mastery of pianoforte technique is required in its performance. It bristles with difficulties of a startling nature, both in effects of tonal color and speed. Mr. Busoni's playing of the work was satisfactory in every respect and of a dazzling virtuosity.

...pping Bureau in the World
NEW YORK MAIL
s

The final concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra of this season will be given in Carnegie hall Thursday evening, March 23, and the following Saturday afternoon. Thursday evening the soloist will be Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, who will play the Beethoven concerto. Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, first 'cellist of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a Roccoco theme.

The orchestral numbers for Thursday night include Brahm's symphony in C minor, Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The Siegfried Idyll and Beethoven's Fifth symphony will be given.

ress Daily Eagle,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
MAR 11 1911

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 24. The soloist is to be Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven Concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

From
Address BROOKLYN, N. Y. LIFE

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra dr a very large audience to the Academy of Music on Friday ev ning, Feb. 24. The program, beginning with Schubert's lo but exquisitely melodious symphony in C major, was re dered with that uniformity and perfect shading which plac this orchestra under its present leadership almost beyon criticism. The Schubert symphony was followed by Liszt Concerto for piano and orchestra in E flat No. 1 with Fe ruccio Busoni as the soloist. The latter's execution displaye consummate mastery while so perfectly attuned were th piano and orchestra that the former seemed as much a part the latter as any one of the violins.

WORLD,
ss New York City.
MAR 12 1911

Boston Symphony.

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1910-1911 will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 23, and Saturday afternoon, March 25. At the Thursday evening concert Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Roccoco Theme. The orchestral numbers for the Thursday night concert comprise Brahms's Symphony in C Minor No. 1, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and the "Siegfried Idyll" and Beethoven's symphony in C minor No. 5.

om TRIBUNE

dress New York City.

MAR 12 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1910-11 will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 23, at 8:15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon, March 25, at 2:30 o'clock. At the Thursday evening concert Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven concerto. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme.

The orchestra numbers for the Thursday night concert comprise Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and the "Siegfried Idyll" and Beethoven's symphony in C minor, No. 5.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

m

ress

MAR 12 1911

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Das letzte Paar der diesjährigen Konzert-Serie des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters findet in Carnegie Hall am Abend des 23. resp. am Nachmittag des 25. März unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler statt. Am Donnerstag dirigirt Herr Fiedler die erste Brahms'sche Symphonie und Richard Strauß' Tonpoem „Don Juan". Am Samstag das „Meistersinger"-Vorspiel, das „Siegfried"-Idyll und Beethoven's Fünfte. Der Solist am Donnerstag Abend ist der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, Herr Anton Witek, der zu seinem New Yorker Debut das Beethoven'sche Violinkonzert gewählt hat. Der Solist der Samstag-Veranstaltung ist Herr Alwin Schroeder, einer der ersten Cellisten des Orchesters, der Tschaikowsky's „Variationen über ein „Rokoko-Thema" spielt.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

N. Y. AMERICAN

ss

MAR 12 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1910-1911 will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 23, at 8.15 o'clock, and Saturday afternoon, March 25, at 2.30 o'clock. At the Tuesday evening concert Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Roccoco Theme.

The orchestral numbers for the Thursday night concert comprise Brahm's Symphony in C minor No. 1, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyll," and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor No. 5.

SUN

ress New York City.

The final pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1910-11 will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 23, at 8:15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon, March 25, at 2:30 o'clock. At the Thursday evening concert Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, will make his début in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Roccoco Theme." The orchestral numbers for the Thursday night concert comprise Brahms's Symphony in C minor and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinée concert the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," and the "Siegfried Idyll" and Beethoven's fifth [illegible].

WORLD BROOKLYN EDIT.

New York City.

MAR 12 1911

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, will be given in the Academy of Music Friday evening, March 24. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

rom MORNING TELEGRAPH

ddress New York City

MAR 12 1911

ate

The final [illegible] concerts by the [illegible] Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1910-11 will be given in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, March 23, at 8.15 o'clock and Saturday afternoon, March 25, at 2.30 o'clock. At the Thursday evening concert Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra, will make his debut in New York as soloist, playing the Beethoven Concerto. At the Saturday afternoon concert the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, one of the principal 'cellists of the orchestra. Mr. Schroeder will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme.

The orchestral numbers for the Thursday night concert comprise Brahms' Symphony in C Minor, No. 1, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan," and for the matinee concert the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyll" and Beethoven's Symphony in C Minor, No. 5.

STANDARD UNION,

ess BROOKLYN, N. Y.

MAR 12 1911

Miss Margaret Mackie, pianos.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 24. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World," and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischutz."

SUN

ess New York City.

The final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music on Friday evening, March 24. The soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut in this capacity in Brooklyn, playing the Beethoven concerto. The symphony will be Dvorak's "From the New World" and the other orchestral numbers will be Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture and Weber's overture to "Der Freischütz."

ess

MAR 13 1911

The last of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn will take place Friday evening, March 24, in the Opera House of the Academy of Music. Max Fiedler will conduct, as usual, and the soloist will be Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra.

Daily Citizen,

ess Brooklyn, N. Y

MAR 18 1911

The interesting feature of the fifth and last Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn, which will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, will be the first appearance here as soloist of Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra. In Mr. Witek the Boston Symphony Orchestra is confident that it has an artist entirely equal to the task of perpetuating the traditions of the post of concert-master and a worthy successor to such men as Franz Kneisel and Willy Hess. Mr. Witek made a favorable impression in Boston last fall when he appeared as soloist with the orchestra, and it is believed that Brooklyn will take to him as kindly. Here, as in Boston, he will play the Beethoven Concerto.

Mr. Witek is a Czech, having been born at Saaz on Jan. 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennowitz, at Prague, and in 1894, at the age of 22, he was chosen concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America last fall. He commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos, by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini. Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European countries with the Danish pianist, Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek.

In 1907 Witek played in Berlin the newly-discovered violin concerto in A-Major of Mozart for the first time and in 1909 in the same city the newly-discovered violin concerto in C-Major of Haydn, also for the first time. His repertory includes twenty-seven concertos and seventy-five concert pieces, and his instrument is one of the most famous of the Stradivarius make.

The symphony will be Dvorak's No. 5 in E-Minor, "From the New World." It is this work which was one of the fruits of Dvorak's stay in this country twenty years ago, and no one who was interested in music at that time will forget the controversies it aroused as to its use of American (meaning negro or Indian) themes. That controversy has entered the limbo of other squabbles of its kind, but the world is the richer for this most melodious work.

The programme will begin with Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture, and will end with Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture.

NEW YORK MAIL

MAR 18 1911

ANTON WITEK,

Concert Master Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last pair of [illegible] by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season will occur Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie hall, and Friday evening in Brooklyn. The soloist Thursday and Friday evenings will be Anton Witek, the concert master, who will make his first appearance as soloist. He will play the Beethoven concerto, and the orchestral numbers of Thursday evening will be Brahms's C minor symphony and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan."

Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, will be the soloist on Saturday afternoon, when he will play the variations on a rococo theme by Tschaikowsky. Beethoven's Fifth symphony, the prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and the "Siegfried Idyll" will be the orchestral numbers.

In Brooklyn Mr. Witek will play the Beethoven concerto, and the orchestral numbers will be Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Brahms's Academic Festival overture and the overture to Weber's "Der Freischutz."

rom EVENING POST.

ddress New York City.

ate MAR 18 1911

Anton Witek, concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist at Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, playing the Beethoven concerto. Mr. Witek is a Czech, having been born at Saaz on January 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennewitz at Prague, and in 1894, at the age of twenty-two, he was chosen concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America last fall. He commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos (by Beethoven, Brahms, and Paganini). Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European countries with the Danish pianist Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek. His repertory includes twenty-seven concertos and seventy-five concert-pieces, and his instrument is one of the most famous of the Stradivarius make. The symphony of the evening will be Brahms's first, which will open the programme, and the concert will be ended by Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan." On Saturday afternoon, March 25, the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the justly admired artist who shares with Heinrich Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section. He will play Tchaikovsky's variations on a Rococo theme. The orchestral part of the programme will comprise Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers," the "Siegfried Idyl," and it will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

EVE. GLOBE

ess New York City.

MAR 18 1911

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces its final New York concerts this season for Tuesday evening, March 23, and Saturday afternoon, March 25, at Carnegie Hall. At the evening concert Brahms's C minor symphony (No. 1), Beethoven's violin concerto, and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan" make the programme, with Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, as soloist. At the matinée Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude and "Siegfried Idyll," Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," for 'cello and orchestra, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony make the programme, with Alwin Schroeder of the orchestra as soloist.

The American String [illegible]

Daily Eagle,

ess Brooklyn N. Y.

MAR 18 1911

One of the interesting features of the fifth and last Boston Symphony concerts in Brooklyn, to be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, March 24, is the first appearance here as soloist of Anton Witek, the new concert-master of the orchestra. In Mr. Witek, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is confident that it has an artist entirely equal to the task of perpetuating the traditions of the post of concert-master and a worthy successor to such men as Franz Kneisel and Willy Hess. He made a favorable impression in Boston, last fall, where he appeared as soloist with the orchestra, and it is believed that Brooklyn will receive him as kindly as did Boston. Here, as in Boston, he will play the Beethoven Concerto.

He is a Czech, having been born at Saaz on January 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennowitz at Prague and in 1894 was chosen concert-master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America, last fall. He commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos (by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini). Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European concerts with the Danish pianist, Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek. In 1907 he played in Berlin the newly discovered violin concerto in A-Major of Mozart for the first time, and in 1909, in the same city, the newly discovered violin concerto in G-Major, by Haydn, also for the first time. His repertory includes twenty-seven concertos and seventy-five concert pieces and his instrument is one of the most famous of the Stradivarius make.

The symphony will be Dvorak's No. 5 in E-Minor, from "The New World," which was one of the fruits of Dvorak's stay in this country twenty years ago; no one interested in music at that time is likely to forget the controversies it aroused as to its use of American (meaning, negro or Indian) themes. That controversy has entered the limbo of other squabbles of its kind, but the world is the richer for this most melodious work.

The programme will begin with Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture and will end with Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture.

EVE. SUN

ss New York City.

MAR [illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which came first last fall with Farrar and Melba, will take its leave of Manhattan at Carnegie Hall next week with two soloists from its own ranks. For the Thursday evening subscribers Conductor Fiedler has Brahms's First symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto, with Anton Witek, and Strauss's "Don Juan."

For the farewell Saturday matinée there are Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture, and "Siegfried Idyl," Tschaikowsky's 'cello variations, with Alwyn Schroeder, and Beethoven's Fifth symphony.

STANDARD UNION

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

MAR 18 1911

The fifth and last Boston Symphony concert here will take place next Friday evening, March 24, at the Academy of Music. Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra, will be the soloist.

WORLD

ess New York City.

MAR

[189]

From STANDARD UNION, BROOKLYN, N. Y.
Address
Date MAR 19 1911

The interesting feature of the fifth and last Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn, which will be given in the Academy of Music on next Friday evening, March 24, will be the first appearance as soloist of Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. In Mr. Witek the Boston Symphony Orchestra is confident that it has an artist entirely equal to the task of perpetuating the traditions of the post of concert master, and a worthy successor to such men as Franz Kneisel and Willy Hess. Mr. Witek made a favorable impression in Boston last fall when he appeared as soloist with the orchestra there, and it is believed that Brooklyn will take to him as kindly. Here, as in Boston, he will play the Beethoven concerto. Mr. Witek is a Czech, having been born at Saaz on Jan. 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennowitz at Prague, and in 1894, at the age of 22, he was chosen concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America last fall. He commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos (by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini). Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European countries with the Danish pianist Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek. In 1907 Witek played in Berlin the newly discovered violin concerto in A major of Mozart for the first time, and in 1909 in the same city the newly discovered violin concerto in C major of Haydn, also for the first time. His repertory includes twenty-seven concertos and seventy-five concert pieces, and his instrument is [illegible] the most famous of the Stradiv[illegible]ake. The symphony will be Dv[illegible]'s No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World." It is this work which was one of the fruits of Dvorak's stay in this co[illegible] twenty years ago, and no one who was interested in music at that time will forget the controversies it aroused as to its use of American (meaning negro or Indian) themes. That controversy has entered the limbo of other squabbles of its kind, but the world is the richer for this most melodious work. The programme will begin with Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture, and will end with Weber's "Der Freischutz" overture.

ANTON WITEK,
Concertmaster Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra.

From TIMES
New York City.
Date MAR 19 1911

ANTON WITCH
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CARNIGIE HALL

From TRIBUNE
Address New York City.
Date MAR 19 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The interesting feature of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday, at 8:15 p. m., will be the debut here of Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. He will play the Beethoven Concerto.

Mr. Witek is a Czech, having been born at Saaz on January 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennewitz at Prague, and in 1894, at the age of twenty-two, he was chosen concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America last fall. He commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos (by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini). Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European countries with the Danish pianist, Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek. In 1907 Witek played in Berlin the newly discovered violin concerto in A major of Mozart for the first time, and in 1909, in the same city, the newly discovered violin concerto in C major of Haydn, also for the first time. His repertory includes twenty-seven concertos and seventy-five concert pieces. His violin is a Stradivarius, one of the finest of that famous make.

The symphony of the evening will be Brahms's in C minor No. 1, which will open the programme, and the concert will be ended by Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan."

At the last matinee concert on next Saturday afternoon, March 25, the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who shares with Heinrich Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section. He will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme.

The orchestra part of the programme will be conservative. It will comprise Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyl," and will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

From TIMES
Address New York City.
Date MAR 19 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The feature of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday at 8:15 P. M., will be the début as soloist here of Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. He will play the Beethoven concerto.

Mr. Witek is a Czech, having been born at Saaz on Jan. 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennewitz at Prague, and in 1894, at the age of twenty-two, he was chosen concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America last Fall. He commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos—by Beethoven, Brahms, and Paganini. Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European countries with the Danish pianist, Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek. In 1907 Witek played in Berlin the newly discovered violin concerto in A major of Mozart for the first time, and in 1909, in the same city, the newly discovered violin concerto in C major of Haydn, also for the first time. His répertoire includes twenty-seven concertos and seventy-five concert pieces. His violin is a Stradivarius.

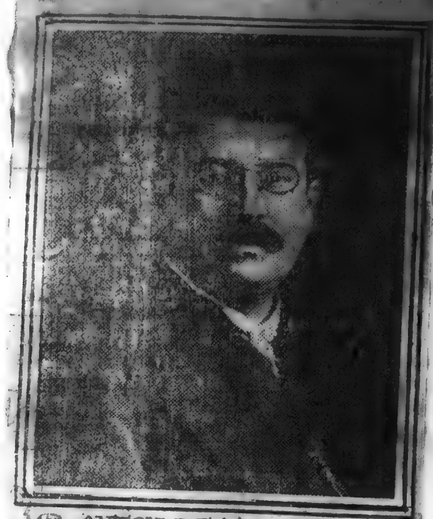
The symphony of the evening will be Brahms's in C minor, No. 1, which will open the programme, and the concert will be ended by Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan."

At the last matinée concert, on next Saturday afternoon, March 25, the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, who shares with Heinrich Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section. He will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme.

The orchestral part of the programme will be conservative. It will comprise Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyll," and it will be brought to an end by Beethoven's fifth symphony.

From YORK HERALD
Address
Date MAR 19 1911

Mr. Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston Orchestra, will make his début here



MR. ANTON WITEK SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CARNEGIE HALL.
GAHO PHOTO.

as soloist at the fifth and last evening concert of this organization this season, in Carnegie Hall next Thursday. He will play the Beethoven violin concerto. Mr. Witek is a Czech and was born in 1872. He studied the violin in Prague and was concert master of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra before he came to America. The symphony on Thursday will be Brahms' C minor, and the concert will end with Mr. Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

At the Saturday afternoon concert of the Boston Orchestra Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rocoso Theme." Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the Siegfried Idyl and Beethoven's fifth symphony make up the orchestral theme.

From WORLD
Address New York City.
Date MAR 19 1911

The interesting feature of the fifth and last Boston Symphony concert in Brooklyn, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, will be the first appearance here as soloist of Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. Mr. Witek is a Czech. He was born at Saaz Jan. 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennowitz at Prague, and in 1894, at the age of twenty-two, he was chosen concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America last fall. Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European countries with the Danish pianist, Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek. The symphony will be Dvorak's No. 5 in E minor "From the New World." It is this work which was one of the fruits of Dvorak's stay in this country twenty years ago. The programme will begin with Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture and will end with Weber's "Der Freischuetz" overture.

From WORLD
Address New York City.
Date MAR 19 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The interesting feature of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday will be the debut here of Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. Witek is a Czech, having been born at Saaz on Jan. 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennewitz at Prague, and in 1894, at the age of twenty-two, he was chosen concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America last fall. He commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos (by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini). Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European countries with the Danish pianist Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek. The symphony of the evening will be Brahms's in C minor No. 1, which will open the programme, and the concert will be ended by Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan." At the last matinee concert on next Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the justly admired artist who shares with Heinrich Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section. He will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a roocco theme. The orchestral part of the programme will be conservative. It will comprise Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyl," and it will be brought to an end by Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

From STAATS ZEITUNG
Address New York City.
Date MAR 9 1911

Symphonie-Konzerte.

Die letzten zwei Konzerte des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters finden in Carnegie Hall nächsten Donnerstag Abend resp. Samstag Nachmittag statt. Im ersten Konzert dirigirt Herr Fiedler Brahms' Erste Symphonie und Strauß' Tonpoem „Don Juan". Konzertmeister Herr Witek spielt das Beethoven-Konzert. Das Programm der Matinee umfaßt Wagner's Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern", das „Siegfried"-Idyll, Beethoven's Fünfte Symphonie, wozu der bekannte Cellist Herr Alwin Schroeder Tschaikowsky's „Variationen über ein Rokokothema" spielt.

From SUN
Address New York City.
Date MAR 19 1911

The interesting feature of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday at 8:15 P. M. will be the debut here of Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. Here as in Boston he will play the Beethoven concerto. The symphony of the evening will be Brahms's in C minor No. 1 which will open the programme and the concert will be ended by Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan." At the last matinée concert next Saturday afternoon, March 25, the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the justly admired artist who shares with Heinrich Warnke the first desk of 'cello section. He will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a Rococo theme. The orchestral part of the programme will be conservative. It will comprise Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" the "Siegfried Idyl," and it will be brought to an end by Beethoven's fifth symphony.

From WORLD
Address New York City.
Date MAR 9 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The interesting feature of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday afternoon, will be the debut here of Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. In Mr. Witek the Boston Symphony Orchestra is confident that it has an artist entirely equal to the task of perpetuating the traditions of the post of concert master and a worthy successor to such men as Franz Kneisel and Willy Hess. Mr. Witek made a very favorable impression in Boston last fall when he appeared as soloist with the orchestra there, and it is believed that New York will take to him as kindly. Here, as in Boston, he will play the Beethoven Concerto. The symphony of the evening will be Brahms's C minor, No. 1, which will open the programme, and the concert will be ended by Richard Strauss's tone-poem, "Don Juan." At the last matinee concert next Saturday afternoon, March 25, the soloist will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder. He will play Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme. The orchestral part of the programme will comprise Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" and the "Siegfried Idyl." It will end with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

From PRESS
New York City
MAR 19 1911

The interesting feature of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on next Thursday, in Carnegie Hall, will be the debut here of Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. In Witek the Boston Symphony Orchestra is confident it has an artist equal to the task of perpetuating the traditions of the post of concert master and a worthy successor to such men as Franz Kneisel and Willy Hess. Witek made a favorable impression in Boston last fall, when he appeared as soloist with the orchestra, and it is believed New York will take to him as kindly. Here, as in Boston, he will play the Beethoven Concerto.

The symphony of the evening will be Brahms's, in C minor, No. 1, which will open the programme, and the concert will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan."

In the last matinee concert, on next Saturday afternoon, March 25, the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the artist who shares with Heinrich Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section. He will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme.

The orchestral part of the programme is conservative. It will comprise Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

From EVE. WORLD
Address New York City.
Date MAR 21 1911

Schumann-Heink is to be the soloist at the Philharmonic Society's concert at Carnegie Hall this evening. She will sing arias from "Rienzi" and "Gotterdaemmerung." The orchestral programme, under Mr. Mahler if he is well enough, will include Beethoven's fifth symphony, which Mr. Volpe's young men played on Sunday afternoon and which the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Fiedler, is to play on Thursday night. It is strange to note how the spirit of the great master animates three modern conductors at the same time. The other numbers announced are Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel" [illegible] overture.

MORN. TELEGRAPH
New York City.
MAR 19 1911

NOTES OF THE MUSIC WORLD

The interesting feature of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday at 8.15 P. M., will be the debut here of Anton Witek, the new concertmaster of the orchestra. In Mr. Witek the Boston Symphony Orchestra is confident that it has an artist entirely equal to the task of perpetuating the traditions of the post of concertmaster and a worthy successor to such men as Franz Kneisel and Willy Hess. Mr. Witek made a very favorable impression in Boston last Fall when he appeared as soloist with the orchestra there, and it is believed that New York will take to him as kindly. Here as in Boston he will play the Beethoven concerto.

Mr. Witek is a Czech, having been born at Saaz, on January 7, 1872. He studied the violin under Anton Bennewitz at Prague and in 1894, at the age of 22, he was chosen concertmaster of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Berlin, the post he held until he came to America last Fall. He commanded attention in Germany in 1895 by his performance in one evening of three violin concertos by Beethoven, Brahms and Paganini. Since 1894 he has given concerts in all the European countries with the Danish pianiste, Vita Gerhardt, who is now Mrs. Witek. In 1907 Witek played in Berlin the newly discovered violin concerto in A major of Mozart for the first time, and in 1909 in the same city the newly discovered violin concerto in C major of Haydn, also for the first time. His repertory includes twenty-seven concertos and seventy-five concert pieces, and his instrument is one of the most famous of the Stradivarius make.

The symphony of the evening will be Brahms' in C minor, No. 1, which will open the programme, and the concert will be ended by Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan."

At the last matinee concert on next Saturday afternoon, March 25, the soloist will be Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the justly admired artist, who shares with Mr. Heinrich Warnke the first desk of 'cello section. He will play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme."

The orchestral part of the programme will be conservative. It will comprise Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the "Siegfried Idyl," and it will be brought to an end by Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony."

BOSTON HERALD, MARCH 21, 1911

The second concert in aid of the Pension Fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 9. Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, has volunteered to appear as soloist. He will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4. The second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner. Tickets will go on sale Friday, March 31.

BOSTON GLOBE MARCH 21, 1911.

The second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston symphony orchestra will be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, April 9. Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, has volunteered to appear as soloist and will play Beethoven's fourth concerto. The second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner.

RECORD, SATURDAY MARCH 25, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The particularly interesting feature of next week's Symphony concerts will be the first appearance in Boston of Miss Kathleen Parlow. Miss Parlow, although she had met with very flattering success in England and on the Continent, came to New York earlier this winter practically unheralded and made her first appearance there with the Russian Symphony Orchestra. Not since Mischa Elman first played in this country has there been such a unanimous chorus of approval as followed this young woman's debut. She was proclaimed at once one of the greatest women violinists that had ever been heard in New York and her following appearances there have only served to confirm this verdict.

ADVERTISER, SATURDAY MARCH 25, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The particularly interesting feature of next week's Symphony concerts will be the first appearance in Boston of Miss Kathleen Parlow. Miss Parlow, although she had met with very flattering success in England and on the Continent, came to New York earlier this winter practically unheralded and made her first appearance there with the Russian Symphony Orchestra. Not since Mischa Elman first played in this country has there been such a unanimous chorus of approval as followed this young woman's debut. She was proclaimed at once one of the greatest women violinists that had ever been heard in New York and her following appearances there have only served to confirm this verdict.

TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1911

As usual, when the season for concerts is drawing to a close, the Symphony Orchestra has the field almost to itself. It returns late this evening from the last of its monthly journeys this season to New York and resumes on Friday and Saturday next the regular course of its concerts here; while with it is to appear Kathleen Parlow, the new violinist, who in a single winter in America has risen very high in her profession. The remaining concerts of the week are those of the Hoffmann String Quartet at Sleeper Hall on Tuesday evening; Mrs. Tippett's at Chickering Hall on Monday evening, and Mr. Anthony's at Jordan Hall on Thursday afternoon.

/ / + / /

Symphony Hall: Symphony Orchestra

IN a single winter, in American concert-rooms, Georges Enesco has been discovered among the rising French composers and Kathleen Parlow among the rising violinists, and next week at the Symphony Concerts we in Boston may hear the music of the one and the playing of the other. Mr. Enesco is a Roumanian by birth and a violinist by profession, who has lived his adult life and made his reputation in Paris. In recent years, he has been less the violinist than the composer, and he has written symphonies, concerti, other orchestral pieces, and chamber music that have been heard and applauded in Paris and that are now making their way elsewhere. At mid-winter Mr. and Mrs. Mannes played here his sonata for pianoforte and violin, and it was the music of a composer who has an individual and a spirited voice. Later in the winter his Orchestral Suite was played in New York and warmly received. It is this piece, built upon Roumanian folk-tunes, but reared in very French fashion that Mr. Fiedler will play here. Miss Parlow, in turn, is the young violinist, who came to New York almost unheralded last autumn, and who has quickly made her way by the pure force of her own talents. She is in her twentieth year, a tall, slim Canadian girl; who studied in Europe with Auer and who gained her first reputation in England and in Germany. Here in America, in orchestral concerts and in recitals of her own, she has proved herself a remarkable violinist—a mistress of the technique of her instrument, who commands the secrets of tone, who is sensitive to musical design, who is quick of responsive emotion. Since Mr. Elman came first to America, no violinist has been so well received. Enesco's suite will begin the two Symphony Concerts; Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin, with Miss Parlow will continue them; Schumann's symphony in D minor will end them, and Mr. Fiedler's Schumann has usually been good to hear.

On Thursday evening, in Sanders Theatre, the Symphony Orchestra will continue its series of concerts in Cambridge, with Brahms's symphony in C minor and Goldmark's glowing overture to "Sakuntala" for the purely orchestral numbers of the programme. Between them stands Grieg's concerto in A minor for pianoforte and orchestra, with Miss Overstreet, a protégée of Colonel Watterson, to play the solo part.

Friday afternoon, April 14, in Symphony Hall, the first performance here in years of Bach's Passion Music according to St. Matthew, one of the supreme masterpieces of choral music, with the chorus of the Cecilia, a choir of boys, the Symphony Orchestra, Mmes. Zimermann and Spencer and Messrs. Bispham and Hamlin for solo singers, and Mr. Fiedler conducting.

Sunday evening, April 9, in Symphony Hall, the second of the annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund. The programme will consist mainly of the music of Wagner, and Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, whom Boston re-discovered last autumn, has volunteered his assistance.

TRAVELER, SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The interesting feature of next week's Symphony concerts will be the first appearance in Boston of Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist. Miss Parlow, although she has met with very flattering success in England and on the continent, came to this country this winter and made her debut in New York with the Russian Symphony Orchestra practically unheralded. Not since Mischa Elman made his first appearance in this country has any violinist created such a stir. Here Miss Parlow will play the Tschaikowsky concerto, the one in which Elman made his Boston debut. Mr. Fiedler places on his programme a novelty in the form of a suite by Georges Enesco. The other and final number on the programme will be Schumann's symphony in D minor, No. 4.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Wagner will predominate in the programme which Mr. Fiedler will arrange for the second pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 9. The soloist, as already announced, will be Josef Hofmann, and he will play Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major. The second half of the programme will be devoted entirely to Wagner.

MONITOR, BOSTON, MARCH 25, 1911.

NOTES.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, will be the soloist at the symphony concerts of March 31 and April 2. Miss Parlow, like Mischa Elman, is a pupil of Leopold Auer, the great Russian master of the violin. She is a native of Calgary, Alberta, Canada, where she was born 19 years ago. She made her first appearance in London in the spring of 1905. The work in which she makes her first Boston appearance is the Tschaikowsky violin concerto. There will be a new suite by Georges Enesco, a Roumanian, who works with the young Paris independents. The symphony will be Schumann's No. 4, in D minor.

Wagner will predominate in the program of the second pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra to be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, April 9. The soloist will be Joseph Hofmann, pianist, who will play Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major.

The seventh Symphony concert in Sanders theater, Harvard University, will be given Thursday evening, March 30. The soloist will be Miss Corneille Overstreet, pianist, who will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. The first number on the program will be Brahm's symphony No. 1 in C minor and the last number Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala." At the last concert, on April 27, the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder.

The combined forces of the Cecilia society and the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Friday, April 14, will perform Bach's passion music. Mr. Fiedler has made cuts in the work so as to bring its performance within two hours. The soloists will be Mme. Marie Zimmerman, soprano; Miss Janet Spencer, contralto; George Hamlin, tenor, and David Bispham, bass. There will be a full chorus of 175, full orchestra and a boy choir of 50.

Josef Hofmann, the pianist, will assist the Boston Symphony orchestra at the second pension fund concert April 9. He will play Beethoven's piano concerto in G major, No. 4. Outside of Mr. Hofmann's number the program will be entirely Wagnerian.

SUNDAY POST, MARCH 26, 1911

PARLOW WITH SYMPHONY

The debut here at this week's Symphony concerts of Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist of whom so much has been heard recently, will serve to give a fillip to the interest of the dying season. When the list of soloists for the season was made out last spring, although it was known that Miss Parlow was coming to America, her name was not included therein; but so astonishing has been her success in New York, comparable only with that which Mischa Elman enjoyed when he first came to America, that Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, has especially engaged Miss Parlow. She is from Calgary, in the Province of Alberta, Canada, and she is 19 years of age. She made her appearance in London in the spring of 1905, when not yet 14, and made such a deep impression with various ladies of the court that they enabled her to continue her education. The following season Miss Parlow played once or twice in London, and then under the patronage of Queen Alexandra, went to St. Petersburg, where she finished her preparatory work under Auer. Two years ago she started her career as a virtuosa and made everywhere in Germany and England and Russia an extraordinary success. Earlier this season, quite unheralded, and known only to the comparative few who follow closely the progress of music on the other side, she came to New York and made her debut with the Russian Symphony Society. Next Friday Miss Parlow will play the Tschaikowsky concerto. The first number on the programme will be a novelty by the Rumanian, Georges Enesco.

Last Concert of Cecilia-Symphony

More than usual interest is being shown in the last concert of the combined forces of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when on Good Friday, April 14, Bach's Passion music will be sung. Mr. Fiedler has made cuts in the work so as to bring its performance within two hours. As is always the case on Good Friday, there will be no Symphony rehearsal that afternoon, the rehearsal being given on the day before—Thursday, the 13th. The soloists have been carefully chosen for their difficult tasks. Marie Zimmerman will be the soprano; Janet Spencer, the contralto; George Hamlin, the tenor, and David Bispham, the basso. There will be a full chorus of 175, a full orchestra and there will be also a boy choir of 50.

Pension Fund Concert

Wagner will predominate in the programme which Mr. Fiedler will arrange for the second Pension Fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 9. The soloist, as already announced, will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who has proffered his services for the event, and he will play Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 in G-major. This will be preceded probably by one of Beethoven's overtures. The second half of the programme will be devoted entirely to Wagner. As not much Wagner has been heard here this year such a programme will be more than cordially welcome.

BOSTON JOURNAL MARCH 26, 191

Miss Parlow as the Symphony Soloi

The debut here at this week's Symphony concerts of Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist of whom so much has been heard recently will serve to give a flip to the interest of the dying season. When the list of soloists for the season was made out last spring it was known that Miss Parlow was coming to America and her name was not included but so astonishing has been her success in New York, comparable only with that which Mischa Elman enjoyed when he first came to America, Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, specially engaged her to appear. She will play the Tschaikowsky concerto.

The first number on the program will be a novelty by the Roumanian, Georges Enesco, whose name appears on a Symphony program for the first time. The other number on the program will be Schumann's symphony in D minor, No. 4.

Pension Fund Concert

Wagner will predominate in the program which Mr. Fiedler is arranging for the second pension fund concert of the Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall Sunday evening, April 9. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play Beethoven's piano concerto No. 4, in G-major. This will be preceded probably by one of Beethoven's overtures. The second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner.

Bach's Passion Music

The last concert of the combined forces of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra will be given on Good Friday, April 14, when Bach's Parisian Music will be sung. Marie Zimmerman will be the soprano, Janet Spencer the contralto, George Hamlin the tenor and David Bispham the bass. There will be a full chorus of 175, a full orchestra and a boy choir of fifty.

HERALD, BOSTON, MARCH 26, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCESTRA.

The debut here at his week's Symphony concerts of Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, of whom so much has been heard recently, will serve to give a fillip to the interest of the dying season. When the list of soloists for the season was made out last spring it was known that Miss Parlow was coming to America and her name was not included, but so astonishing has been her success in New York, comparable only with that which Mischa Elman enjoyed, when he first came to America, that Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, specially engaged her to appear. Miss Parlow, so to say, is the artistic sister of Elman, for she, too, is a pupil of Leopold Auer, the great Russian master. Hearing Elman, when he was giving his first concert in London, decided Miss Parlow to go to St. Petersburg, where she studied for several years. Miss Parlow is a native of Calgary, in the province of Alberta, Can. She made her appearance in London in the spring of 1905, when she was not yet 14, and made such a deep impression with various noble dames there that hey enabled her to continue her education. The following season she played once or twice in London and then, under the patronage of Queen Alexandra, she went to St. Petersburg, where she finished her preparatory work under Auer. Two years ago she started her career as a virtuoso and made everywhere in Germany and England and Russia an extraordinary success. Earlier this season, quite unheralded, she came to New York and made her debut, with the Russian Symphony Society. The next day musical New York knew that a great violinist had arrived. Since then she has played in New York a number of times and whether it has been a concerto by Tschaikowsky, Brahms, Beethoven, Mendelssohn or Bruch, or whether it has been in recital, the same success has been her fortune.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Wagner will predominate in the program which Mr. Fiedler will arrange for the second pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 9. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, who has proffered his services for the event, and will play Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 in G major. This will be preceded probably by one of Beethoven's overtures. The second half of the program will be devoted en-

CECILIA AND SYMPHONY.

More than usual interest is shown in the last concert of the combined forces of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony orchestra, when on Good Friday, April 14, Bach's Passion Music will be sung. Mr. Fiedler has made cuts in the work so as to bring its performance within two hours. As is always the case on Good Friday there will be no Symphony rehearsal that afternoon. The rehearsal will be given on the day before—Thursday, the 13th. The soloists will be Marie Zimmerman, Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham. There will be a full chorus of 175, a full orchestra and there will be also a boy choir of 50.

SYMPHONY IN CAMBRIDGE.

The seventh and last but one Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Harvard University, will be given next Thursday evening, March 30. The soloist will be Miss Corneille Overstreet, pianist. She will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. The first number on the program will be Brahms's symphony No. 1 Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala." At the last concert on April 27 the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder of the orchestra.

[191]

JOURNAL
H 26, 1911.

...as the
...ymphony Soloist
...of this week's Symof Kathleen Parlow, the violinist of whom so
...en heard recently will
...ve a fillip to the interest of
...ason. When the list of
...e season was made out
...was known that Miss
...coming to America and her
...not included but so astonish-
...en her success in New York,
...only with that which
...an enjoyed when he first
...erica, Mr. Ellis, the man-
...orchestra, specially engaged
...ar. She will play the Tschai-
...to.
...mber on the program will
...by the Roumanian,
...esco, whose name appears
...phony program for the first
...other number on the pro-
...be Schumann's symphony in
...No. 4.

...sion Fund Concert

...will predominate in the pro-
...ich Mr. Fiedler is arranging
...cond pension-fund concert of
...ony Orchestra, to be given
...ny Hall Sunday evening,
...he soloist will be Josef Hof-
...o will play Beethoven's piano
...No. 4, in G-major. This will
...ed probably by one of Beet-
...ertures. The second half of
...m will be devoted entirely to

...h's Passion Music

...concert of the combined
...the Cecilia Society and the
...ymphony Orchestra will be ...Good Friday, April 14, when
...risian Music will be sung.
...merman will be the soprano,
...ncer the contralto, George
...tenor and David Bispham
...There will be a full chorus
...ull orchestra and a boy choir

D, BOSTON,
CH 26, 1911.

YMPHONY ORCESTRA.
...here at his week's Sym-
...ts of Kathleen Parlow, the
...ian violinist, of whom so
...been heard recently, will
...a fillip to the interest of
...ason. When the list of
...e season was made out
...was known that Miss Par-
...ming to America and her
...included, but so astonish-
...her success in New York,
...only with that which Mischa
...d when he first came to
...Mr. Ellis, the manager
...ra, specially engaged her
...Parlow, so to say, is
...of Elman, for she, too,
...Leopold Auer, the great
...Hearing Elman, when
...his first concert in Lon-
...Miss Parlow to go to St.
...here she studied for sev-
...Parlow is a native of
...province of Alberta,
...her appearance in Lon-
...of 1905, when she was
...made such a deep im-
...rious noble dames there
...ed her to continue her
...following season she
...twice in London and
...patronage of Queen
...went to St. Petersburg,
...her preparatory work
...o years ago she started
...a virtuoso and made
...Germany and England
...extraordinary success.
...son, quite unheralded,
...w York and made her
...Russian Symphony So-
...day musical New York
...at violinist had arrived.
...as played in New York
...es and whether it has
...by Tschaikowsky,
...en, Mendelssohn or
...it has been in recital,
...has been her fortune.

...UND CONCERT.
...dominate in the pro-
...Fiedler will arrange for
...n fund concert of the
...ra in Symphony Hall
...April 9. The solo-
...Hofmann, the distin-
...who has proffered his
...cvent, and will play
...rto No. 4 in G major.
...ded probably by one
...ertures. The second
...m will be devoted en-

...D SYMPHONY.
...interest is shown in
...the combined forces
...iety and the Boston
...ra, when on Good Fri-
...'s Passion Music will
...ler has made cuts in
...ring its performance
...is always the case
...will be no Sym-
...afternoon. The re-
...on the day before
...The soloists will
...Janet Spencer,
...David Bispham.
...rus of 175, a full
...will be also a boy

...N CAMBRIDGE.
...but one Sym-
...Theatre, Har-
...be given next
...The soloist
...erstreet, pian-
...concerto in A
...on the pro-
...ymphony No. 1
...kuntala." At
...soloist
...of the orches-

SUNDAY GLOBE—MARCH 26, 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

New Composers on the Symphony Program.

Season of Opera in English by the Aborn Company.

Concerts and Recitals—Current Gossip.

The program of the Symphony orchestra this week announces two names which are new to its concerts—George Enesco, the young Roumanian composer, and Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, both of whom have arisen to prominence in New York this winter.

Mr Enesco's suite for orchestra, op. 9, will be played for the first time in Boston; Miss Parlow will make her first appearance in this city, in Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major, No. 2.

Although a Roumanian, born at Cordaremi Aug 7, 1881, Enesco has passed the greater part of his life in, and owes his musical education to, Paris. He carried off the first prize for fugue and counterpoint at the Paris conservatory in 1897 and a first prize for violin two years later. Faure was his teacher in composition.

He wrote his "Roumanian Poem" for orchestra at this period, which was played in public. It was played in Boston by Mr Longy and the Orchestral club Jan 7, 1902, for what was probably the first time in America.

He has composed in large and small forms. A number of his works for orchestra have been brought out in Paris at the Colonne concerts.

His symphonie for two flutes, oboe, english horn, two clarinets, two horns and two bassoons was played for the first time in Boston by the Longy club Feb 8, 1909, and by the Barrere ensemble in New York the past season.

In their first recital here this year, Dec 13, Clara and David Mannes played his sonata for violin and piano in F minor (op. 6), for the first time in America. The symphony in E flat was brought out by Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony society the fifth of last month for the first time in this country. It is in three instead of the orthodox four movements, and was found to bear the traits of the modern French school in the use of color.

The new suite to be played here this week was given its first hearing in America Jan 3 of this year by Gustav Mahler and the New York Philharmonic society. The score is dedicated to Camille Saint-Saens. It begins with a prelude for the string choir in unison, which is followed by a slow minuet, a slow intermezzo and a brilliant finale. A solo violin and solo violoncello are employed in the latter.

Enesco is said to play the violin and the piano equally well. He now holds the position of court violinist to Queen Elizabeth of Roumania, a patroness of music and literature. She is said to have been a pupil of Rubinstein and Clara Schumann, to have composed symphonies and other orchestral pieces, and an opera, "Master Manole," and to have written more than 30 books. The queen is also said to play the organ and the harp, and to conduct orchestral concerts in the palace at Bucharest.

Kathleen Parlow made her first appearance in this country the first of last December with the Russian symphony orchestra, New York, in the Tschaikowsky concerto which she will play here.

Miss Parlow is a Canadian by birth. Her career began 15 years ago. She was then 5 years old, and fondled her first violin as most children do their dolls. She began study at once, and at 7 she was giving three concerts in a year in San Francisco, whither her family had moved. Her programs were nothing if not pretentious, for even then she was playing Bach's chaccone.

A rich patroness sent her to England to study. When 15 she heard Elman play and immediately wanted to study with his teacher, Auer, of the St Petersburg conservatory.

Again a friend made it possible, and with her mother she went to St Petersburg, where she spent nearly three years. She knew Glazunow and played his concerto under his direction at Ostend. Miss Parlow has toured through Germany, Holland and Belgium. The New York reviewers have praised her playing with unusual ardor.

The program on Friday and Saturday will include Schumann's symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120.

Cambridge Symphonies.

The seventh and last but one Symphony concert in Sanders theatre will be given next Thursday evening. The soloist will be Miss Corneille Overstreet, a pianist of whom most flattering things are said. She will play Grieg's concerto in A minor. The first number on the program will be Brahms' symphony No. 1 in C minor, and the last number will be Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala." At the last concert, April 27, the soloist will be Mr Alwin Schroeder of the orchestra.

Pension Fund Concert.

Wagner will predominate in the program for the second pension fund concert of the Symphony orchestra, to be given in Symphony hall Sunday evening, April 9. The soloist, as already announced, will be Josef Hofman, the distinguished pianist, who has proffered the concert of the combined forces of the Cecilia society and the Boston symphony orchestra, when on Good Friday April 14, Bach's "Passion Music" will be sung. Mr Fiedler has made cuts in his services, and will play Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major. This will be preceded probably by one of Beethoven's overtures. The second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner.

Cecilia-Symphony Concert.

Interest is being shown in the last the work so as to bring its performance within two hours. As is always the case on Good Friday there will be no symphony rehearsal that afternoon, the rehearsal being given on the day before. The soloists chosen are Marie Zimmerman soprano, Janet Spencer contralto, George Hamlin tenor and David Bispham basso. There will be a chorus of 175, a full orchestra and a boy choir of 50.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN
SUNDAY, MARCH 26, 1911.

GIRL VIOLINIST.

Kathleen Parlow of Canada to Play at Symphony.

The debut here at this week's Symphony concerts of Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist of whom so much has been heard recently, will serve to give a fillip to the interest of the dying season. When the list of soloists for the season was made out last Spring it was known that Miss Parlow was coming to America and her name was not included, but so great has been her success in New York that Mr. Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, specially engaged her to appear.

Miss Parlow, so to say, is the artistic sister of Elman, for she, too, is a pupil of Leopold Auer, the great Russian master, who was the artistic sponsor for Elman.

She made her appearance in London in the Spring of 1905 when she was not yet fourteen and made such a deep impression with various great ladies of the court there that they enabled her to continue her education. The following season she played once or twice in London and then under the patronage of Queen Alexandra she went to St. Petersburg, where she finished her preparatory work under Auer.

Two years ago she started her career as a virtuosa and made everywhere in Germany and England and Russia an extraordinary success.

The second regular concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Symphony Hall on Sunday evening, April 9. Josef Hofman, the distinguished pianist, has volunteered to appear as soloist. He will play Beethoven's concerto in G major, No. 4. The second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner. The tickets will go on sale Friday, March 31.

More than usual interest is being shown in the last concert of the combined forces of the Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when on Good Friday, April 14. Bach's Passion Music will be sung. Mr. Fiedler has made cuts in the work so as to bring its performance within two hours. As is always the case on Good Friday, there will be no Symphony rehearsal that afternoon, the rehearsal being given the day before—Thursday, the 13. The soloists have been admirably chosen. Marie Zimmerman will be the soprano, Janet Spencer, the contralto, George Hamlin, the tenor and David Bispham, the basso. There will be a full chorus of one hundred and seventy-five, a full orchestra and there will be also a boy choir of fifty.

TRANSCRIPT, MONDAY,
MARCH 27, 1911

News of Music

THE Symphony Orchestra has nearly ended its concerts for the year, in other cities than Boston. Visits to Springfield, Providence and New Bedford remain, but otherwise the field is clear for the five pairs of concerts that remain here and for which Mr. Fiedler, like his predecessors, has reserved some of his new music that reuires assiduous preparation. In New York, on Saturday afternoon, at the final concert of the season in that city, Mr. Schroeder, ill with the grip, was unable to play Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rocco Theme" for violoncello and orchestra, as he had been announced to do. At short notice, Mr. Witek was substituted as the "soloist," and in Paganini's concerto in D, he gave new proof, according to the Times, of his beautiful and penetrating tone, his vigorous, delicate and fluent bowing, and his entire self-concentration. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony ended the concert, and the reviewers seem more minded to praise the orchestra than the conductor in it.

BOSTON POST,
MARCH 28, 1911

SPRINGFIELD HEARS SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Symphony Orchestra, which returned from New York late Saturday evening, went to Springfield yesterday afternoon to give its only concert of the year there and returned to town by special train immediately after the concert. Arrangements have been made whereby Madame Carolina White, who is to be the soloist in Boston on April 7 and 8, will be the soloist with the orchestra at its last concert in Providence on Tuesday evening, April 4.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
MARCH 28, 1911.

The Symphony orchestra went to Springfield Monday afternoon to give its only concert of the year there and returned to town by special train immediately after the concert. Arrangements have been made whereby Mme. Carolina White, who is to be the soloist in Boston on April 7 and 8, will be the soloist with the orchestra at its last Providence concert on Tuesday, April 4.

NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE, SUNDAY, MARCH 26, 1911

MUSICAL COMMENT

The Philharmonic Society's Sixty-ninth Season—The Status in the Affairs of the Society.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

With last Friday's concert the sixty-ninth season of the Philharmonic Society came to an end. Perhaps it would be better to say the sixty-ninth series of subscription concerts, for the orchestra as now administered has still an engagement to give a concert in co-operation with the Wage Earners' League, next Sunday, and will give concerts this week in Princeton and Washington. No doubt other opportunities offer to give public performances elsewhere they will be accepted. We are concerned more particularly now, however, with the local season. As originally planned this began on November 1, and was to comprise sixteen Tuesday evening subscription concerts, as many Friday afternoon meetings, at which the Tuesday programme was to be repeated; eight Sunday afternoon concerts in the Borough of Manhattan, and five Sunday afternoon concerts in the Borough of Brooklyn. These were all given, together with two extra concerts in each of the two boroughs—forty-nine concerts in all. The orchestra's activities outside of the city, counting in the two concerts still to be given, include three concerts in Washington, two in Princeton and one each in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Syracuse, Rochester, Utica, Newark, Philadelphia, Springfield (Mass.) and Hartford. The programmes of the out-of-town concerts were made up of works previously played here, and need not concern us. The local list affords abundant food for study, because of its evidence of a strenuous endeavor to reach what the management obviously conceived to be the popular taste. It is therefore set forth herewith in full. Comment might profitably follow, but since this review is concerned only with facts, it may be withheld at least for the present.

Composer.	Composition.	Times performed.
Bach-Mahler	Suite in B minor and D	3
Beethoven	Overture, "Egmont"	1
Beethoven	Overture, "König Stephan"	2
Beethoven	Overture, "Coriolan"	2
Beethoven	Overture, "Leonore, No. 3"	2
Beethoven	Pianoforte concerto in E flat	2
Beethoven	Symphony 3, "Eroica"	1
Beethoven	Symphony 5, C minor	2
Beethoven	Symphony 6, "Pastoral"	2
Beethoven	Symphony No. 7, A major	4
Berlioz	Instrumental movements from "La Damnation"	1
Berlioz	Instrumental movements from "Romeo et Juliet"	3
Bizet	Suite No. 1, "L'Arlésienne"	3
Bizet	Suite, "Roma"	2
Bossi	"Intermezzi Goldoniani"	2
Brahms	Symphony No. 1, C minor	2
Bruch	Violin concerto in G minor	1
Busoni	"Berceuse élégiaque"	2
Chabrier	Rhapsody, "Espana"	2
Chabrier	"Ode à la Musique"	2
Chadwick	Overture, "Melpomene"	2
Cherubini	Overture, "Anacreon"	2
Debussy	"Rondes de Printemps"	2
Debussy	"Iberia"	3
Dvorak	Overture, "Carneval"	3
Dvorak	Symphony, "From the New World"	4
Elgar	Variations on an original theme	2
Elgar	Songs, "Sea Pictures"	2
Enesco	Suite, Op. 9	2
Glazounow	Tableau musical, "Le Printemps"	1
Goldmark	Concerto for violin, A minor	1
Goldmark	Overture, "Im Frühlingstime"	1
Goldmark	Overture, "Sakuntala"	1
Grieg	Suite, "Peer Gynt" No. 1	1
Grieg	Suite, "Sigurd Jorsalfar"	1
Grieg	Cantata, "At the Cloister Gate"	1
Hadley	Symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay"	2
Lalo	Aubade (song) from "Le Roi d'Ys"	3
Lalo	Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys"	1
Liszt	Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"	1
Liszt	Symphonic poem, "Tasso"	1
Liszt	"Mephisto Waltz"	1
Loeffler	"La Villanelle du Diable"	2
MacDowell	Concerto No. 2 for pianoforte	1
MacDowell	Symphonic fragment, "Die Sarazenen"	2
MacDowell	Symphonic fragment, "Die schöne Alda"	2
Mahler	Symphony in G	3
Mahler	Three songs with orchestra	3
Massenet	Air from "Le Mage"	3
Massenet	Air from "Manon"	3
Mendelssohn	Italian Symphony	3
Mendelssohn	Overture, "Die schöne Melusine"	2
Mendelssohn	Overture, "Fingal's Cave"	2
Mendelssohn	Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	2
Mendelssohn	Concerto for violin	1
Mozart	Symphony in G minor	2
Mozart	Divertissement	3
Pfitzner	Overture, "Wandlung und Vollbronn"	2
Rimsky-Korsakow	"Scheherazade"	1
Saint-Saëns	Pianoforte concerto in C minor	2
Saint-Saëns	Two airs from "Samson et Dalila"	1
Schillings	Prelude, Act III, "Der Pfeiffertag"	2
Scharwenka, X.	Pianoforte concerto in F minor	1
Schubert	Symphony in C, No. 9	3
Schubert	Symphony in B minor (unfinished)	3
Schumann	Symphony in C	3
Schumann	Symphony in E flat ("Rhenish")	3
Schumann	Overture to "Manfred"	2
Sibelius	Concerto in D minor for violin	2
Sinigaglia	Overture, "La Baruffe Chiozotte"	1
Smetana	Symphonic poem, "Vltava"	3
Smetana	Cradle Song	2
Strauss, R.	Symphonic poem, "Till Eulenspiegel"	2
Strauss, R.	Symphonic poem, "Ein Heldenleben"	2
Strauss, R.	Symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra"	3
Strauss, R.	Symphonic poem, "Tod und Verklärung"	2
Strauss, R.	Song, with orchestra, "Pilgrim's Morning Song"	3
Strauss, R.	Song, with orchestra, "Verführung"	2
Strauss, R.	Song, with orchestra, "Freundliche Vision"	2
Strauss, R.	Song, with orchestra, "Heimliche Aufforderung"	2
Svendsen	"Carnival in Paris"	2
Tschaikowsky	Symphony No. 4	3
Tschaikowsky	Symphony No. 5	1
Tschaikowsky	Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique")	1
Tschaikowsky	Suite No. 1	1
Tschaikowsky	Concerto for violin	3
Tschaikowsky	"Francesca da Rimini"	2
Wagner	Overture, "Rienzi"	2
Wagner	Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"	7
Wagner	Overture, "Eine Faust"	2
Wagner	Overture, "Tannhäuser"	2
Wagner	Prelude, "Lohengrin"	4
Wagner	Prelude, "Die Meistersinger"	3
Wagner	Prelude, "Die Meistersinger" (Act III)	3
Wagner	Magic Fire Scene from "Die Walküre"	1
Wagner	Ride of the Valkyrior, from "Die Walküre"	3
Wagner	"Siegfried Idyl"	2
Wagner	"Waldweben," from "Siegfried"	1
Wagner	Prelude and Glorification, "Parsifal"	1
Wagner	"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"	1
Wagner	"Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Götterdämmerung"	1
Wagner	"Siegfried's Death March," "Götterdämmerung"	2
Wagner	Prelude and Finale, "Tristan und Isolde"	5
Wagner	"Kaisermarsch"	1
Wagner	Overture and Bacchanale, "Tannhäuser"	2
Wagner	Prayer from "Tannhäuser"	1
Wagner	Elizabeth's entrance air, "Tannhäuser"	3
Wagner	Adriano's air from "Rienzi"	2
Wagner	Elsa's dream from "Lohengrin"	2
Wagner	Sachs's monologue, Act II, "Meistersinger"	3
Wagner	Waltraute's scene, "Götterdämmerung"	2
Wagner	Brunnhilde's Immolation, "Götterdämmerung"	2
Wagner	Song, "Träume"	3
Wagner	Song, "Im Treibhaus"	2
Wagner	Song, "Schmerzen"	2
Wagner	Song, "Stehe Still"	2
Weber	Overture, "Oberon"	1
Weber	Overture, "Der Freischütz"	3
Weber	Weingartner, "Invitation to the Dance"	1

RECORD, TUESDAY,
MARCH 28, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Symphony orchestra, which returned from New York late Saturday evening, went to Springfield yesterday (Monday) afternoon to give its only concert of the year there and returned to town by special train immediately after the concert. Arrangements have been made whereby Mme. Carolina White, who is to be the soloist in Boston on April 7 and 8, will be the soloist with the orchestra at its last concert in Providence on Tuesday evening, April 4.

BOSTON HERALD
MARCH 28, 1911.

The Symphony Orchestra, which returned from New York late Saturday evening, went to Springfield yesterday afternoon to give its only concert of the year there, and returned to town by special train immediately after the concert. Arrangements have been made whereby Mme. Carolina White, who will be the soloist at the concerts in Boston April 7 and 8, will be the soloist with the orchestra at its last concert in Providence on Tuesday evening, April 4.

BOSTON HERALD
MARCH 30, 1911.

CONCERT NOTES.

The public sale of seats for the second concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, tomorrow morning. The soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play Beethoven's concerto in G major No. 4. The second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the remarkable young Canadian violinist, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra this week. No violinist since Elman first came to America has made a more striking impression wherever she has played. She will play here Tschaikowsky's concerto. The other numbers on the program will be a suite by Georges Enesco (first time) and Schumann's symphony No. 4 in D minor.

BOSTON JOURNAL
MARCH 30, 1911

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the remarkable young Canadian violinist, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, is expected to be one of the musical sensations of the season. She is to play the Tschaikowsky, concerto and the other numbers on the program comprise a suite by Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, which will be heard here for the first time, and Schumann's symphony No. 4 in D-minor.

The public sale of seats for the second of the season's concerts in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony will open at the box office, Symphony Hall, tomorrow morning. As already announced, the soloist will be Josef Hofmann, who will play Beethoven's concerto in G-major No. 4, and the second half of the program will be devoted entirely to Wagner.

BOSTON GLOBE
MARCH 30, 1911.

Miss Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts, playing Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin.

Josef Hofmann will be the soloist at the pension fund concert Sunday evening by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall.

GLOBE—TUESDAY,
APRIL 4, 1911

Next Sunday evening the pension fund concert of the Boston symphony orchestra will take place in Symphony hall. Josef Hofmann will play Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, and the second part of the program will be devoted to Wagner's music.

[192]

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1911

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

AN AFTERNOON OF VARIEGATED DISCOVERIES

Enesco for a New Composer, Miss Parlow for a New Violinist and a Symphony Without Pause — Schumann's "Bridal Song" and the Magniloquent Mr. Fiedler —The Curious Enesco and His Puzzling Suite — Miss Parlow's Remarkable Accomplishments as a Violinist and in Music Rather Alien to Her Mind and Temperament

THE Symphony Concert of yesterday was a concert of discoveries. For the first time an orchestral piece by Georges Enesco, a rising Parisian composer, was performed here by professional musicians. For the first time, Miss Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, acclaimed for months past in other cities, played here; while for rare occasions Mr. Fiedler made no pauses in the chosen symphony, Schumann's in D minor and yet held the attention of his audience unflaggingly. Usually Mr. Fiedler puts an overture on his programmes and often they contain a short "middle piece." There was neither overture nor fragment yesterday, and the austerest souls of Vienna or of Leipsig might have approved the conductor's scheme—a suite, a concerto and a symphony. Doubtless they would have resented the suite, since a relatively unknown Parisian composer wrote it, and Teutonic ears have never been much gladdened by Tschaikowsky's concerto for violin. There might be even a suspicion that Bostonian ears have heard it for the present quite as often as they desire, since it has now been played for three successive seasons. Beethoven and Brahms, Mendelssohn and Dvorak, Lalo and Tschaikowsky made the round of concertos that the virtuosi of the violin patiently traverse. Four of them have been played at the Symphony Concerts this very season. Are there no others that are worth the playing, even if they are not "classic masterpieces?" It is easy to suspect that there are, and reports, unconfirmed by actual performances hereabouts, indicate that living composers do now and then write for the violin.

The purists—to return to them—would have had their fullest joy of Schumann's symphony, played, as the composer intended, without pause, but played also with an insistently robustious voice that might a little have surprised him. Schumann, as every one knows, was a romantic composer, and so perhaps the romantically minded listeners and commentators have the truer insight into his music. According to them this symphony in D minor is Schumann's bridal song—music that he wrote in the first happiness of his union with Clara Wieck, and in a rapturous excitement of creation that made him quite heedless of what the academic might think of the form and the details of his music. Listen, those romantic interpreters say, and hear in the introduction to the first movement the warm and tender voice of Schumann's affection; then, in the main body of the movement his exultation in his happiness; next in the "Romance," a return to his affectionate musing; again in the Scherzo the bright flow of life for him in these sunlit years; and in the finale, the mood of exultation again, the voice, almost, of a new power. The symphony has what we should call nowadays a "cyclic" character and Schumann is surprisingly adept in the transference and the variation of his melodic material from movement to movement. Behold, say these interpreters, the musical form imaginatively and ingeniously adapted to the turning from one face to another of his happiness.

All this "programme-making" in the larger sense is interesting and plausible; unmistakably the music is touched with a very personal emotion; and we should not be the prying children of our own time that we are, did we not try to search it out and label it. On the other hand, if Schumann was writing his bridal song in this symphony and writing it so personally, did he quite intend so vigorous a performance as Mr. Fiedler accomplished yesterday. The conductor was very sonorous, very eloquent. The first movement went in large exuberances of tone and the fourth was yet more energetic. The "Romance" was drenched in sentiment and then wrung out for the public ear; the Scherzo had like impassioned voice. Mr. Fiedler was conducting to the hilt, laying on and sparing not, missing not an emphasis, a transition, a contrast, discovering them even, moulding, modulating, brightening and darkening. Evidently Schumann had mounted to the house-top and was crying the moods of his happiness to all Germany. Now it is possible, in imagination, to hear the symphony with as intense and glowing, yet with much softer and more intimate voice. Listen to some of the phrases, some of the modulations, some of the rhythmic inflections in it, and they seem almost of the secret speech of Schumann's romantic heart.

These new Parisian composers, though they live and work in a socialistic time, are a perversely individualistic folk; and Enesco, by the token of his Suite, obstinately refuses to be classified, though every right-minded Frenchman ought to fall unresistingly into his particular category. But then, though Enesco has lived all his adult years in Paris, he is Roumanian by birth, and hints of the folk-tunes of his race may be found, by the few who know them, in his music. His Suite, since it affects academic austerity of form under more or less modern treatment, bears him toward Roger Ducasse and other young Frenchmen who like this sort of paradoxical musical exercise. He is no ultra-modern juggler with strange and dissonant harmonies and exotic progressions; the whole-tone scale does not haunt him. Yet he is aware that such things be, and he is quite willing to borrow an interval or a modulation from them. At the beginning of the Suite, he seems to be seeking a [illegible] sequence. In the two middle movements, he seems all for subdued and suggestive expression, for atmospheric music as the contemporary Frenchmen write it. Again, in the finale, he has an exotic, a bizarre strain. Sometimes, he is deliberately simple. Again he is curiously complex. Sometimes his utterance is naked candor; again it is reticence itself. He does not seek thick, rich, blazing instrumental colors. He likes a cool, clear middle-grayness, into which suddenly, as with the brass in his finale, he will let a great flash of flaring color. Seemingly, Enesco hears the music of his fellow composers in Paris, and then writes his own. He is of none of their multifarious "chapels."

The Suite begins with a Prelude for the string choirs. They play a deep-voiced melody in stark unison, with bolder and bolder reiterations and fuller and fuller intensities. It compels the hearer to heed; it commands by a kind of astringent and uncompromising power. Its monotony impresses rather than wearies, and the ultimate sweeps of the kettle-drum over it only emphasize its nakedness. The melody dies; there is a moment of delicate transition, and the Suite proceeds in a "slow minuet." Enesco might have called it almost a "chanted minuet." The melodic ideas, ill suggested as they are by the violin and the violoncello, have their flavor of the eighteenth century. The formal course of the music is now grave and stately even to monotony. Again it seems willed and artificial contrivance. The music almost chants itself; yet upon it are woven the embroidery of very modern harmonies and the suggestion of very modern and very fine strokes of instrumental color. It is as though Enesco would write a minuet as an eighteenth century composer might have written it in a dream of the ways of music-making in the twentieth. An intermezzo grave of mood, but curiously reiterating scattered musical thoughts that Enesco never quite concentrates or correlates, prepares the way for a finale that again runs monotonously and monochromatically, except as sudden flares of different instruments, and fitful changes of rhythm and tonality break it. There is nothing archaic in this music. It is exotic, as contemporary music would be when it seeks strange climes. The listener suspects Roumania.

There are no mysteries about Miss Parlow. She is a very accomplished, a very remarkable violinist, who had ill chosen the concerto that she played yesterday. She is indeed ingratiating to see—a very tall and slender young woman, who has just passed her twenty-first year, with a face that a little recalls those of the women of pre-Raphaelite pictures, with the long, elastic hands that are sometimes the mark of violinists, with a body that she keeps in perfect poise. Her "platform manner," as the parsons call it, is irreproachable. It is quietness itself; she neither sways to right and left, nor upturns her eyes to the heavens—or the ceiling. She has not a trick of manner; whatever excitement may be burning in her she hides under seeming calm; she would impose her "personality" upon the audience only through her playing. She is neither confident nor timid; she is wholly and quietly absorbed in her work. She has led the life of the virtuoso, said the programme-book dutifully; but no hint of the virtuoso mars her bearing. She is a virtuosa and of the first rank in her command of the technique of the violin. Tschaikowsky has not spared his exactions in his concerto. She fulfilled them, as the player should fulfil them, so that they seemed of the natural course of the music, of the normal voice of the violin. Her bowing is large yet delicate; free yet firm, exquisitely sensitive in all things. Her harmonics, her runs, her double-stopping, all the technical dexterities that the books and the pedants like to enumerate are easily and flawlessly accomplished. Not an interval in the racking cadenza baffled her; not a detail of the intricate ornament of the first movement escaped her. Her intonation was impeccable. She did nothing that was not secure. Out of this technical mastery and above all out of this sensitive and felicitous sureness of her bowing springs a tone that is beautiful to hear. She does not force it to an undue largeness; she does not subdue it to an extraordinary fineness. It is of limpid clearness, of velvety texture, of unexaggerated and undiluted sweetness and softness, of unbroken yet pliant flow, sensitive to every gradation of force, every suggestion of color, every inflection of rhythm that she would give it. An "instrumental voice" is the conventional phrase for a certain sort of coloratura singer. By her tone Miss Parlow makes the voice of her violin a human voice in its beauty as so much ordered sound, in its expressive quality of the substance and the spirit of the music that she would utter.

Yet Tschaikowsky's concerto was not altogether the wisest choice that Miss Parlow could have made. The music disclosed, of course, the range and the ease of her technical accomplishments. It emphasized her security in all that she does. In it there was the amplest room for the beauty and the felicity of her tone, for her feeling for sustained song, for her fine sensitiveness to rhythm, for the justice of style with which she accomplishes all things. She struck white fire many times in the bravura passages of the first movement; and she made the rhythms gleam. She conducted it, so to say, with a masterful largeness of outline and with an acute sense of detail and the place of detail. Her playing of the slow movement was of sympathetically shaded song that never lost its sustained voice in excess or carelessness of modulation. The voice indeed was less instrumental than human. Through the rhythmic whirl of the finale, through its excited iterations and reiterations, she was free and bold. The music and the performance alike thrilled. Yet from end to end of the concerto, Miss Parlow lacked, as she may well lack with her young years and her young spirit, the elementary power, the passionate heats, the strain of wildness that are surely in Tschaikowsky's music. With all its technical learning and exactions, with all its marks of the expert composer, it is the one barbaric concerto [illegible] for the violin. They say that a concerto may hardly know passion and wildness, since it is a concert-piece of established form for the display of an instrument and a virtuoso. Tschaikowsky has achieved the double end, and he bids the violinist play the music with the most fiery of intensities, with the wildness that shall make much of it seem as passionate and even extravant rhapsody. For the time Miss Parlow is of too just, too poised a mind and temperament altogether to catch his vein. She apprehends it, being of penetrating mind; but she has not yet the range and the heat of emotional response and re-creation that can express it. The concentrated continence, rare indeed in youth, that makes her playing of Beethoven's or Brahm's concerto seem of a mature violinist, limit and cool her with Tschaikowsky's.

H. T. P.

Mr. Fiedler to Revive Tschaikowsky's "Manfred," and Miss Carolina White to Sing at the Symphony Concerts—The Minor Recitals

AGAIN, outside two minor recitals and the semi-private concert of the Apollo Club, the Symphony Orchestra has the new week to itself. Its journeyings, moreover, are virtually finished for the season, and Mr. Fiedler has time and energy for the rehearsal of some of the larger pieces that he announced last October. One of these, Tschaikowsky's symphony, "Manfred," is to be performed at the concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, and it is highly colored and large-voiced romantic music of the sort to which Mr. Fiedler is temperamentally inclined. "Manfred" is a "programme" symphony—or, as Tschaikowsky preferred sometimes to call it, a symphonic poem—suggested by Byron's "Manfred." The general scheme and divers episodes of the poem lend themselves readily to musical treatment, and the subject attracted Tschaikowsky, with his predilection for the writing of music of struggling man battling for his ideals and stricken by fate. The better if this contest passed in pictorial and fantastic surroundings, and "Manfred" from the Alps to the palace of the Magi yielded him plentiful stimulus on that score. The composer toiled long over the music through some of the best years of his life, and he has written it largely, passionately, richly and pictorially. None the less his "Manfred" is seldom performed, and when it is revived, as Mr. Fiedler will revive it next week, it comes usually to the audience as a new piece. The other orchestral numbers of the programme are Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture for a classic and Sgambati's revised and amplified version of his "Te Deum" for orchestra. For further interest Miss Carolina White of the Chicago-Philadelphia opera company, who was heard here as a singing-actress in Puccini's "La Fanciulla," will try her fortunes as a concert singer. As a singing-actress in a declamatory part she did well, and seemed a singer who should please no less in a concert. Evidently she is best schooled in modern Italian music, and she will sing at the Symphony concerts Margherita's lament in the prison scene of Boito's "Mefistofele" and an air from "La Wally," the opera by Catalani that has its devoted partisans, but that has never really established itself in the theatre.

SUNDAY evening, April 9, in Symphony Hall, the second of the annual concerts of the Symphony Orchestra for the increase of its Pension Fund. The programme will consist mainly of the music of Wagner, and Josef Hofmann, the distinguished pianist, whom Boston rediscovered last autumn, has volunteered his assistance. He will play Beethoven's concerto in G major, and the "numbers" from Wagner comprise the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the Venusberg music from "Tannhäuser," the "Ride of the Valkyrs," the usual fragment of the forest scene in "Siegfried" and the overture to "Rienzi."

Thursday afternoon, April 13, in Symphony Hall, twenty-second of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

Friday afternoon, April 14, in Symphony Hall, the first performance here in years of Bach's Passion Music according to St. Matthew, one of the supreme masterpieces of choral music, with the chorus of the Cecilia, a choir of boys, the Symphony Orchestra, Mmes. Zimmermann and Spencer and Messrs. Bispham and Hamlin for solo singers, and Mr. Fiedler conducting.

Saturday evening, April 15, in Symphony Hall, twenty-second of the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra.

THE SUNDAY HERALD

BACH'S "PASSION."

For the boy choir needed in the performance of Bach's "Passion" music, to be given at the third Cecilia-Boston Symphony concert on Good Friday evening, April 14, the choir of Emmanuel Church of this city has been secured. The soloists who have been chosen are eminent in this branch of oratorio work. Marie Zimmerman gained her first real reputation in the Bach festivals held some years ago in the old Moravian Church in Bethlehem, Pa. Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham reed no introduction to Boston audiences.

SECOND PENSION FUND CONCERT

With Josef Hofmann as soloist playing the Beethoven concerto in G major No. 4, and with the second half of the program devoted entirely to Wagnerian music, Mr. Fieldler has succeeded in making an attractive program for the second pension fund concert, to be given in Symphony Hall a week from tonight. Mr. Hofmann has volunteered his services for this concert. The performance of the concerto will be preceded by Beethoven's overture to "Egmont." While it is possible that Mr. Fiedler does not share Dr. Muck's prejudices against performing excerpts from the later music dramas of Wagner in concert form, at the same time he is more or less loath

POST, SATURDAY, APRIL 1

MISS PARLOW WITH SYMPHONY

Young Violinist Pleases in Tschaikowsky Number

BY OLIN DOWNES

The 20th public rehearsal of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, introduced to a Boston audience Miss Kathleen Parlow, the young Canadian violinist, and this was the programme: Suite for orchestra, opera 9, Georges Enesco (first time); violin concerto, Tschaikowsky; symphony in D minor, Schumann.

Miss Parlow is an unusually gifted and interesting violinist. Her performance yesterday was surcharged with conviction and electric vitality. The Tschaikowsky concerto has been more characteristically presented, though this was not entirely the fault of the virtuoso. Had the conditions under which she performed been better, however, the music of Tschaikowsky would still have had a refinement, a slenderness, which is not one of its inherent qualities.

The first movement has seldom been presented so poetically. The performance was exceptionally grateful to the ears by reason of this freshness and refinement, and the new enthusiasm of the player. Miss Parlow was thrillingly in earnest, and few violinists now on the stage play more contagiously. Her performance this evening should be still more pleasurable, for it is probable that the finale will then be heard with more effect.

The music of Enesco was heard for the first time at a Symphony concert. The suite heard yesterday is in many respects a remarkable work. It is in archaic vein. The young men of today, the youth who frequent the musical circles of Paris, seem to take diversion in bringing all their technic and their ultra-modernity to bear upon music which attempts the naivete of other times. Enesco has done a similar thing in this suite, and in at least two movements he has done it astonishingly well.

There is remembrance of other days in the severe archaic strains of the prelude, written for the strings in unison, and the bare melody, without enriching harmony or pulsing rhythms, is splendidly strong and proportionate in its outlines. This monologue for strings is not only beautiful as admirable as music; it is poetic thought, and its effect is very cleverly enhanced, at the last, by the sudden entrance of the kettle-drum on a low G—a pedal point over which massive harmonies are strikingly defined. But the finest movement of the suite is the following menuet. This menuet does indeed echo with the thought of sweet and forgotten things. As a feat in orchestration and harmonic writing, it is a masterpiece. The most delicate, and suggestive, and original effects follow each other with a smoothness and a spontaneity which many a famed composer might well envy.

The menuet is perhaps a little lengthy, as though the composer had dwelt overlong upon a happy thought, but if there is this fault it may be forgiven, for such grateful music is too seldom met with.

The following intermezzo was at a first hearing rather forced and lugubrious. The finale has a spirit of exuberant humor, even extravagance, although the musical material is rather slight. Technically the piece is a fine bit of by-play, and throughout the suite the instrumentation is very effective, whether on account of its rich, subdued tones, as in the menuet, or its flashing play of color, in the finale. The suite proved well worthy of a hearing, and it was well received.

Mr. Fiedler gave a sympathetic reading of the charming and romantic symphony of Schumann.

BOSTON, APRIL 2, 1911

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mme. Carolina White, soprano, who made so favorable an impression at the Boston Opera toward the end of the season, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. Mme. White is a native of this city and has been for the past winter the principal dramatic soprano of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company. To her have fallen two important roles. In December she created in Chicago the part of Minnie in Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West," and in New York a few weeks ago she created the part of Susanna in Wolf-Ferrari's "Secret of Susanna." Here she will sing an aria from Catalini's "La Wally," "Ebben? ne andro lontana," and "L'Altra Notte," Marguerite's prison scene in Boito's "Mefistofele." The chief orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, which, not having been heard here since 1905, will be practically a novelty to many in the audience. The other numbers will be Sgambati's "Te Deum Laudamus," and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3.

to do so, and as a consequence the works suitable for concert performance which he has on his list are rather limited in number. Nonetheless, out of them he has chosen five which give a fairly good idea of Wagner's development.

The second part of the program will be as follows: Overture to "The Flying Dutchman; bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"; Ride of the Valkyries; "Waldweben" scene from "Siegfried" and "Rienzi" overture.

[193]

THE BOSTON HERALD
APRIL 1, 1911.

SYMPHONY PLAYS SUITE BY ENESCO

New Work by Young Roumanian Composer Worthy of a Repetition.

MISS PARLOW IS VIOLINIST

By PHILIP HALE.

The 20th public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Max Fiedler conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Miss Kathleen Parlow, violinist, played for the first time in Boston. The program was as follows:

Suite for orchestra, op. 9.....Enesco
Concerto in D major for violin.....
Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D minor No. 4.....Schumann

Enesco's name was not unknown here before yesterday. His "Poeme Roumain" has been played here by the Orchestral Club; his symphony for wind instruments was produced by the Longy Club, and a sonata for violin and piano was played here in last December by David Mannes and his wife. The composer, now in his 30th year, has high reputation in Europe as a violinist.

A Roumanian by birth, a son of a farmer, who, although he knew that the boy was a musical prodigy, was wise and did not dream of exploiting his talent, Enesco first studied at the Conservatory of Music in Vienna and afterward at the Paris Conservatory. At each school he took first prizes. His early compositions at once won recognition. His piano quintet was played in public when he was only 16 years old, and when he was 17 his "Poeme Roumain" was performed at a Chatelet concert led by Colonne. The leading composer of Paris admired him; influential women of the nobility were his stanch friends. This season his symphony, this suite, a violin sonata and the symphony, or dixtuor, for wind instruments, have been performed in New York. He cannot say that an opportunity has been denied him at home or abroad.

Enesco's music that had been played here did not leave a fixed impression. As a boy at Vienna, he was influenced by Brahms. In Paris he studied composition with Gabriel Faure, and associated with men who did not bow the knee to the Viennese god. In this suite there is a revelation of a personal note, decided individuality. Whether this individuality makes a strong appeal is another matter.

The first movement is a prelude in unison for strings. The monotony is somewhat dispelled by the introduction of a kettle drum. The theme itself has not a profil of great significance. This prelude leads into a minuet which is a singular compound of archaic thought and modern expression.

The chief motive, again, is not conspicuous. It does not seem at first that the announcement of it by solo violin and solo violoncello is fortunate, for the latter part of the motive is written ineffectively for the instruments; yet this was no doubt done deliberately, and, paradoxically, to gain an effect of old world character. The harmonic treatment is interesting, especially that of the middle section. The coloring is cool, but fine. The intermede that follows has perhaps the most character of the four movements. The finale, with its ground bass, is rather exotic in tonality. The originality of this music is perplexing. There is the form that is dear to the academicians; there are harmonies of the modern school; there is no attempt at emotional display; there is no evident desire to impress, to startle. The first movement barely escapes the reproach of dulness. The second and third interest the hearer at the time and are remembered. The Suite is well worthy of a repetition.

Miss Parlow, a young Canadian, studied in San Francisco and, after playing in London with great success in 1905, took lessons of Leopold Auer for a year and a half. Having gained an enviable reputation in European cities, she played in New York last December and was at once hailed as a great violinist. She has certainly commanding qualities: an unusually full and rich tone, remarkable accuracy, technic that is solid and also brilliant, a broad and authoritative style. She played yesterday afternoon with modesty, dignity, yet with a calm consciousness of her indisputable ability. She is certainly a violinist of uncommon parts. Perhaps when she is older she will put more of herself into Tschaikowsky's music and show the rarest art of an interpreter, the emotional treatment of music, the raising of it by force of the imagination to the highest level, so that the music is as though it were created anew. It is to be regretted that the orchestral accompaniment as conducted by Mr. Fiedler was pedestrian and at times slipshod. Miss Parlow was enthusiastically applauded.

Schumann's Symphony, a nobly romantic work, with pages of haunting tenderness, again gave great pleasure.

The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Tschaikowsky, "Manfred" symphony; Sgambati, "Te Deum Laudamus"; Beethoven, overture to "Leonora," No. 3. Miss Carolina White will sing "Ebben? me Ndro lontana" from Catalani's "La Wally," and Marguerite's Prison Song from Boito's "Mefistofele."

BOSTON GLOBE—
APRIL 1, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Enesco's Suite Played For First Time Here.

Kathleen Parlow, Young Violiniste, Displays Remarkable Ability.

The program at the 20th Symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Enesco, suite for orchestra, op. A (first time); Tschaikowsky, concerto in D major for violin, Kathleen Parlow, soloist; Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 20.

Enesco's suite was played for the first time in Boston. His name is strange to these programs. Of his compositions known heretofore in this city, two were brought forward by Mr Longy, the symphonie for 10 wind instruments at a concert of the club bearing his name, and the Roumanian Poeme as long ago as 1902 by the Orchestral club. Mr. and Mrs Mannes introduced this season a sonata for violin and piano.

Enesco is 29 years old, a Roumanian by birth, a Parisian by education. He plays the piano and is court violinist to the queen of Roumania.

His suite reveals qualities which one would expect in the work of a Frenchman, whether he builds a statue, writes a drama or composes a symphony. There is to be found a certain reticence and suavity of expression which at times takes on the cast of quaintness, more rarely, of elegance. There is a certain finesse and fastidiousness of interior design in the leading and coordination of parts.

Some Individuality.

In following these traits, which savor of over-refinement, the work is at times supine and monotonous because of level lines, of unrelieved orchestral color and dynamics. It would seem that the composer, as it is natural for a young man, has built his suite from a close perspective of individual pages, and has failed to estimate carefully a scale of values for the work entire.

His writing is not without individuality, but there is seldom a passage that rivets the attention, incites an emotion, or produces a lasting impression as the inevitable sequence from some premise, or as the convincing development of a musical thought.

Of the younger contemporaneous French school, whose members have fallen more or less under the spell of Debussy, his subtleties and his musical impressionism, Enesco and Dukas are as yet the first to receive notice in America to any marked degree.

It may be said that Enesco shows attempted imitation of Debussy. His thematic and melodic profile is at no time of marked distinction, yet it has identity and a certain atmosphere. He has melodic invention, as the rather austere, boldly defined melody in unison for strings in the first movement shows. It bears the traits of a sturdy folktune and has unmistakable vitality. When treated throughout the movement unaccompanied, its baldness unrelieved save by a few comments from the kettle drum, there is again danger of monotony.

Limited Sense of Nuance.

When Enesco writes harmonically for his orchestra in the two ensuing movements, he betrays a limited sense of nuance and of instrumental color. The skyline is drab and unbroken. There is need for sharper contrast of outline, for a more imaginative, because at times, a more obstructed view, for alternating lights and shadows for the play of tints and demitints.

He apparently has little sense of the values of instrumental grouping.

Enesco is reputed to be a violinist and yet the result of committing the first theme of the second movement to the solo violin and solo violoncello in octaves is not fortunate to either instrument.

His voices go hymning on as in unceasing chants, which, in a passage preceding the close of the second movement, assume a likeness of the Gregorian modes, and secure a marked ecclesiastical effect. Yet, generally speaking, Enesco's palette is monochromatic.

The last movement is more varied in structure. There is a climax of considerable power, but it is more contrived than spontaneous. The work throughout suffers from a barrenness of musical thought which is not concealed either by ingenuity or richness of orchestral dress. The orchestra gave great beauty and significance to pages which they did not essentially possess.

Miss Parlow's Playing.

Miss Parlow is a young Canadian who studied in San Francisco, later in London, and finally with Leopold Auer in St Petersburg. It is singular that the very concerto which her teacher declined to play because of its great difficulty, although it had been dedicated to him, was the one in which she should make her American debut with the Russian symphony orchestra in New York last December, and her first appearance here.

Miss Parlow's performance was in many ways extraordinary. Her technical equipment and facility is marvelous; her musical sense keen, and her authority as an interpreter indisputable. Her playing is wholly without ostentation or display. She bears none of the prepossessing insignia of the virtuoso, but her musicianship is sincere and self-evident.

She encompassed the tremendous technical difficulties of the concerto with true mastery, not as feats for the exploitation of precocity, but the league-striding cadenza, for example, as rhapsodical flights of exalted and poetic speech.

Her appreciation of style is clearly defined. Her bowing in bravura was virile and essentially masculine; her cantilena in the slow movement was ravishing, both for its fineness and elasticity and for its boldness of nuance and its sweeping passion. Her sense of rhythm is secure and vital and would doubtless have permitted her greater liberties in rubato had the accompaniment been conducted in any degree worthy of her performance. She was applauded with great enthusiasm and recalled no less than six times.

Schumann's symphony profited by clarity and expressive power by the revision. The orchestra played it with great beauty of tone.

MONITOR, BOSTON,
APRIL 1, 1911.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Another new orchestral piece that makes the Symphony public glad it has not disclaimed the old composers—a suite by a Parisian independent, Georges Enesco; a piece that takes listeners into an unfamiliar tonal realm, leads them to the musical north. Think of the whole introductory section of a work being written in octaves! Is not that an Arctic idea? The stringed instruments all singing as one voice through an entire movement—huddling together in unanimity of tone as if to keep one another warm—does not that proclaim septentrional conditions? Not much like the music of Dubussy, the Enesco style of scoring, either here or elsewhere in the suite; for an atmosphere equatorial pleases the leader of the modern French school.

It is all the new musical prose, you say. The prologue of the Enesco piece, unrhythmed except for an impressionistic scheme of drum taps, is a protest against the formalism of harmonic systems.

Well, whatever it is, Mr. Fiedler has not the deepest curiosity for it. Give him Schumann and romantic poetry. Leave it to Mr. Caplet to tell Bostonians what the French prose movement signifies.

Has there been at the head of the Symphony orchestra before Mr. Fiedler a man who appreciated fully the beauty of the Schumann scores? Who like him has ever had virility for setting in order the Schumann rhythms? Who like him has had tact for searching out the Schumann color effects? That was the Boston symphony orchestra as brought to the Fiedler ideal of expression that played the Schumann symphony No. 4 on Friday afternoon.

A chivalrous Max Fiedler conducted the Tschaikowsky violin concerto for a young artist who played the solo line with light, though confident, arm. We like to hear youth interpret music after the fashion it has been taught by famous pedagogues. A schoolmaster's triumph, the playing of Miss Parlow; and a young woman's triumph, too. If she and Elman learned their phrasing from the same source, they learned a style that speaks to our intelligence and holds our attention. We know that mature musicians could make the Tschaikowsky solo violin a more deeply moving voice than the prodigious youthful ones can. But we prefer the light appeal when this instrument is in question; we like it as it comes from the great pedagogue through the young interpreter. We think that the music has an elemental purity when thus presented which it lacks when it comes from the mature hand. All sophistry, all scholastic bias and pedantry is taken out of it.

The composer seems to speak more directly to us than when personal theories of interpretation are applied to his thought.

Enesco, suite for orchestra, op. 9 (first time in Boston); Tschaikowsky, concerto for violin in D major, op. 35; Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120. Soloist, Miss Kathleen Parlow.

NOTES.

Miss Carolina White, soprano of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts of April 7 and 8. She will sing an aria from Catalani's "La Wally" and Marguerite's prison song from "Mefistofele." The principal orchestral number of the program will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony. The other numbers will be Sgambati's "Te Deum Laudamus" and Beethoven's overture "Leonora" No. 3.

Beethoven and Wagner are the composers whose names appear on the program of the second Symphony pension concert, to be given Sunday evening, April 9. The "Egmont" overture and the G major concerto, No. 4, are the Beethoven numbers; "The Flying Dutchman" overture, the "Tannhauser" Bacchanale music, the "Ride of the Valkyries," the Waldweben scene from "Siegfried" and the "Rienzi" overture are the Wagner selections. The soloist is Josef Hofmann.

The Cecilia Society and the Boston Symphony Orchestra give a performance of the Bach Passion music Friday evening, April 14, with the assistance of the boy choir of Emmanuel church. The soloists engaged for the performance, all of them eminent in oratorio, are Mmes Marie Zimmerman and Janet Spencer and Messrs. Hamlin and Bispham.

BOSTON JOURNAL
APRIL 1, 1911

KATHLEEN PARLOW SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Violinist Renders Tschaikowsky Concerto In Masterly Style.

One of the two young women who have proved the sensations of the season, Kathleen Parlow, the violinist, made her first appearance in Boston at the Symphony matinee yesterday. The other, Carolina White, the dramatic soprano whose old schoolmates from Allston crowded the Opera House when she sang in "The Girl of the Golden West," will be the Symphony soloist next week.

Miss Parlow—a tall girl, decidedly English in her appearance—chose the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major, one of the most difficult pieces in the violin list. It requires courage as well as talent to undertake it at all, and she played it in masterly style. The soloist, a native of Calgary, in Western Canada, made her debut in San Francisco when she was only 6 years old. She studied at the Golden Gate and then in Russia with Leopold Auer, the famous violinist to whom the concerto was dedicated, and who declined to play it for some years on the ground that it was beyond human ability.

It is interesting to recall that another celebrated pupil of Auer, Mischa Elman, made his debut with the Symphony Orchestra in the same concerto. Maud Powell, the queen of violinists, is the only other woman besides Miss Parlow who has ventured to play the piece here.

Miss Parlow's performance, while not perfect, was powerful and at times brilliant. It revealed rare skill and understanding, a true virtuoso capacity and temperament, and it aroused great enthusiasm. It was a prodigious feat for any young violinist to perform, but only the mature artist can hope to give complete expression to so bristling and baffling a composition. The orchestral support was splendid.

Georges Enesco—a new name on Symphony programs—is represented this week by a suite for orchestra, a work whose general smoothness is interrupted in the third movement by one of the most discordant spasms ever thrust upon an unsuspecting public. It gave yesterday the strange and almost staggering impression that the orchestra had gone to pieces.

The concert closed with a suave performance of Schumann's beautiful fourth symphony.

JOURNAL—SUNDAY,
APRIL 2, 1911

Carolina White To Be Symphony Soloist

Carolina White, who made so favorable an impression at the Boston Opera House recently, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. Miss White, who is a native of this city, has been for the past winter the principal dramatic soprano of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company. She will sing as her first number an aria from Catalani's "La Wally," and as her second number Marguerite's prison song from Boito's "Mefistofele." The principal orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, which has not been heard here since 1905. The other numbers will be Sgambati's "Te Deum Laudamus" and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3.

Pension Fund Concert

With Josef Hofmann, as soloist, playing the Beethoven concerto in G major, No. 4, and with the second half of the program devoted entirely to Wagnerian music, Mr. Fiedler has succeeded in making a most attractive program for the second pension fund concert, which is to be given in Symphony Hall a week from tonight. Mr. Hofmann's appearance in Boston earlier in the season, both with the orchestra and in recital, made a very deep impression and won for him a very large number of admirers. He has volunteered his services for this concert. The performance of the concerto will be preceded by Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

The second part of the program will begin with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." This will be followed by the bacchanale from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser." Then will come the "Ride of the Valkyries," which is the introduction and first part of the third act of "Die Walkure," which will be followed by the "Waldweben" scene from the second act of "Siegfried." The concert will be brought to an end by the "Rienzi" overture.

Bach's "Passion"

For the boy choir needed in the performance of Bach's "Passion" music which is to be given at the third Cecilia-Boston Symphony concert on Good Friday evening, April 15, the choir of Emmanuel Church of this city has been secured. The soloists who have been chosen for this performance are all of them eminent in this particular branch of oratorio work. Marie Zimmerman gained her first real reputation in the Bach Festivals held some years ago in the old Moravian Church in Bethlehem, Penn. Janet Spencer is one of the most talented of the contraltos engaged in oratorio work, while neither George Hamlin nor David Bispham need any introduction to Boston audiences.

[194]

MISS KATHLEEN PARLOW WITH THE SYMPHONY

YOUNG VIOLINIST PLAYED TSCHAIKOWSKY'S D MAJOR

Work Had More Than the Usual Life and Power—A Suite by Enesco and Schumann's D Minor

By Louis C. Elson.

PROGRAMME.

Georges Enesco. Suite for Orchestra.
Tschaikowsky. Violin Concerto in D major.
Soloist, Miss Kathleen Parlow.
Schumann. Symphony in D minor. No. 4.

The chief attraction of the concert yesterday afternoon was undoubtedly the young soloist, Miss Kathleen Parlow, who appeared here for the first time. Miss Parlow, although born in Canada, has lived in San Francisco long enough for us to claim her as an American. She has been a pupil of Leopold Auer, who brought forth Mischa Elman, and who is a formidable rival to Sevcik in the quality of the pupils that he is launching.

Miss Parlow, young, slender and graceful, made a good impression by her stage presence even before she had played a note. But her performance of the Tschaikowsky concerto was something noteworthy. The work is the one which Hanslick attacked so bitterly. These fierce critical anathemas are like chickens that generally come home to roost, and one by one Hanslick's diatribes are building him an unenviable monument.

We cannot, to be sure, rank Tschaikowsky's violin concerto with his piano concerto in B flat, but on the other hand, no one can discern the utter vileness which Hanslick ascribes to this display work. Wagner, Bruckner, Tschaikowsky, and many other geniuses have received the lash of this musical Thersites. But now Hanslick is fading, while the stars seem not to have been plucked from their orbits by his efforts.

Miss Parlow gave an unwonted charm to the concerto. It is a long work, too long for what it has to say, but on this occasion it had more than usual life and power. Not that Miss Parlow's tone is as broad as that of a Mischa Elman, but it is of such a sympathetic quality that it has the appealing power of a human voice. The absolute surety too, is an element of success in this young artist's playing; the intonation is impeccable, the bowing free and elastic, the skips flawless, the runs clear, the double-stopping well-balanced, the harmonics especially pure.

The cadenza of the first movement was a fine exhibition of virtuosity, but a trifle too long-drawn-out. In the Coda of the second movement Miss Parlow gave some fine G-string work and resonant pizzicato effects. In the finale she displayed the characteristic Russian figure that forms the basis of the movement, all the way from the G string to high harmonics upon the E string.

Nevertheless we wished the young artist a better work for her debut. The Tschaikowsky concerto does not rank with the Beethoven (no violin concerto does that) or with the Brahms, or with the Bruch G minor, nor yet with the Mendelssohn concerto. One can say this and yet not agree with the vituperation of Hanslick. At the end of the work Miss Parlow was recalled half-a-dozen times with the wildest enthusiasm. That she made a popular success cannot be doubted. When she gains in breadth she will take rank with the very greatest on her instrument. It is greatly to her credit that she does not "play at the galleries," she does not try to win applause by too much personal display, but allows the thought of the composer to speak for itself.

Georges Enesco is a new name in the musical biographies. This young Roumanian, (he is not yet 30 years old), is a product of the Paris Conservatory, and Massenet and Faure had the chief guidance of his precocious talent in composition. Of course, he is not in Grove's Dictionary,—few people are until they are dead. His Suite is of course in the modern vein, but not in the thorny paths of D'Indy nor in the foggy roads of Debussy. He is not afraid of melody and sometimes dares even to take a conventional cadence. The scoring is not heavy, and Enesco does not endeavor to expand the unambitious Suite-form into a symphony.

It begins with a unison melody as Prelude, which does not quite attain that impressive unison effect that Bizet used in his Prelude to the Suite Arlesienne. After the Prelude come a Minuet, an Intermezzo, and a lively Finale.

The unison prelude is Oriental enough to be warbled in a Mosque or a Synagogue; its quaint recitative character seemed decidedly novel in a symphony concert. It was however, not unimpressive, especially when the strings were combined with a mysterious roll of the kettledrums, towards its close. This led into a slow Minuet which was a strongly original number with some complex rhythmic effects that must have tangled the feet of the dancers. The Intermezzo, which followed, was most lofty in its beginning, but soon grew fragmentary.

The Finale was full of the sharpest contrasts, with sudden flaring-up of the brass that were startling and effective. This part, and the Intermezzo, showed that Enesco has not entirely escaped the influence of Debussy. He has given here a very interesting work without demanding a tremendous modern orchestra. It is a Suite that may prove still more interesting on a second hearing. Enesco is likely to be one of the important modern composers.

Mr. Fiedler is one of those who adore Schumann and his reading of the fourth symphony gave proof of this. It is simply astounding to think that there was a time when all England was in hue and cry against this composer, and when even Germany listened rather doubtfully to his apologists." At present we can only wish that we had such melodists and such poetic thinkers instead of our orchestral giants, our phenomenal score-manufac-

Schumann always wrote best when he was happiest, and this symphony is one of the products of his happiest year, 1841, when he had won his wife, and when he was creating the most beautiful "Lieder" that had ever been heard in the world. His B flat symphony and his D minor symphony, twin works, were the voices of happiness and triumph, and they were pioneers in the domain of musical expression in this epic form. The Romanza, with its treatment of subjects of the Introduction, was at first hampered by the attempt to use guitar in the orchestra, but this hopeless attempt was discarded in the subsequent revision of the work. In his use of thematic transference from one movement to another Schumann stands fully the equal of Beethoven, and the use of subject matter in the last movement that is found in the first also, is only excelled by the similar treatment of Brahms.

How weak it all seems in orchestration, when compared with our modern Richard! Only, the ideas are so beautiful that one does not even think of the orchestration, while in some modern works we think of nothing else.

The reading, as already intimated, was a most elastic and sympathetic one; the obbligato for violoncello, in the second movement, was expressively played by Mr. Warnke; the hearty applause and recall which followed the work showed plainly that Schumann is not becoming dimmed by the orchestral splendors of the ultra-moderns.

THE BOSTON AMERICAN—SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1911.

* * *

With Josef Hofmann as soloist playing the Beethoven Concerto in G Minor No. 4 and with the second half of the program devoted entirely to Wagnerian music, Mr. Fielder has succeeded in making a most attractive program for the second Pension Fund concert, which is to be given in Symphony Hall a week from to-night. Mr. Hofmann's appearances in Boston earlier in the season, both with the orchestra and in recital, made a very deep impression and won for him a large number of admirers.

* * *

For the boy choir needed in the performance of Bach's "Passion" music, which is to be given at the third Cecilia-Boston Symphony concert on Good Friday evening, April 14, the choir of Emmanuel Church of this city has been secured. This is one of the best boy choirs in Boston, and it will add much to the pleasure of the evening. The soloists who have been chosen for this performance are all eminent in this particular branch of oratorio work. Marie Zimmerman gained her first real reputation in the Bach Festivals held some years ago in the old Morabian Church in Bethlehem, Pa. Janet Spencer is one of the most talented of the contraltos engaged in oratorio work, while neither George Hamlin or David Bisham need any introduction to Boston audiences. Rehearsals are progressing favorably and there should be a memorable performance of this masterpiece.

* * *

Miss Carolina White, soprano, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts of next week. Miss White is a native of this city and has been for the past Winter the principal dramatic soprano of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company. To her have fallen two very important roles. In December she created in Chicago the part of Minnie in Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West," and in New York a few weeks ago she created the part of Susanna in Wolf-Ferrari's opera "The Secret of Susanna." Here she will sing as her first number an aria from Catalani's "La Wally," "Ebben? ne andro lontana," and as her second number she will sing "L'Altra Notte" from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele," which is Marguerite's prison song.

SUNDAY GLOBE—APRIL 2. 1911.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Miss White Soloist With Symphony.

Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" to Be Revived.

"Lohengrin" in English—Recitals—Notes.

The soloist at the Symphony concerts this week will be Miss Carolina White, who recently appeared twice at the Boston opera house as Minnie in "The Girl of the Golden West" and was justly admired for the purity and expressive beauty of her voice and for her ingenuous and spontaneous characterization of the part.

Miss White has been a member of the Chicago opera company this season, and as such sang Minnie in the company's production of "The Girl" in Chicago, and recently in that of Wolf-Ferrari's comic opera, "The Secret of Suzanne," at the Metropolitan opera house, New York, in its first performance in America.

Here Miss White will sing the aria from Catalani's "La Wally," "Ebben? ne andro lontana" and the aria of Marguerite's delirium in the prison from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele."

The principal orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's program symphony after Byron's dramatic poem, "Manfred," which has not been played here since March, 1905. Performances of it are comparatively infrequent because of its great technical difficulties and its time of duration, which when played entire is an hour or more.

Tschaikowsky was indebted to Mili Balakirew for the suggestion and outlined program for a work upon Byron's poem, which Berlioz had been indisposed, through advanced age, to accept. Balakirew prescribed a recurring motive (the Manfred theme), which would be similar to Berlioz' idee fixe in his "Fantastique" symphony.

Tschaikowsky followed the scheme of four movements, except that he interchanged the second and third. In the first he pictures Manfred wandering in the Alps, his soul a prey to torture, his imagination mocked by the memory of the beautiful Astarte; the second, "The fairy of the Alps appears to Manfred under the rainbow of the mountain torrent"; the third, a pastorale, the simple, peaceful life of the mountaineers, and the last the subterranean palace of Arimanes, who in Byron's poem is the Ahriman of the Zoroastrian creed, the personification of all that is evil and malignant. Manfred appears in the midst of a bacchanale. The phantom of Astarte predicts the end of his misery. His death follows.

Tschaikowsky made the first sketches of his work in April, 1885, at Maidanovo, a village not far from Moscow. The score was completed in September at the same place.

Sgambati's "Te Deum Laudamus" for strings and organ will be heard for the first time at a symphony subscription concert. It was played in November, 1904, at a concert for the pension fund.

Giovanni Sgambati, prior to Wolf-Ferrari, the foremost of the modern Italians who have looked across the Alps and attuned their muse to the art of the Germans, is a professor of piano in the St Cecilia academy in Rome. Within the past few years he has been pianist and director of Queen Margherita's quintet. Sgambati has created a free piano school in Rome and has gathered a circle about him not unlike that at Weimar in Liszt's time.

His namo has thrice appeared on the symphony programs. As long ago as Nov 1, 1890, Mr Tucker played his G minor piano concerto with the orchestra (Mr Lang had played it previously in his concerto concerts). His 1st symphony was played in November, 1894, and January, 1898. The Kneisel quartet has played pieces of his chamber music here as follows: Quartet D flat major, October, 1894; quartet C sharp minor, November, 1896, October, 1902, and November, 1909; the piano quintet in F major, February, 1904, and in B flat major, Nov 8, 1910.

The program Friday and Saturday will include Beethoven's "Leonora" overture No. 3, neither George Hamlin nor David Bispham need an introduction to Boston audiences.

[195]

GIRL VIOLINIST THE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

By EDITH BURNHAM.

The special feature of yesterday afternoon's Symphony rehearsal was the appearance of the young violinist, Kathleen Parlow, who was heard in the Tschaikowsky concerto in D major. It is an interesting fact that this concerto was considered too difficult by Leopold Auer, the great Petersburg virtuoso, even to essay at the time it was written, and the first one to attempt it, Adolf Brodsky, was stoned by the critics for attempting it.

Yesterday we heard a young 21-year-old girl play it with sumptuous ease and freedom. Critics also found it in their hearts—or rather their brains—to criticise the composition itslef and declare it impossible. But either they must have heard it impossibly played or they themselves were impossible, for it is rich in harmony and introspective beauty. Miss Parlow's warm, luscious tones, deep-throated at times as 'cello notes, and at others delicate, yielding, tender, brought out all the wonderful thought and emotion contained in the concerto. The D major theme of the allegro movement was an exquisitely moulded, finely outlined, piece of harmony, played with rare grace of phrasing and fine lines of beauteous color.

Miss Parlow's grace of execution is interpretative of the grace of instinctive imagination that is the very spirit of her playing. The canzonetta movement gave her fullest scope for its indulgence. The song of her violin is of rare instrumental perfection, infused with the emotion of the singer. In the passage work Miss Parlow is less expressive, mere brilliancy of execution that cannot be imagined in the mind does not reveal her style of artistry as much as the phrase of indwelling thought. She, however, rose paramount to the technical feats imposed by the composer and received an ovation at the close of each movement.

The programme was opened by a novelty, a suite for orchestra by Georges Enesco. The suite has a prelude for strings in unison and kettledrum and three movements. The effect of the unison is distinctive and impressive at the start, but it is continued to monotony. It establishes a premise of dignity and sustained beauty which is not worked out. The menuth is monotonous and heavy-stepped, while the intermede, which starts well, in unison, develops erratically and unsatisfactorily. The wood-winds show individuality, but run riot, and to little purpose.

The symphony played was the Schumann symphony in D minor, which was written as the composer's second symphony, but afterwards rewritten as his fourth. The delight and insight with which Mr. Fiedler conducts German compositions is proof of the modern theory that only one of the nationality of the compser can throughly interpret the psychology, the deepest intent of his works. Schumann was a composer profoundly intellectual and suggestive, his thoughts are so highly concentrated that their development must be handled with skill and understanding. It was his own soul life that he wrote into his musoic, and his literary genius also shows itself there and clamors for interpretation. But he will be remembered longest in the minds and hearts of his hearers for the smaller forms of expression—his songs—and such passages in his longer works as the romanze in the symphony played ysterday. Here he gives us something that no other composer ever has, and we cling to it in our imagination. The 'cello work in this romanze yesterday was finely colored with thought and imagination.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

Mr. Fiedler has arranged his programme for the second pension fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday evening, April 9. The Wagner part of the programme will include the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the Bacchanale from the first act of Paris' version of "Tannhauser," the "Ride of the Valkyries," which is the introduction to the third act of "Die Walkure," and the "Waldweben" scene from "Siegfried," Josef Hoffman has volunteered his services as soloist and will play the Rubenstein D minor concerto. The first part of the programme will comprise Beethoven's overture to "Egmont" and the fourth concerto for pianoforte.

THE CECILIA SOCIETY AND BOSTON SYMPHONY.

At the Cecilia-Boston Symphony concert on Good Friday evening, April 14, the boy choir of the Emmanuel Church has been secured to assist in the rendering of the Bach's passion music. The soloists are Marie Zimmerman, Janet Spencer, George Hamlin and David Bispham.

BOSTON SUNDAY POST, APRIL 2, 1911

Symphony Orchestra

Miss Carolina White, soprano, who made so favorable an impression at the Boston Opera House toward the end of the season that is just finished, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts of next week. As is well known, Miss White is a native of this city, and has been for the past winter the principal dramatic soprano of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company. To her have fallen two important roles. In December she created in Chicago the part of Minnie in Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West," and in New York a few weeks ago she created the part of Susanna in Wolf-Ferrari's opera, "The Secret of Susanna." Here she will sing as her first number an aria from Catalani's "La Wally," "Ebben? ne andro lontana," and as her second number she will sing "L'Altra Notte," from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele," Marguerite's prison song. The principal orchestral number will be Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, perhaps the greatest of Tschaikowsky's orchestral compositions, which has not been heard here since 1905. The other music will be Sgambati's "Te Deum Laudamus," and Beethoven's "Leonora," overture, No. 3.

Second Pension Concert

With Josef Hofmann as soloist playing the Beethoven Concerto in G-Major No. 4, and with the second half of the programme devoted entirely to Wagnerian music, Mr. Fiedler has succeeded in making a very attractive programme for the second Pension Fund concert, which is to be given in Symphony Hall a week from tonight. Mr. Hofmann has volunteered his services for this concert. The performance of the Concerto will be preceded by Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

The second part of the programme will begin with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." This will be followed by the "Bacchanale" from the first act of "Tannhauser." Then will come the "Ride of the Valkyries," which is the introduction and first part of the third act of "Die Walkure"; then the "Waldweben" scene from the second act of "Siegfried." The concert will be brought to an end by the "Rienzi" overture.

Cecilia and Symphony

For the boy choir needed in the performance of Bach's "Passion" music, which is to be given at the third Cecilia-Boston Symphony concert on Good Friday evening, April 14, the choir of Emmanuel Church of this city has been secured. This is one of the best boy choirs in Boston and it will add much to the pleasure of the evening.

The soloists who have been chosen for this performance are all of them eminent in this particular branch of oratorio work. Marie Zimmerman gained her first real reputation in the Bach Festivals held some years ago in the old Moravian Church in Bethlehem, Penn. Janet Spencer is one of the most talented of the contraltos engaged in oratorio work, while neither George Hamlin nor David Bispham need any introduction to Boston audiences.

Rehearsals are progressing favorably and there should be a memorable performance of this masterpiece.

Second Boston Symphony Pension Fund Concert.

With Josef Hofmann as soloist, playing Beethoven's fourth piano concerto, and with the second half of the program devoted to Wagnerian music, Mr Fiedler has made an attractive list for the second pension fund concert which is to be given in Symphony hall a week from tonight. Mr Hofmann has volunteered his services, and his performance of the concerto will be preceded by Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

The second part of the program will begin with the overture to "The Flying Dutchman." Then will follow the bacchanale, from the first act of the Paris version of "Tannhauser;" "Ride of the Valkyries," from "Die Walkure;" the "Waldweben" scene from "Siegfried," and the concert will be brought to an end by the "Rienzi" overture.

Cecilia and Boston Symphony.

For the boy choir needed in the performance of Bach's "Passion" music, which is to be given at the third Cecilia-Boston Symphony concert Good Friday evening, April 14, the choir of Emmanuel church of this city has been secured. This is one of the best boy choirs in Boston, and it will add much to the pleasure of the evening.

The soloists chosen for this performance include Marie Zimmerman, who gained her first real reputation in the Bach festivals, held some years ago in the old Moravian church in Bethlehem, Penn. Janet Spencer is one of the most talented of the contraltos engaged in oratorio work, and

1, 1911

HE IST

erratically and d-winds show and to little as the Schuor, which was second sym-written as his insight with German com-modern theory

tionality of the erpret the psy-
of his works.
profoundly inhis thoughts that their de-with skill and own soul life usoic, and his itself there and
But he will
the minds and smaller forms and such passthe romanze erday. Here
o other comto it in our ork in this colored with

CONCERT.

ed his programme fund concert of rchestra, which is
y Hall, Sunday
Wagner part of the overture the Bacchanale aris' version of
of the Valky-duction to the kure," and the om "Siegfried," ered his services
he Rubenstein D
rst part of the Beethoven's over-fourth concerto

TY AND BOS-
ONY.

Symphony con-
ning, April 14, mmanuel Church in the render-n music. The nerman, Janot and David Bis-

2, 1911

G-Major No.
of the pro-Wagnerian
eded in mak-mme for the which is to a week from volunteered
They per-will be pre-ure to "Eg-ramme will the Flying followed by first act of comes the which is the of the third the "Wald-ond act of he brought overture,

ony in the per-ion" music,
hird Cecilia-
Good Trioir of Em-
as been se-beat boy add much chosen for em eminent oratorio ained her ach Festi-n the old em, Penn. st talented torio work, nor David to Boston favorably rable per-

From HERALD
Address Washington, D. C.
Date MAR 22 1911

OMELLI IN TRIUMPH

oprano Proves Artist of the First Caliber.

THRILLS AND WINS AUDIENCE

ramatic Songbird Place in Affections of Washington's Musical Clientele by Performance with Boston Symphony Orchestra in Its Farewell Appearance This Season.

The last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given yesterday afternoon before an audience which filled the house, served as a triumph for Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, a new star in the field of dramatic sopranos, and one who is destined to be a leading artist in this country.

She has a voice of great beauty throughout, very high and pure, rich in quality, and of rare carrying power. The first tone of the strange aria of Lia, from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," thrilled and won her audience. She sang the aria with superb tone and phrasing, and put into it wonderful color and dramatic intensity. She sang a second great aria, the "Liebestod," following the prelude from "Tristan and Isolde," another great piece of dramatic singing, full of color and showing great temperament.

Hers was one of the greatest and most intellectual interpretations of this great song, but this could scarcely be said of the work of the orchestra in the "Liebestod." They played the prelude superbly, but the conductor forgot there was any one to consider but the orchestra; therefor, in some of the soloist's most effective bits of singing the orchestra entirely drowned the voice, an inexcusable oversight and selfishness.

Fiedler Dominates Players.

The Brahms Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, opened the programme. It is difficult to perform and a difficult one to love. The orchestra did splendid work in it, which was appreciated by Brahms lovers. It is an interesting symphony, but not one to desire oftener than once a year. Not so with the wonderful tone-poem, "Don Juan," of Richard Strauss', exquisitely played and wonderfully effective. Mr. Fiedler never appeared to a greater advantage, and never seemed to dominate his players so much as in this number. He has imbued them with temperament, even to the point of sacrificing a little of the perfectness of their ensemble, but also he has sacrificed the apparent mechanical style into which they had fallen. Both the tone-poem and the prelude to the Liebestod were satisfying and masterly.

This was Mme. Jomelli's second appearance in Washington, but the first time she did not appear to so great an advantage. That was last season, with the Pittsburg Festival Orchestra. She has a winning personality and a magnificent stage presence, and the distinguished audience was enthusiastic in its approval.

This season of the orchestra in Washington has been the most successful in its history, as they have sold the house out before each concert.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From STAR
Address WASHINGTON, D. C.
Date 3[illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the New National Theater yesterday afternoon Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, as soloist, was enthusiastically greeted. The program opened with Brahms' Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, op. 68, whose mysterious profundity has made it a bone of contention even among the masters of the musical world. The third number, Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Don Juan" (after N. Lenau), op. 20, aroused demonstrations of especial approval. Mme. Jomelli, who has been heard here once before with the Pittsburg Festival Orchestra, appeared in the second and fourth numbers—the recitative and aria of Lia from Debussy's "L'Enfant Prodigue," and the prelude and "Liebestod" (Love Death) from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

[illegible]
[illegible] WASHINGTON, D. C.
Date MAR 21 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifth and last concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, in Providence, will be given in infantry hall on Tuesday evening, April 4th. The orchestra will present as soloist Mme. Louise Homer, the great contralto of the Metropolitan Opera company, who will then make her first appearance in this city. This concert will bring to an end, with appropriate brilliancy, the most successful season the orchestra has ever had here.

From POST
Address Washington, D. C.
Date [illegible] 2 1911

Mrs. Taft occupied a box yesterday afternoon at the New National Theater for the last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. With Mrs. Taft were Mrs. Hollister, of Cincinnati; Mrs. Arthur Brice, of New York, and Mr. and Mrs. Farnham, of New Haven.

Mrs. Leiter had in her box Mrs. Hughes, Mrs. Lurton, Mrs. Buckner Randolph, Mrs. Colin Campbell, and Mrs. Joseph Leiter.

Mrs. McMillan, with Mrs. Preston Gibson, occupied another box.

Mrs. I. T. Mann was hostess at a box party, as were Mrs. Calderon Carlisle, Mrs. C. A. Williams, and Mrs. Lisner.

The British Ambassador and Mrs. Bryce were guests in Mrs. Williams' box.

Among others in the audience were Mrs. Wickersham, the German Ambassador, Countess Luise Alexandra von Bernstorff, Count Pourtales, the Minister of the Netherlands and Mme. Loudon, Mrs. Harlan, Miss Harlan, Mrs. Nicholas Anderson, Mrs. Ten Eyck Wendell, Mrs. B. Rush Qendell, Miss Spang, Mrs. John Hay, Mrs. Heyburn, Mrs. Thomas H. Carter, Mrs. Murray Crane, Miss Boardman, Mrs. Crowninshield, Mrs. Chandler Hale, Mrs. Morton Grinnell, Mrs. Ernst, Mrs. Audenried, Mrs. Randolph McKim, Mrs. Peckham, Mrs. McCallum, Mrs. John M. Biddle, Mrs. Montgomery Blair, the Misses Blair, Miss Lydia Biddle, the Misses Lee, the Baroness de Bode, Miss Letterman, Gen. and Mrs. Goodloe, Mrs. Joseph E. Thropp, Mrs. Clarence Moore, Mrs. George Howard, Mrs. John H. Merriam, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Cumming, Mrs. Ernest Howe, Miss Siebert, Mrs. Richard Wainwright, Commander and Mrs. Gibbons, Mrs. John Rodgers, Mrs. Slater, Mrs. Charles D. Walcott, the Misses Parker, Mrs. Huidekoper, Mr. Maurice Low, Mrs. Champ Clark, Miss Mary Wilcox, Mrs. Frank B. Noyes, Miss Noyes, Mrs. Thomas Hutchinson, Mr. and Mrs. Paul Charlton, Mrs. William P. Eno, Mrs. Robert Hinckley, Miss Gladys Hinckley, Miss Yvonne Townsend, Miss Miriam Crosby, Mrs. John W. Foster, Mrs. Peyton Russell, Mrs. Ralph Jenkins, Mrs. William Slater, and Baroness de Struve.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From [illegible]
Address [illegible]
Date [illegible] 2 1911

streets.

The fifth and last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will be given in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, April 4. The orchestra will present as soloist Mme. Louise Homer, the great contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, who will make her first appearance in this city. This concert will end with brilliancy, the most successful season the orchestra has ever had here.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.

LECTURES ON STRAUSS.

Hans Schneider Tells of "The Symphonic Poem."

Mr. Hans Schneider gave the second of his series of free lectures on "The Symphonic Poem" of Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," which is to be given at the next Boston Symphony concert here, at the Hans Schneider Piano School recital hall yesterday afternoon.

As in the previous lecture, Mr. Schneider closely analyzed the conversation embodied in its relation to the poem which is the basis of the composition. The lecturer was assisted by a class of four piano players who played the score on two pianos. They were the Misses Annie E. R. Whelan, Gladys R. Baker, Cora Colburn and Cora F. Silvia. The respective parts were played over and over again in order to impress the motifs upon the audience which comprised the members of the interpretation class and many subscribers of the Symphony concerts. The last lecture in the series will be given next Wednesday at 5 o'clock.

TRIBUNE
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date MAR 28 1911

The Symphony Soloist.

Mme Carolina White, who takes Mme. Romer's place as soloist at the fifth an last Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Apr 4, is another New England girl, who, lik Nordica, Eames and Farrar, has won place in the foremost rank of operat artists of to-day. She is the latest comer for, with the exception of two years i Italy, her carreer has been limited to th past winter, when she has been the prin cipal dramatic soprano of the Chicago Philadelphia Opera Company. She wa designated by Puccini himself to creat the part of Minnie in the Chicago produc tion of "The Girl of the Golden West" an her impersonation of this character wa the most satisfactory that this countr has seen. When she sang it in Boston s guest at the Boston Opera a few week ago the critics there were enthusiasti over her. Mme. White also created h New York the name-role in Wolf-Fer rari's "The Secret of Susanna." Here sh will sing two arias, Catalani's "Le Wally and the prison song from Boito's "Me fistofele."

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date MAR 29 1911

Boston Symphony Soloist.

Madame Carolina White, who takes Madame Homer's place as soloist at the fifth and last Boston Symphony concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, April 4, is a New England girl, who, like Nordica, Eames and Farrar, has won a place among operatic artists of to-day. She is the latest comer for, with the exception of two seasons in Italy, her career has been limited to the past winter, when she has been the principal dramatic soprano of the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company. Here she will sing two arias, Catalani's "Le Wally" and the prison song from Buito's "Mefistofele."

From AMERICAN
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date MAR 23 1911

LAST CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE RENDITION OF WAGNERIAN MUSIC.

Delights Large Audience at the Lyric—Was Claimed to Have Been the Best Ever Presented in Baltimore—Director Max Fiedler Presented Gold Loving Cup After Performance.

An audience which filled the Lyric to the doors last evening, greatly enjoyed the musical feast given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its magnificent program of Wagner excerpts, with which it closed its present annual season of five concerts. There was no soloist and the program consisted of the following Wagner numbers:

Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, prelude to Lohengrin, funeral music, Act III., from Dusk of the Gods; prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde, prelude to Parsifal, a Siegfried Idyl, overture, Tannhauser.

Wagner was a believer in opera, or rather, finally, in art works in which the human voice, the orchestra and the mise-en-scene were treated as one great triple-corded cable to draw and hold the human mind. Wagner wrote his works not for technical exhibition of scene-paint, or theatrical perfection, or vocal art, but to produce moods with the listener. He did not like to have his music mixed up with that of other composers in concert performances, but always preferred that one occasion should be given entirely to one subject. Even a Wagner concert was not, therefore, according to Wagner's liking.

This year, however, no Wagner operas have been heard in this city, and the appetite has been steadily growing throughout the season to hear a Wagner evening.

No orchestra in the world is better fitted to give a Wagner evening than Max Fiedler's, and the program last evening was rendered as perfectly as is ever possible. Still the moods of the concert were varying and somewhat contradictory. The opening number was the Prelude to the Mortersingers, Wagner's only comic opera. This of course, suggested the honest cobbler, the pedantic teacher, the ardent lover, Walter, the beautiful Eva, and the grotesque members of the musical society.

From the humor of the Meistersinger of Nuremberg the listeners were quickly elevated to the heights of the Holy Grail in the prelude to Parcifal, which requires a whole evening to digest mentally. From this came the gloom of the funeral music from the Duck of the Gods, which can hardly be enjoyed only as a small part of the whole opera, suggesting, as it also does, the entire ring of four operas.

After the death of the gods came the prelude and love death from Tristan and Isolde. Then a rest was taken of 10 minutes, and the prelude to Parsifal was taken up, which was enjoyed by those familiar with the opera itself. The mood then changed to the musically idyllic picture of the birth of Wagner's son, Siegfried.

The most effective number of the evening was the overture to Tannhauser, which closed the concert. This number is very complete in itself, having a definite beginning and ending to its strong medieval mood and which is merely repeated on a larger scale when the entire opera is given. Its rendition last evening was in itself one of the best performances the orchestra has ever given.

During the evening and at the close of the concert, Mr. Fiedler was several times recalled, and he called upon his orchestra to help him receive his ovation.

After the concert Dr. and Mrs. Reuling entertained at dinner at their home, on Mount Vernon Place, the singer, Mr. Alexander Heineman, who had sung for the Ladies' Philharmonic Society. Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Pache, Mr. and Mrs. George T. M. Gibson, Mr. Hugh Jenkins and Mr. and Mrs. Max Fiedler were among the guests. Mr. Pache presented Mr. Fiedler with a gold loving cup in the name of the Baltimore Oratorio Society and in commemoration of their joint performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. Mr. Heineman saug for the company. He had a seat in a box at the symphony concert.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From EVENING SUN
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date BALTIMORE, MD. MAR 23 1911

A Wagner Night

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the fifth and final concert of the season at the Lyric last night, Mr. Fiedler again making up the program on the plan used at last month's concert. Then only two works were chosen, the Violin Concerto and the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, and they were both colossal compositions, showing the highest point in the development of concerto and symphonic forms. The numbers of last night's program, with one exception, were conceived originally for the stage and mark the apex of music drama.

The mighty Wagner was the composer represented, and the works given were particularly welcome, as opportunity to hear them performed by such a splendid body of artists is rare. Although the program did not contain a symphony, a point of objection which may have been raised by some, it nevertheless offered compositions of equal dignity, and they represented the loftiest ideals in musical art.

The concert began with the powerful prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," the "Lohengrin Prelude" following, in contrast to the noble energy and fully developed polyphony of the former. Siegfried's funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" came next, and the first part of the program was brought to a close with the most wonderful emotional music that has ever been conceived—the Prelude and "Liebestod" from the opera of "Tristan and Isolde." The second part opened with the Prelude to "Parsifal"; then came the charming "Siegfried Idyl," a composition written by Wagner as a tribute to his wife upon the birth of their son Siegfried. The themes in the Idyl, with the exception of one—a folk-song, "Schlaf', mein Kind, schlaf' ein"—came from the music drama of "Siegfried," but they are developed differently. The Tannhauser Overture was the final number, and this ever-pleasing composition made a fitting close to a very attractive program.

These works represent the various periods of Wagner's productivity and disclose his great genius as a composer, their subjects expressing many and varied emotions, ranging from the wildly romantic to the sternly tragic, and from tender pathos and religion to the apotheosis of love and self-sacrifice.

Mr. Fiedler gave a very forceful interpretation of the "Meistersinger" prelude and brought out its wonderful polyphonic intertwining, its rich themes and sonorous harmonic treatment in a highly individual manner. The funeral music from "The Dusk of the Gods" was played as it has seldom been heard, Mr. Fiedler showing great care with its rhythmic values and tone balance. It seemed as if the gentlemen of the orchestra were inspired during the rendition of the "Liebestod." They played it superbly, and it is little wonder that they were so enthusiastically applauded, for this music is gripping and radiates with emotion. Mr. Fiedler had the men rise at this outburst of approval and bow their acknowledgments.

In his reading of the Prelude to "Parsifal" Mr. Fiedler was inclined to be too contemplative, some of the tempi being taken too slowly, and here, also, a word of censure should be given to the three flutists, as their intonation was not beyond fault. The happiest moments of the evening were during the rendition of the exquisite "Siegfried Idyl," which was charmingly interpreted. The solo clarinet, oboe and first horn lent poetic grace to this beautiful composition by their delightfully colored phrasing and artistic playing.

Doubtless a more brilliant rendition of the familiar "Tannhauser" overture has never been given here. At its close there was a great demonstration, Mr. Fiedler again sharing honors with the members of the orchestra, and thus this notable evening passed into the city's musical history, and another successful season of Boston Symphony concerts came to an end to the keen regret of our music-loving public.

From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date MAR 23 1911

At Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Concert last night was attended, as usual, by the society music lovers. Alexander Heinemann, the famous Lieder singer, was the center of interest. He occupied a box with Dr. and Mrs. Reuling. Mr. Heinemann was entertained after the concert by Dr. and Mrs. Reuling.

From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date MAR 23 1911

WAGNER SELECTIONS END BOSTON SEASON

Orchestra's Final Concert Was A Treat To Bayreuthian Devotees.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra in its last concert of the season gave a Wagner program. The fact that worthy music must bear the clear and deep impress of its creator's individuality, in its themes and their treatment, in its comprehensive scheme, in its style of diction and its setting for performing agencies makes (in most cases) the dedication of a whole program to excerpts from the works of any one composer both artistically and practically unwise. Artistically unwise because of the unrelieved insistency, in irrelevant succession, of those characteristic moods and modes which distinguish the works of each period maker; and practically unwise because audiences are quick to feel the dulled point of redundant appeal—the repeated presentation of one and the same individuality.

Naturally, the conditions are quite different in an opera the performance of which may occupy a whole evening, for there we find the composer's modes and moods molded into continuity with varying shades of meaning befitting situations incident to the progress of the dramatic plot, the significance of which they are intended to vivify and embellish. That which we see and that which we are incited to think during stage performances are potent factors in making operas interesting in their entirety.

Of all the great masters of music Richard Wagner was most prolific in distinct and diverse moods. This unique futility of initial tonal invention may have been nurtured by his experiences while exploring the field of articulate poetry. While creating the wonderful texts for his music-dramas, he may have opened up deep sources of inspiration in his emotional nature, from which flowed his most individual ideas. Certain it is that an evening of disconnected numbers by Richard Wagner, if wisely chosen, presents great variety and leaves little opportunity for ennui to intrude upon our receptivity.

Mr. Fiedler played the following selections:

Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"	Wagner
Prelude to "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Funeral Music, Act III., from "Dusk of the Gods"	Wagner
Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan and Isolde"	Wagner
Prelude to "Parsifal"	Wagner
"A Siegfried Idyl"	Wagner
Overture—"Tannhauser"	Wagner

The prelude to "The Mastersingers of Neuremberg" is the condensed spirit, the essence of Wagner's greatest creation. It is the most frank, terse and hearty expression of human moods existent, besides being a marvelous exhibition of contrapuntal virtuosity and orchestral eloquence. Mr. Fiedler was wise in placing this work at the head of his list, and it received full justice at his hands.

The prelude to "Lohengrin" is not at all human, but it is consistently mystic. It is subtly conceived and developed, but one could wish the high violin episode were as short at the beginning as it is at the close of the prelude, for the extreme altitude and somewhat wavering manner makes hearers more and more apprehensive as it continues. It is one of the few Wagner fancies which failed to attain convincing fulfillment. Not even the exceptional artists of the Boston Orchestra could impart full assurance to this device.

The funeral music from "Dusk of the Gods" is as giganfic in its portrayal of the ceremonial grief of the mythological nobility with whom Wagner peopled the "Ring" at the death of Siegfried as is "The Mastersingers" in its portrayal of human passions. It's full significance was developed in last evening's reading. The "Tristan and Isolde" selection was, as usual, delightful, but the "Parsifal" in such company appeared to poor advantage. Weakened life pulsations and effort are evident in its makeup. The "Siegfried Idyl" should have occurred earlier on the program. It is very long and presents few undulations, and, therefore, although extremely beautiful, it would have been more pleasing if played to untired ears. The "Tannhauser" was the right number for the season's finale, and it was exceptionally well performed.

O. B. B.

From SUN
Address

CHORUS GIRL HIS ACCUSER

Member Of Symphony Orchestra Is Fined And Sent To Jail.

Bruno Rennert, 31 years old, a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was fined $25 and costs and sentenced to 10 days in jail by Justice Loden, at the Western Police Station, yesterday on the charge of insulting and striking Miss Blanche Horton, a member of Sam Bernard's company.

Miss Horton, with several friends, was standing at Howard and Fayette streets among a crowd watching an accident in which an automobile, driven by George Horning, struck a pedestrian, when, she said, Rennert accosted her, and she in turn slapped his face.

Rennert, it is said, then struck the young lady. Patrolman Lyons arrested the combatants.

At the hearing it was brought out that Rennert, who gives his address as Boston, had come to this city to take part in the Boston Symphony concert given last night at the Lyric.

Justice Loden, in passing sentence, administered a scathing reprimand to Rennert and told him that such actions would not be tolerated in Baltimore.

From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date MAR 23 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN WAGNER PROGRAM

Welcome Interlude To Music Of French And Italian School.

The Wagner drought that has been characteristic of the local musical season rapidly coming to a close will be broken tonight at the last concert of the year by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when Director Fiedler will present a program made up entirely of compositions by the great German music-dramatist. Not in a long time has there been so little attention paid to Wagner as has been the case this winter, and it appears that this state of affairs is by no means restricted to Baltimore, but that it has prevailed to a very striking extent in New York, Boston and elsewhere.

In the Northern cities, however, there have been more or less frequent chances of hearing the Wagner opera, but in Baltimore the case has been different, as the opera company giving the season here has been devoting its attention exclusively to the Italian and modern French schools. All winter long there have been heard longings for Wagner, and as an evidence of the eagerness to drink at the Wagnerian fount the enormous demand for seats is striking.

The program Mr. Fiedler has selected is a widely inclusive one, ranging from the beautiful Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" to the "Tannhauser" Overture, quite unanimously considered not only Wagner's greatest overture but possibly the greatest existent. Between these radicall different numbers will be the Prelude to "Lohengrin," missing nothing in loveliness because of its comparative shortness; the Funeral March from "Gotterdammerung"—which the Orchestra plast played here, with wonderful impressiveness, two winters ago; the Prelude and Liebstod from "Tristan und Isolde"; the Prelude to "Parsifal," and the "Siegfried" Idyl. There will be no soloist.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From STAR
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date MAR 23 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT DELIGHTS

Program of Wagner Excerpts Proves Popular at Lyric.

The musical feast given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its magnificent program of Wagner excerpts, with which it closed its present annual season of five concerts, delighted a large audience at the Lyric last night. There was no soloist and the program consisted of the following Wagner numbers:

Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremberg, prelude to Lohengrin, funeral music, Act III., from Dusk of the Gods; prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde, prelude to Parsifal, a Siegfried Idyl, overture, Tannhauser.

Wagner was a believer in opera, or rather, finally, in art works in which the human voice, the orchestra and the mise-en-scene were treated as one great triple-corded cable to draw and hold the human mind. Wagner wrote his works not for technical exhibition of scenepaint, or theatrical perfection, or vocal art, but to produce moods with the listener. He did not like to have his music mixed up with that of other composers in concert performances, but always preferred that one occasion should be given entirely to one subject. Even a Wagner concert was not, therefore, according to Wagner's liking.

This year, however, no Wagner operas have been heard in this city, and the appetite has been steadily growing throughout the season to hear a Wagner evening.

No orchestra in the world is better fitted to give a Wagner evening than Max Fiedler's, and the program last evening was rendered as perfectly as is ever possible. Still the moods of the concert were varying and somewhat contradictory. The opening number was the prelude to the Mastersinger, Wagner's only comic opera. This of course, suggested the honest cobbler, the pedantic teacher, the ardent lover, Walter, the beautiful Eva, and the grotesque members of the musical society.

From the humor of the Meistersinger of Nuremberg the listeners were quickly elevated to the heights of the Holy Grail in the prelude to Lohengrin, which requires a whole evening to digest mentally. From this came the gloom of the funeral music from the Dusk of the Gods, which can hardly be enjoyed only as a small part of the whole opera, suggesting, as it also does, the entire ring of four operas.

After the death of the gods came the prelude and love death from Tristan and Isolde. Then a rest was taken of 10 minutes, and the prelude to Parsifal was taken up, which was enjoyed by those familiar with the opera itself. The mood then changed to the musically idyllic picture of the birth of Wagner's son, Siegfried.

The most effective number of the evening was the overture to Tannhauser, which closed the concert. This number is very complete in itself, having a definite beginning and ending to its strong medieval mood and which is merely repeated on a larger scale when the entire opera is given. Its rendition last evening was in itself one of the best performances the orchestra has ever given.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From TELEGRAPH
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date

Last Boston Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final concert of the present season last night at the Academy, and this concert concluded a really remarkable series. During the year Melba and Mischa Elman have appeared, and each succeeding concert has confirmed the impression that in Mr. Fiedler the orchestra has a director, the peer of any of his illustrious predecessors. Thorough drillmaster, slighting no detail, broad and sympathetic interpreter, Mr. Fiedler has met the most exacting demands of the professional critic; and the educational and inspirational value of his work Philadelphia audiences have acknowledged with the greatest enthusiasm.

Last night's program had been carefully chosen and included inter alia the immortal Schubert Symphony in C major. It would be impossible to realize and even difficult to imagine a more perfect rendition; the exquisite balance of the Boston Orchestra is of prime importance for the great beauty and delicacy of this musical fabric, that as quickly betrays charlatanism in interpretation as it evinces perfection of execution. There are none of those bizarre violations of musical art and tradition that characterize more recent German symphonic composition; but, on the contrary, this music miracle of Schubert's has caught the very essence of life's sweetness and purity. Another orchestral number, a stirring symphonic poem by Jean Sibelius, entitled "Finlandia," is a great favorite of Mr. Fiedler's; it is a veritable epic in its boldness, and was magnificently rendered. Madame Louise Kirkby-Lunn, the English contralto, had chosen Saint-Saens' setting to Victor Hugo's ballad, "La Fiancee du Timbalier," and, as her second number, the big recitative and aria, "Gerechter Gott," from the third act of Wagner's "Rienzi." These numbers fitted admirably into this program of contrasts, and in both, especially in the dramatic intensity of the second, the contralto's fine voice appeared in wonderful advantage. This "Rienzi" aria is deservedly a favorite one for low voice and ranks in music literature with even such magnificent conceptions as the "Samson and Delilah" airs for its wealth of color and depth of feeling are very great.

From SUN
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date MAR 23 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORES

Last Concert Of The Season A Wagner Triumph.

The fifth and last Boston Symphony Concert was given last night at the Lyric to an immense audience, the program being as follows:

Prelude to The Mastersingers of Nuremburg	Wagner
Prelude to Lohengrin	Wagner
Funeral Music, Act III, from Dusk of the Gods	Wagner
Prelude and Liebestod from Tristan and Isolde	Wagner
Prelude to Parsifal	Wagner
A Siegfried Idyl	Wagner
Overture, Tannhauser	Wagner

William Fiedler made a splendid choice in his decision to allow the final program of the season to be a Wagner program. Wagner, with all his might and majesty commands both respect and attention, and selections from his music form a strong program, especially when no soloist is presented. In fact, Wagner was so essentially a writer for orchestra, that an orchestral exhibition of his works seems to be thoroughly in order, when so great and efficient organization forms the medium of delivery.

Moreover, a vocalist is at a disadvantage when appearing on a concert stage, unaccompanied by scenic surroundings, and background. Therefore, and for many other reasons, Mr. Fiedler showed great wisdom, and the audience recognized the fact by its size and enthusiasm.

The orchestra itself is as perfect an organization as exists and its work depends, therefore, entirely upon the skill and conception of the conductor.

The reading of the opening number was a trifle cold and slightly mechanical. Technically it was correct. This number was, however, the least satisfactory of the whole program.

About the other works there was exhibited a keen perception of the great composer's stupendous creations. His vitality, his versatility, were well brought out, his remarkable and beautiful orchestral effects being strongly marked, and Mr. Fiedler was particularly happy in the achievement of the climaxes that render Wagner's music s strong, so dramatic, and, above all, so effective.

If any preference could be given to the performance of one selection among so many wonders it should fall upon "A Siegfried Idyl." The poetic treatment this work received was unusually fine, and every detail in the instrumentation was carefully and strongly accentuated. The performance was certainly a tribute to Mr. Fiedler's skill as a conductor and as an interpreter of Wagner.

W. G. C.

Loving Cup For Mr. Fiedler.

Doctor and Mrs. George Reuling gave a supper after the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert last night at their home, 103 West Monument street. The guests were Mr. Alexander Heinemann, the German "Lieder" singer; Mr. Max Fiedler, leader of the orchestra; Mrs. Fiedler, Mr. and Mrs. George T. M. Gibson, Mr. Hugh Jenkins, Monsieur Mandelbrodt and Mr. Joseph Pache.

After the supper Mr. Heinemann sang. Mr. Pache presented to Mr. Fiedler a gold loving cup in the name of the society, as a souvenir of the Ninth Symphony, which the society sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week.

From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD.
Date

Oratorio Society Gives Cup To Max Fiedler

As an evidence of the esteem in which Max Fiedler, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is held by the members of the Baltimore Oratorio Society, the director has been presented a gold loving cup. The presentation was made by Joseph Pache, conductor of the Oratorio Society, at a dinner given last night by Dr. and Mrs. George Reuling at their residence.

Among those present at the dinner were Mr. and Mrs. Fiedler, Alexander Heinemann, J. Maedelbrod, Mr. and Mrs. Pache, Hugh Jenkins and Mr. and Mrs. George T. M. Gibson. Mr. Gibson is president of the Oratorio Society and added a few words to Mr. Pache's presentation address.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From NEWS
Address BALTIMORE, MD.

Fined And Jailed For Striking Miss Horton

Bruno Rennert, who said he was a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was fined $25 and given 10 days in Jail by Justice Loden yesterday afternoon for striking Miss Blanche Horton, a member of the "Sam" Bernard Company playing at the Auditorium. A scathing rebuke went with the sentence.

According to the testimony, Miss Horton and some friends had stopped at Howard and Fayette streets to look at a disabled automobile, and Rennert accosted her. When the girl resented a remark with a slap in the face it is said that Rennert returned the blow.

From EVE. BULLETIN
Address Philadelphia, Pa.
Date

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn Soloist at Closing Concert of the Season

A bountiful musical feast was provided by Max Fiedler for the large audience which heard the Boston Orchestra's fifth and last concert of the season, in the Academy of Music last night. The piece de resistance was that "symphony of divine length," Schubert's C-major, and the other purely instrumental offerings were "Finlandia," a symphonic poem by Sibelius, which is said to be a particular favorite of the orchestra's talented conductor, and Tschaikowsky's Theme and Variations from Suite No. 3, in G-major. Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, who has been heard here before as Kundry in the English production of "Parsifal" and as Erda in "Siegfried," was the soloist and sang "The Drummer's Betrothed," Saint-Saens's musical setting of a Victor Hugo ballad, and a dramatic aria from Wagner's "Rienzi," "My Life Fades In Its Blossom."

By a reversal of the Biblical arrangement of things excellent, the symphony was played first, and very happily, for its elaborate and intricate beauties require unwearied ears for their full enjoyment. It was marvellously well played, despite the unusually fast tempo which Mr. Fiedler insisted upon in the scherzo and the finale. The orchestra appeared at its best, perhaps, in the andante—a luscious blending of rich themes and eccentric rhythms—full of elusive beauties of melody and harmony. Not one of these was blurred or slighted in Mr. Fiedler's poetic reading, and the audience expressed enthusiastic approval of his achievement. "Finlandia," a composition designed to express the aspirations and disappointments of an oppressed people, formed, in its passionate utterance, a striking and pleasing contrast to the symphony. This outpouring of one of the most individual of modern composers was played with broad power and its unfamiliar harmonies were given deep significance. The Tschaikowsky variations displayed the amazing virtuosity of the various choirs of the orchestra, though the concert would have been sufficiently long and varied without it.

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn sang the Saint-Saens ballad with feeling. Her voice is big and powerful, rich and organ-toned in the lower register and unusually flexible for a contralto. She was at her best in the "Rienzi" aria, where her dramatic power had a better chance for display, and she interpreted the Wagnerian music with a beauty which was cordially acknowledged.

[197]

...ORIA AMERICAN
...LADELPHIA, PA
MAR 23 1911

SCHUBERT SYMPHONY GIVEN FINE RENDITION

Boston's Famous Orchestra Presents Wonderful Tone Picture in C Major

KIRKBY-LUNN IS SOLOIST

Well-Known Prima Donna Is Effective in Selections From Wagner's 'Rienzi'

SCHUBERT'S wonderful symphony in C major, No. 7, was the piece de resistance in the program given last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music. The other numbers were "The Drummer's Bethrothed," a ballad of Victor Hugo, set for solo and orchestra by Saint-Saens; "Finlandia," a symphonic poem for the orchestra by Sibelius; selection from Wagner's opera, "Rienzi," solo and orchestra, and the theme and variations from Tschaikowsky's suite No. 3 in G major, opus 55.

Max Fiedler, the vteran conductor, guided the orchestra through the exceedingly well-rendered program, and the solo parts were sung by Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, who will be remembered for her tour of the country in "Parsifal" under the management of Savage.

The Schubert symphony is a concert in itself, requiring fully an hour for the performance of the four difficult movements. Schumann, in a description of this symphony after he had heard it for the first time, wrote:

"Granted that we believe that this outer world, today fair, tomorrow dark, may appeal deeply to the inmost heart of the poet and musician, and that more than merely lovely melody, something above and beyond sorrow and joy, lies concealed in this symphony—nay, more, that we are by music transported to a region where we can never remember to have been before—to experience all this we must listen to symphonies such as this."

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn was especially effective in the selections from "Rienzi." She sang "Just God" and the aria, "My Life Fades in Its Blossom," from the third act. The two selections served to demonstrated the depth and richness of her contralto voice in "Just God" and her adaptability to the higher range in the aria.

In "Finlaidia" and Tschaikowsky's Suite No. 3 the orchestra responded to the many brilliant parts with much temperament. The performance throughout was warmly applauded by a large audience representative of Philadelphia's musical circles.

...hia, Pa.
...AR 1911

...Closing

...rovided ...udience ...'s fifth ...in the ...e piece ...ony of ...or, and ...fferings ...em by ...rticulat ...ed con... ...ne and ...major. ...heard ...English ...rda in ...d sang ...Saint-... ...Hugo ...Wag... ...in Tu... ...rrange... ...phony ...y, for ...les re... ...ill en... ...play... ...tempo ...in the ...tra ap... ...he an... ...themes ...elusive ...Not ...nted in ...the au... ...roval of ...compo... ...rations ...ed peo... ...erance, ...to the ...one of ...mposers ...its un... ...ep sig... ...riations ...of the ...thought ...ficiently ...Saint-... ...voice is ...an-toned ...lly flexi... ...her best ...dramatic ...display. ...in music ...lly ac...

...Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
RECORD
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Schubert Work Played—Kirkby-Lunn as Soloist.

The last concert of a series of five was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music last night. There was a large audience, but the fact that there were some empty boxes and seats was due probably to the playing of the Schubert C major symphony, given so recently by the Philadelphia Orchestra. Although it is one of the greatest and most absorbing of the symphonies, the majority of orchestral patrons are satisfied with the hearing of the work in a year. This is true of practically all such works, and furnishes a good reason for the non-repetition of symphonies which have been played within a season by our own orchestra.

The novelty of the program was a symphonic poem, "Finlandia," composed by Finland's most distinguished musician, Jean Sibelius, whose symphony was given so successfully by the Philadelphia Orchestra a short time ago. "Finlandia" is a very short work, beautifully melodious in parts, and could more fittingly be called a rhapsody. The soloist was Madame Kirkby Lunn, the English contralto. She sang Saint-Saens' dramatic ballad after Hugo's poem, "The Drummer's Bethrothed," and later the scene, "Just God," and aria, "My Life Fades in its Blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi." Madame Kirkby Lunn has a voice of wide range, well trained and used intelligently, but rather lacking in the quality which make the great contralto-sympathy. She was given a cordial reception, being recalled several times and presented with flowers.

The closing number of the program was Tschaikowsky's theme and variations from Suite No. 3 in G major.

PRESS
...ss PHILADELPHIA, PA.
...1911

LAST CONCERT OF BOSTON SYMPHONY

Program.

Symphony in C major, No. 7.....Schubert
"The Drummer's Betrothed," Ballad of Victor Hugo, for Solo Voice and Orchestra, Op. 82.....Saint-Saens
"Finlandia," Symphonic Poem for Orchestra, Op. 26, No. 7.....Sibelius
Scene, "Just God!" and Aria, "My Life Fades in its Blossom," from "Rienzi," Act III.....Wagner
No. 9
Theme and Variations from Suite No. 3, in G major, Op. 55.....Tschaikowsky

Soloist, Mme. Kirkby-Lunn.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth and last concert of the season at the Academy of Music last evening, with Kirkby-Lunn, contralto, who has not been heard here for some time, as soloist. There was a large audience present—not the largest of the season—but one of the most enthusiastic. The program was especially well arranged and representing considerable character. The symphony was the first number played, Schubert's C major, No. 7, the only Schubert composition given by the orchestra this season.

Director Fiedler gave his finished reading of all four movements. While many lovers of the German composer do not find their greatest pleasure in his No. 7, there is nothing he has written, however, which is more admired than its second movement, not even his marvelously beautiful andante to his "Unfinished Symphony."

In many respects it is the greatest of all compositions for the trombone, and the Boston orchestra has a remarkably clever trio in Messrs, Hampe, Mausebach and Kenfield. They played nobly, and especially so the coda, the alternation of tenor and bass trombones blending admirably. The andante movement was shaded delicately, and the oboe here deserves special praise. The third movement was given at an especially rapid pace, but in spite of that, the developed theme stood out prominently. The beautiful soft, singing melody of the third movement was admirably given and showed the great breadth of execution of the violins. In fact, the whole symphony was so well done that Mr. Fiedler received an ovation at its conclusion, and not only was recalled himself a number of times, but he asked the musicians to rise to receive with him the approbation of the audience.

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn's Numbers.

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn, the favorite contralto, who has delighted frequently in opera in this city, followed the Symphony. She was cordially received when she appeared, and unusually enthusiastic was the applause that followed her singing of "The Drummer's Betrothed," by Saint-Saens. She was attractively gowned in pink, and her voice still retains all that liquid and delightful lower register of tone, which penetrates and brings unusual pleasure. Especially commendable is her clear enunciation, whether in the French of the Saint-Saens' number, or in her German number, the scene and aria "My life fades in the blossom," from Wagner's "Rienzi." The latter composition showed her voice to its best advantage.

The Wagner number was the fourth on the program, and was preceded by Sibelius' "Finlandia," a composition along the usual odd style of the Finnish composer, and was followed by Tschaikowsky's theme and variations from Suite No. 3 in G Major, one of his most showy short compositions. Both numbers were admirably given, and the latter gave Concert Master Anton Witek a considerable part for the first violin, played. At the conclusion of the concert Director Fiedler was given a most cordial farewell reception.

...Paper Clipping Bureau in the World
...m INQUIRER
...ress
...e

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concert of Visiting Orchestra at Academy Last Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert of the present series at the Academy of Music last evening, when the principal number on the program was the great C major symphony of Schubert. This was done by the Philadelphia Orchestra earlier in the season, but it is such a beautiful, such an inspired and inspiring work that the intelligently appreciative listener can never tire hearing it, and its luminous, eloquent technically brilliant and tone perfect performance under Mr. Fiedler's direction was a deep and unalloyed delight. Other things in which the orchestra was heard were Sibelius' highly pictorial and profoundly emotional symphonic poem of "Finlandia" and the well-known Theme and Variations from Tschaikowsky's suite No. 3, Op. 55. The assisting artist of the occasion was the distinguished English contralto, Madam Kirkby-Lunn, who is well and favorably known to American audiences and whose fine voice and admirable art were effectively exhibited in Saint-Saens' setting of Victor Hugo's ballad of "The Drummer's Betrothed," and in the aria "My Life Fades in Its Blossom" from Richard Wagner's early opera of "Rienzi." The audience was large and there was no lack of applause.

...rom PUBLIC LEDGER
...ddress PHILADELPHIA, PA.
...te ...1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Mme. Kirkby-Lunn the Soloist, and Schubert's C Major Symphony Is Played.

1. Schubert: C major Symphony.
2. Saint-Saens: "The Drummer's Betrothed." Ballad of Victor Hugo.
3. Sibelius: "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem.
4. Wagner: Scene and Aria ("My Life Fades") from "Rienzi."
5. Tschaikowsky: Theme and Variations, from Third Suite.

The programme of the fifth and last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy last night brought forward Madame Kirkby-Lunn, contralto, as the soloist, and presented a highly interesting work of Sibelius, with Schubert's symphony in an unusual position at the head of the programme.

Madame Kirkby-Lunn, for whom a white canvas pathway had been thoughtfully laid to the footlights, displayed a rare degree of poetic sensibility in the setting of Hugo's ballad, the French text of which was closely followed by the audience, as was proved by the rustling when the page of the programme book was turned.

Her voice has not the glorious, penetrative resonance of that of the unique contralto who was heard last week with the Philadelphia Orchestra, but Madame Kirkby-Lunn's art, by its mentality, its sheer intellectual distinction, asserts itself scarcely less commandingly.

Each clearly enunciated word was given its fullest sentimental significance her interpretation was informed with a rare degree of insight and discernment. She was vigorously recalled and an armful of flowers was her portion.

The Wagner number—curiously un-Wagnerian is this work of the earlier phase of the composer's development—was especially interesting from the rarity of its occurrence on the musical menu.

The Schubert Symphony, so beautifully read by our own players not long since, was reheard with every evidence of keenest appreciation. In its almost continuously buoyant mood it represents the side of Schubert's musical personality more often disclosed in his songs—"Sylvia" for example—than in his symphony work.

The noble and stirring "Finlandia," of Sibelius, an epic of national ideals and a people's destiny, was perhaps the best-liked music of the evening, though the concluding Theme and Variations of Tschaikowsky's magnificent constructive imagination made an impression that will long outlast the cessation of its majestic ending.

Especially delightful were the chorale of the woodwind in the seventh variation, the unctuous soliloquy of the English horn in the eighth, the brilliant cadenza of Concertmeister Witek's solo violin in the ninth, and the tremendous finale with the reverberant drums and the challenging brasses.

Mr. Fiedler, as usual, bore his honors modestly, and made little parade of his own individuality upon the dais. The large local following the Boston players have earned for themselves was glad to learn that the dates for next season have already been chosen—November 6, December 4, January 8, February 9 and March 18.

...om EVE. JOURNAL
...dress New York City.
...te

The interesting feature of the fifth and last evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given in Carnegie Hall to-morrow, will be the debut here of Anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. Here, as in Boston, he will play the Beethoven concerto. The symphony of the evening will be Brahms's in C minor No. 1, which will open the programme, and the concert will be ended by Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Don Juan." At the last matinee concert next Saturday afternoon the soloist will be Alwin Schroeder, the justly admired artist who shares with Heinrich Warnke the first desk of the 'cello section. He will play Tschaikowsky's variations on a rococo theme. The orchestral part of the programme will comprise Wagner's prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg," the "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's fifth symphony.

STAATS ZEITUNG
...s New York City.
MAR 23 1911

Im Reiche der Töne.

Im Opern-Saale der Academy of Music giebt morgen Abend das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter Max Fiedler's Leitung das fünfte große Konzert der Saison. Als Solist wirkt der hervorragende böhmische Violinist Anton Witek mit. Das Programm enthält Piecen von Brahms, Dvorak, Beethoven und Weber.

Heute Abend veranstalten Frl. Florence Rue (Violine) und Frl. Emily Braun (Piano) in der Memorial Hall an Flatbush Ave. und Schermerhorn Str. ein Recital mit vielversprechendem Programm. Die beiden jungen Künstlerinnen, die aus dem Hugo Steinbruch'schen Musik-Konservatorium hervorgegangen sind, werden Tonschöpfungen von Beethoven, Rubinstein, Chopin, Vieuxtemps, Schubert-Wilhelmj, Gade und Leonard zu Gehör bringen. Herr Steinbruch hat die Begleitung am Klavier übernommen.

...Gesellges aus Brooklyn.
MAR 23 1911

— Im Opern-Saale der Academy of Music giebt morgen Abend das Bostoner Symphonie-Orchester unter Max Fiedler's Leitung das fünfte große Konzert der Saison. Als Solist wirkt der hervorragende böhmische Violinist Anton Witek mit. Das Programm enthält Piecen von Brahms, Dvorak, Beethoven und Weber.

— Zu einem bestimmten Resultate hin...

...PRESS
...w York City
MAR 24 1911

Witek Makes Bow as Soloist.

Though Anton Witek, concert master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, brought with him from Europe an excellent reputation, he caused no little surprise last night in Carnegie Hall when he appeared as soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifth and last evening concert of the season. Whatever the qualities are which make a man valuable in the responsible position of concert master, perfect technical finish does not seem to be one of the most indispensable requirements. At any rate, many men recognized as excellent in this post are rough diamonds when they appear as soloists, impeccable though their musicianship may be.

Witek, however, proved an exception among violinists of his kind, for he revealed himself in Beethoven's concerto in D major a virtuoso of the first rank, capable of coping with the most exciting demands of his instrument as if they were child's play. His most precious possession, perhaps, is a tone of remarkable purity and penetrating sweetness, for which, no doubt, his fine Stadivarius violin is in part responsible. With this, however, he combines a highly developed technique. The fingers of his left hand are precise and nimble messengers of his will; his bowing is light and finely poised, yet not lacking in authority.

To be sure, Witek's reading of the Beethoven concerto was not of a sort to stir the emotions deeply. Polished rather than profound, it disclosed in the performer great technical proficiency rather than interpretative penetration. But it was an enjoyable offering, nevertheless, and proved the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new concert master is fully worthy of being at the head of an orchestra of virtuosos.

The evening opened with a performance of Brahms's Symphony No. 1 in C minor, which in point of euphony, if not in every other respect, was worthy of the Boston Orchestra. Fiedler's tempo in the first movement was too fast. He also took the beautiful Andante at an unduly accelerated pace and with a peculiar uncertainty of rhythm. If the conductor's reading of the Brahms symphony failed to give satisfaction it loomed at any rate miles above the performance of the "Don Juan" tone-poem by Strauss, which brought the evening to a painful end.

If the orchestra had been reading this music at sight there would be nothing but praise. As it was, the results were so far below the Boston standard, so far inferior, indeed, to any performance this observer ever has heard of Strauss's work—inferior even to that by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra under Fiedler when he first appeared in America—that it was hard to believe one's senses.

It seems high time, judging from this exhibition, for Karl Muck to return to his job in the Hub.

EVE. WORLD
...ss New York City.
MAR 24 1911

Anton Witek Soloist With Boston Orchestra

Concert Master of the Organization Distinguishes Himself in a Beethoven Violin Concerto—Brahms's First Symphony and Strauss's "Don Juan" Played.

BY SYLVESTER RAWLING.

ANTON WITEK, concert-master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the soloist at the fifth and last New York evening concert of the season by the organization in Carnegie Hall last night. He was heard in Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, op. 61, and acquitted himself admirably. His tone is large and singing, and his control of the instrument is masterly. He was recalled many times by a large and cultivated musical audience such as the Boston Symphony concerts always attract.

The programme began with Brahms's first beautiful symphony in C minor, op. 68, which was played superbly throughout its four movements by this remarkable band. At the close the applause lasted until Mr. Fiedler made the whole orchestra rise to acknowledge it. The third and closing number was Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan," once thought revolutionary but now accepted by conservative music lovers as a composition no less interesting than it is astonishing. Its presentation was such as to maintain the best traditions of the orchestra.

At the matinee to-morrow, also the last of the season, Alwin Schroeder, the distinguished 'cellist of the band, will be the soloist.

SUN

New York City.

MAR 24 1911

MUSIC FROM CLASSIC BOSTON

LAST EVENING OF THE EASTERN SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Musicians From the Hub Give Great Pleasure With the First Symphony of Brahms—Witek, the Concertmaster, Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

History repeated itself at the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's evening concerts, which occupied Carnegie Hall last night. The repetition consisted in the record of crowded auditorium which has come to be the happy state of these concerts all the time. The programme was of a kind to give great delight to all those musical enthusiasts who do not regard it as the mark of superior intelligence to regard with scorn the sonata form. It comprised the C minor symphony of Brahms, now generally accorded a position among the orchestral classics; Beethoven's violin concerto and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Don Juan," which in the opinion of many is the most noteworthy creation of this singularly gifted musician.

The performance of the Brahms symphony served several purposes, but perhaps no better one than its evocation of the demonstrative approval of the audience. The inner brotherhood of New York's musical connoisseurs can be found gathered together at the Boston Symphony concerts, and it is a joy to observe the certainty with which it proclaims its opinions.

It was well pleased with the performance of the Brahms symphony. It was a beautiful piece of orchestral delivery, so clear, so exquisitely balanced, so noble in tonal quality and so delicately graded that it was not till it was all over that one wondered just what was missing. And then perhaps there was only a doubt as to whether Conductor Max Fiedler had not done wisely in sacrificing brilliant dynamic climaxes and the pulse of a temperamental utterance to that suave nobility of instrumental speech and that reposeful proclamation of the melodic message of the composer.

The C minor symphony is a many sided work and it bears a calm reading admirably. The marvellous slow movement, fit companion for some of the slow movements of Beethoven, floats perfectly in an atmosphere of serenity and the dainty intermezzo asks for gentle treatment. In the finale, which some affect to believe resembles thematically the last movement of Beethoven's ninth symphony, Mr. Fiedler permitted his forces to play with more aggressive spirit and the symphony came to a moving close.

The solo performer was Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, whose playing of the Beethoven concerto gave no small pleasure. Its merits were chiefly in the domain of tone and clarity. The quality of tone which the player drew from his violin was very sweet, pure and penetrating, though at no time imposing in breadth or size. His finger board technic was almost impeccable and his bowing had an inexhaustible resource of grace and delicacy of touch.

His reading of the music was simple, unaffected and dignified. It probed no great depths and it soared into no cloudless heights. There is more feeling in this music than Mr. Witek found in it, yet there were respect and an artistic attitude in his reading altogether praiseworthy. Perhaps one might summarize the performance by saying that it was cool and perfectly poised, polished and almost flawless in detail, but nevertheless subjective with the subjectivity of a very cool and contemplative spirit.

From EVE. POST.

New York City.

Address

MAR 24 1911

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Brahms lovers of this town, after being kept on rather short rations this season, were regaled last night by a very respectable performance of his first symphony by Max Fiedler and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Yet, judging by the mild applause after the first three movements, they did not get all they had expected. After the fourth movement, however, there was tumultuous applause; the conductor had to come back repeatedly, and finally he made his players get up and bow. In this movement Brahms, as everybody knows, went into partnership with the late lamented Ludwig von Beethoven, with excellent results.

At the other end of the programme Mr. Fiedler had Strauss's "Don Juan." Between the two the orchestra's concert master, Anton Witek, played Beethoven's violin concerto with agreeable tone, and good technique and phrasing.

For this evening's concert in Brooklyn Mr. Fiedler has prepared an interesting programme, including Brahms's "Academic" Overture, Dvorák's "New World" Symphony, Beethoven's violin concerto, and Weber's [illegible] overture.

From EVE. SUN

New York City.

Address

MAR 24 1911

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S LAST STAND FOR BRAHMS.

"These Are My Jewels," Says the Hub, Too, of Witek and Schroeder—Gadski, Homer, Reiss and Soomer in a Three-Days Grand Opera Mixup—Gatti Hears Clarence Whitehill, Who Might Have Sung "Hans Sachs."

It was in the excited and "talky" intermission of last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall that a veteran opera-goer said: "If I had paid $200 for my symphony subscription this year, as I do for my opera, I think the last forty minutes would have repaid it all. In absolute music, there's nothing like that." He spoke of the performance of the Brahms First symphony. That "Tenth Symphony," as it is called, left the audience all in a glow and brought the orchestra up-standing to acknowledge the applause of the finest audience since Paderewski last played or Sembrich sailed away. With Brahms the Bostonian Fiedler brought his evening concerts to a classic close, as he will the matinées to-morrow with Beethoven.

With a "These are my jewels" expression, the twin guardians of the visiting hundred, Ellis and Brennan, also brought forward two soliosts from their orchestra for these farewells. Fo-morrow's 'cello star is Schroeder, the most universally beloved veteran in any American band to-day. Last night's man was the new first violin, Witek. For this same big fellow, by the way, they had reserved all rights to the Beethoven concerto that Mischa Elman begged hard to play on his tour with the Hub men. Witek wore his honors modestly. H warmed up his fingers by playing as the others did in the orchestral introduction and interludes to the first fiddler's show-piece. Indeed, Sylvain Noack, who has shorter hair and who sat at Witek's desk, was almost as much of a star in parts of Brahms's symphony and ladylike solo voices of Strauss's "Don Juan."

Only Strauss, Brahms and Beethoven, oddly enough, have occurred more than once among the composers represented on five Boston Symphony evening programmes in New York; and only Beethoven, Liszt and Wagner twice in the matinées. There has been no man since Theodore Thomas whose calm control of a band is like Max Fiedler's. The programmes recalled how Leopold Damrosch long ago beat Thomas by seven days producing the Brahms symphony. The slow movement last night was applauded with weight and favor of hands not lightly won, and the concluding Alpine horn call—the mental vision was Mr Apthorp's, quoted by Philip Hale,—those booming horns and the joyous hymn-like conclusion were not to be heard without emotion. In the very reserved climax was the greater illumination.

We have to confess that the Beethoven concerto can be heard too often for its own or its constant listener's good. Yet the contemplative manner of Witek was well suited to the masterpiece. The Strauss orgy after was like school letting out. To-night the last Brooklyn concert will present Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture, Dvorak's "New World" symphony, Beethoven's concerto and Weber's overture to "Freischuetz." To-morrow's Carnegie Hall matinée has Wagner's "Master Singers" overture and "Siegfried Idyl," Tschaikowsky's 'cello variations "On a Rococo Theme" and Beethoven's Fifth symphony, known these seventy years in New York and some trifle more, the programmes declare, in Boston.

From EVE. TELEGRAM

New York City.

Address

MAR 24

Date

The Boston Symphony Orchestra lived up to its own noble standard last night in another of those memorable concerts for which the great band is so justly celebrated. Carnegie Hall was packed to the doors last night, and at the conclusion of Brahms' "First Symphony" the Brahmans in the audience burst into salvos of applause such as lesser music lovers bestow on Tetrazzini or Caruso.

Then came Beethoven's Concerto in D major, with the concert master Anton Witek as the soloist. His performance was marked by delicious clarity of tone, a luminous intellectual quality, but an unemotional reading. He is a master of his instrument and his playing was a delight to many eager listeners.

Strauss' "Don Juan," one of that composer's best tone poems, concluded a programme that again left a multitude of music lovers deeply indebted to the Boston players. Mr. Max Fiedler conducted as usual with splendid results.

From EVE. JOURNAL

New York City.

Address

MAR 24 1911

Music

"WE are going to have a fine concert to-night."

The words were spoken, with unctional foretaste, by one of New York's most eminent surgeons to his companion as he walked down the aisle at Carnegie Hall last night. For even eminent surgeons—some of them—go to symphony concerts. This was the last evening concert of the season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The words had the ring of expected pleasure in them and were said with whole-souled commonplaceness. The professional concertgoer would have said the same thing with less unction and in the sophisticated jargon that professional concertgoers have a way of taking unto themselves.

The commonplace in expression, however, when it has the attribute of almost boyish delight with the thing that is to come, is important because it has the element of more than individual conviction. There was an atmosphere of generally pleased expectation as the preliminary to the Boston Orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last night.

Absence of novelty, of the untried and the unknown, did it, chiefly. There were no bits from the Russians on the programme, no problems of the Frenchmen of the day after to-morrow. And at times it is good not to have to wrestle with strange things in a new and strange musical language.

To be sure, Richard Strauss had a place at the end of the programme. But then it was Strauss in his somewhat earlier manner, and besides, you could go home before the Strauss number if you chose.

For the rest, there was Brahms, with his meaningful C minor symphony, and Beethoven, with his violin concerto.

Conductor Max Fiedler chose most wisely for his last evening concert. If ever a man had something intellectually and emotionally definite to say in music, Brahms did in his first symphony. And he succeeded in speaking intelligibly and movingly.

George Moore, critic, as well as creative artist, once said that he believed he would never be able to get into any frame of mind where a sudden upward chromatic scale on the flue, in an orchestral pause, could seem to be weighted with untold meaning; or a croaking phrase on a muted trumpet, or any other such-like interjection.

Brahms does not depend for meaning upon things like these. When he uses drums, for instance, they are used as Beethoven used them. They have a mission in consonance with the general scheme. The C minor symphony, as a whole, is one of exquisitely logical thought, of complete and detailed plan. It was played with great clarity, with sensuous beauty and with true feeling for its message by Mr. Fiedler's men.

Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, made his debut as a soloist in New York in the Beethoven violin concerto. His playing made the concerto a renewed pleasure to hear, notwithstanding the frequency with which it occurs on concert programmes.

Mr. Witek has the authority of an ample technique and of thoughtful preparation, guided by imagination. He secures a clear and warm tone from his instrument, and there is great range of flexibility in the delicacy of his expressional shading.

Strauss is, or may be, less programmatic in his tone poem, "Don Juan," than in all his later orchestral works, and for this reason it seems more agreeable than the things that lean so heavily upon a literary foundation for support.

The themes of "Don Juan," while they have the quality of obviousness that is sometimes called realism, nevertheless have undoubted beauty, and their orchestral manipulation is that of Strauss, the great orchestral manipulator. This conception of the contrasting characteristics of "Dan Juan" possesses dignity sufficiently unclouded by puerile artifice to be worthy serious consideration.

Mr. Fieldler's playing of the "Don Juan" was altogether admirable.

STANDARD UNION,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

MAR 24 1911

MUSICAL NOTES.

To-night brings the last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, (Max Fiedler, conductor), concerts of the season in the Academy of Music, beginning at 8:15. The soloist will be Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut here as a solo performer. The programme in full is as follows:

Academic Festival, op. 80 ..... Brahms
Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World" ..... Dvorak
Concerto for violin in D minor op. 61, ... Beethoven Overture to the opera ..... "Freischutz," ..... Weber

[illegible]

MAR 24 1911

NEW SOLOIST WITH BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Mr. Anton Witek, Concert Master, Plays Beethoven's Violin Concerto and Pleases Audience.

For the fifth and last of the Boston Orchestra's evening concerts this season, given in Carnegie Hall last night, Mr. Fiedler drew upon his own forces for a soloist. He presented his concert master, Mr. Anton Witek, who played Beethoven's violin concerto.

Mr. Witek is a Bohemian by birth and comes from Berlin, where for six years he was concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra. He gave a dignified and musicianly performance of the famous concerto. If his phrasing lacked a trifle of elegance at times and his intonation was not always perfect, the general spirit was in admirable sympathy with the composition and he followed the traditions with good taste. The audience and his fellow musicians gave him half a dozen recalls at the close of the concerto. The orchestra helped him with a beautiful accompaniment.

Brahms' first symphony, played with exquisite effect, began the concert and called forth such applause that Mr. Fiedler asked his men to rise in acknowledgment.

Mr. Strauss' brilliant tone poem "Don Juan" brought the evening to a close.

TRIBUNE

New York City.

MUSICAL NOTES

The Boston Orchestra Concert and Yesterday's Operas.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave what was announced as its "fifth and last" concert at Carnegie Hall last night. Of course, it was expected that the wide-awake people who attend the concerts of the Boston Orchestra would accept the announcement as being made in a Pickwickian sense. For is there not to be a concert by the same organization next Saturday afternoon? And are the lovers of orchestral music in New York not expecting to hear the Boston Orchestra over and over again, next season and the season and seasons after, no matter what it cost to maintain the hundred or more orchestral concerts provided by local organizations? Yea, verily. Local patriotism is a great thing, but appreciation of the Boston Orchestra's playing is a greater. Whereby New York demonstrates the provincialism with which all the other cities in the country delight in charging it.

The programme last night was in no sense sensational and seemed designed to effect the laudable purpose of displaying Mr. Anton Witek, the concert master of the organization, who was brought forward in the most dignified manner possible, it falling to his lot to play the Beethoven violin concerto. The Boston gentlemen are not disposed to sensationalism of any kind (which may possibly explain their permanent popularity in New York), and Mr. Witek kept up the lovely and profitable tradition, playing in a sound, musicianly manner, with a tone of great beauty and in a style which disclosed both admirable training and taste. As for the other numbers of the programme—Brahms's first symphony and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan," the quality and homogeneity of the tone developed by the orchestra in them and the rhythmical crispness of the playing, to speak of nothing else, could scarcely be dwelt upon without reflecting upon our local organizations, which are so admirable that they put a strain upon the phraseology of praise occasionally. And there are those who forbid us to be unpatriotic.

Daily [illegible]

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 24 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO-NIGHT.

Last of Brooklyn Series at the Academy of Music.

To-night will bring the last of the Boston Symphony Society concerts of the season in the Academy of Music, beginning at 8:15. The soloist will be Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, who will then make his debut here as a soloist. The programme in full is as follows: "Academic Festival," overture, Op. 80 (Brahms); Symphony No. 5, in E Minor, "From the New World" (Dvorak); Concerto for violin in D Minor, Op. 61 (Beethoven); Overture to the opera "Der Freischutz" (Weber).

Bureau in the World

MAR 24 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA AT CARNEGIE HALL

Anton Witek, Concertmeister, Makes First Appearance as a Soloist.

By CHARLES HENRY MELTZER.

Brahms, Beethoven and Strauss divided the programme at the last evening concert of the as yet unequalled Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday evening at Carnegie Hall.

The symphony was supplied by Brahms, whose No. 1, in C minor, had been selected for the occasion. Some there be who hate Brahms. Some, on the other hand, revere him. The safest course, perhaps, is to avoid extremes in judging this composer. He had more head than heart; more academic skill than charm or passion. In his first symphony he was greatly influenced by the master of masters, Beethoven, whose "Ode to Joy" (in the "Choral") he has almost paralelled at some points in his closing movement.

The opening movement has no lack of interest. The second and third promise wondrous things which fail of fulfilment, dying at the end of feebleness, like blighted flowers.

Under the direction of Mr. Fiedler, the orchestra gave a delightful reading of the symphony. It had spirit, life and power.

Concertos as a rule should be discouraged. But there are some of which the loss would leave us poorer. Among them is Beethoven's concerto in D major, which was heard last night. It served to introduce to us (for the first time here as a soloist) Anton Witek, the accomplished concert master of the Boston Orchestra. He made a most favorable impression, playing with much beauty and smoothness of tone, and making light of the technical difficulties of his part. He was admirably supported by his brother musicians.

"Don Juan," Strauss's tone-poem, closed the programme. It was suggested by the text Nicholaus Lenau, and has been often played here. It is an effort to suggest some of the episodes in the career of Lenau's hero—who differs greatly from some other heroes bearing the same name. It also throws some light on this particular Don Juan's character. Not much, maybe. But some.

The concert was enjoyed by a large audience.

— Bei dem gestrigen fünften und letzten Abendkonzert des Boston Symphony-Orchesters in Carnegie Hall trat ein Mitglied dieses hervorragenden Künstler-Ensembles, Anton Witek, als Solist auf und trug Beethoven's Violin-Konzert in einer Weise vor, die reichen Beifall erntete.

— Geborener Böhme, war Witek sechs Jahre lang Konzertmeister des Philharmonischen Orchesters in Berlin. Er spielte das berühmte Konzert mit vollendeter Technik, und das Publikum und die Mitspielenden riefen ihn ein halbes Dutzend Mal heraus. Das Orchester half ihm mit einer geradezu brillanten Begleitung.

— Brahm's erste Symphonie eröffnete das Konzert und der Applaus war so kolossal, daß Dirigent Fiedler seine Musiker aufforderte, ihren Dank durch Aufstehen zu dokumentiren. Die großartig gespielte Strauß'sche Tondichtung „Don Juan" brachte das Programm zu einem glänzenden Abschluß.

— Bei dem, im kleinen Saale des Terrace Garden ganz im Kreise der Mitglieder und intimen Freunde gefeierten 116. Stiftungsfest der Trinity-Loge No. 12, F. & A. M., der ältesten deutschen Freimaurerloge New Yorks, überraschte gestern Abend Frl. Lillian M. Born, das Töchterlein von Herman Born, einem der ältesten Mitglieder der Loge, die Anwesenden durch einige ganz ausgezeichnete Gesangsvorträge.

— Die junge Dame, eine Schülerin der Frau Pauline Hovemann, verfügt über eine sehr schöne Sopranstimme, und sang mit großer Wirkung „Carissima" von A. A. Penn, „In the Garden of my Heart" von Ernest R. Ball, „Song of the Soul" von J. C. Breil und das beliebte „Coming through the rye". Zum Schluß gab sie, selbst am Klavier sitzend, eine ganz famose Nachahmung eines Klavier- und Violin-Duetts aus dem „Chocolate Soldier", die Violine mit der Stimme nachahmend.

— Auch Frau Wm. Backhaus erfreute durch einige schöne Klaviervorträge. Bei dem Bankett fungirte Dr. Chas. Better als Toastmeister, Paul Richter hielt eine sehr schöne Rede und Carl Hauser bewies in einem Vortrag, daß der Born seines Humors lustiger sprudelt als je.

VITEK, SOLOIST WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY

By EMILIE FRANCES BAUER.

The last evening concert of the season of the Boston Symphony series was given last night before a very large and thoroughly appreciative audience. Max Fiedler, the talented conductor, and his excellent musicians were compelled to respond to many recalls after the admirable reading of the Brahms First symphony, which never sounded more clear or lucid, more full of things that constitute great music, as also after the exceedly brilliant performance of the "Don Juan" tone poem of Richard Strauss.

The soloist of the evening was Anton Witek, who has become known from his concertmaster's post. Mr. Witek played the Beethoven concerto for violin, a work familiar in every detail to the music lovers of New York, as it has been given by nearly all the violinists who appear with orchestra. Mr. Witek's playing was very clear, clean and highly polished. His tone is of the greatest purity and his intellect was ever present. He might have scaled greater poetic heights, but it would be difficult to cavil at such a performance as the one he gave last night, one in which his great authority and maturity were most welcome. He was received with marked enthusiasm.

TIMES

New York City.

MAR 24 1911

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Anton Witek Soloist in Beethoven's Violin Concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fifth evening concert, the first one of its last visit to New York this season, last evening in Carnegie Hall, with a programme that gave peculiar pleasure to a very large audience. It began with Brahms's first symphony; a work that was once called austere and inaccessible, but was not found so by last evening's listeners in the remarkably lucid and finely balanced reading that Mr. Fiedler gave of it. Nor was it found "muddy" or "thick" in instrumentation in such a performance. There was an unwonted outburst of enthusiasm at its close that finally caused Mr. Fiedler to make his men rise to share the applause.

An immensely brilliant performance of Strauss's luxuriantly imaginative and graphic tone poem "Don Juan" closed the concert; one of those works upon the threshold of his later style that have so much more musical inspiration and so much more real imagination than his later and more literal productions in programme music. Between these two stood upon the programme Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Mr. Anton Witek, the concertmeister of the orchestra, who has not before been heard here as a solo performer. Mr. Witek's accomplishment and skill as a musician have been evident all this season to intelligent observers of his playing at the first desk of the violins. His interpretation of the concerto confirmed this impression; a finely musical interpretation, appreciative of the poetry and elevation of the work, authoritative, and reposeful. It was met by many manifestations of approval on the part of the audience.

MAR 24 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY AGAIN TRIUMPHS

Gives a Concert of Three Numbers to an Audience That Shows Its Appreciation.

LAST APPEARANCE TO-MORROW

The Boston Symphony Orchestra came to New York yesterday for its last visit. It will give another concert to-morrow, and then—to the general regret of all amateurs of good music finely played—it will not be heard until next November.

Last night's concert consisted of three numbers—the first symphony of Brahms, the violin concerto of Beethoven and the "Don Juan" symphonic poem of Richard Strauss. The vocabulary of eulogy on the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been exhausted. Its rich and clear tone, the actual excellence of the very instruments that are used by its members, and the sense of logic, unity and force that one has learned to associate with their interpretation have been celebrated again and again in the columns of this paper. It was, then, entirely fitting that on the conclusion of Brahms' noble symphony Herr Max Fiedler should have signaled to the musicians of his orchestra to rise and acknowledge the plaudits of the audience.

The applause was so cordial and sustained that it implied a sentiment of cordial felicitation for the whole season.

Brahms' first symphony remains a perfect example of purity and wealth of musical idea expressed with lofty stateliness and sometimes glory of diction. One is tempted to say in this connection that we have not heard enough of the supreme neo-classicist this season, superabundant as this season has been in orchestral concerts.

M. Anton Witek, the violinist of the evening, played the Beethoven concerto smoothly and with admirable tone. Strauss' "Don Juan" concluded the programme. In "Don Juan" this muckraker among composers had a congenial subject.

MAR 4 1910

Juan," too), so a programme consisting of Brahams's C minor symphony, Bethoven's violin concerto, and Strauss's "Don Juan" cannot be regarded as undeserving the label "safe and sane."

The Brahams symphony Mr. Fiedler conducted without a score. Whether or not that feat (it is not so much done now) had anything to do with the excellent performance of the first three movements and much of the finale, far be it from us to hazard a guess; and we are equally at a loss as to whether it accounts for excessive hurry in parts of the same finale. In any case, Mr. Fiedler has conducted excellent performances, and hurried allegro movements as well, when the score stared him in the eyes. The audience appreciated the symphony greatly, and its applause could not be hushed until the orchestra had risen, at a sign from Mr. Fiedler, to share in acknowledging the enthusiasm.

The soloist of the occasion was anton Witek, the new concert master of the orchestra. A concert-manager has a sort of ex-officio right to appear as soloist with his orchestra, and Mr. Witek in exercising it boldly challenged comparison with the greatest violinists of past and present times by playing the Beethoven concerto. Ysaye and Kreisler have played the famous piece here in recent years with greater breadth and deeper feeling, but if Mr. Witek's performance was not on the largest scale it was singularly fine and polished. His tone is sweet and penetrating, his style elegant, and his interpretation had the sincerity and dignity that the great music requires. The violinist deserved the hearty applause that followed his performance.

In the evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra came to Carnegie Hall for the first of its last pair of New York concerts for the present season. For these concerts Mr. Fiedler chose safe and sane programmes. Recently he has introduced to Boston Sibelius's "Swan of Tuonela" (which is known in Chicago and Philadelphia, but not in New York and Boston!) and Richard Strauss's early tone poem "Macbeth" (played ten years ago in Chicago, but never yet in New York). Why did not Mr. Fiedler elect to spice his Beethoven, Brahms, and Wagner with these two pieces which New York is as interested in hearing as Boston? We only know he did not.

Richard Strauss enlivened a little the safety and sanity of the programme last night. His "Don Juan" was played, but even the reactionaries who will hear none of "Domestic Symphonies," "Don Quixotes," "Salomes," or "Electras," and are blushing already for the "Rosencavalier," have consented to let "Don Juan" slip by (Mozart wrote a "Don

---

EAGLE,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

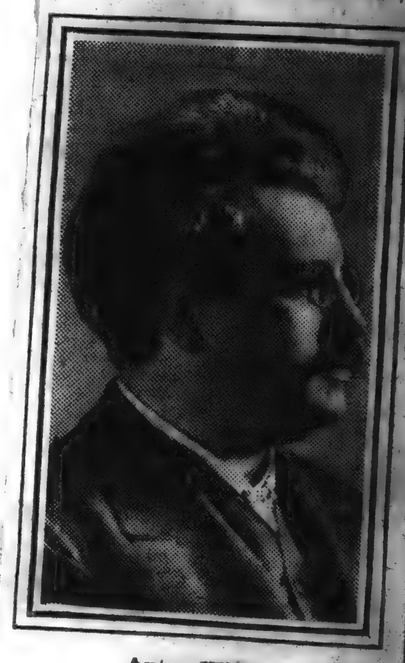
MAR 25 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, and Beethoven's Violin Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its Brooklyn season to a close last evening with a programme which reached its climax in Dvorak's beautiful symphony, "From the New World." The symphony was preceded by the Brahms "Academic" overture and followed by the Beethoven violin concerto and the overture to "Der Friescheutz."

In the presence of the musical charm of this Dvorak symphony the question whether the music is really American, as



Anton Witek,
Soloist With Boston Symphony.

Dvorak himself claimed, or Slav, as his sons claimed later, seems of very little consequence. The Largo is one of the most melodious and moving compositions since Schubert and whether the feeling with which it moves every audience profoundly is the homesickness of the exiled Slav or the tragedy of the black slave, which breathes through so much of our negro folk song, is a minor matter. Is it not possible that in this, the high-water mark of his genius, Dvorak touched a fundamental and therefore a universal note? As when we get back to the elementary folk songs, the likenesses are far more significant than national differences, so the sadness to which Dvorak has here given so eloquent a voice is so near the roots of human nature that it may have come from any race in which civilization has not muffled the cry of the heart. As for the performance last night, especially of the Largo, it was something to dream of. The beauty of tone was exquisite and the final pianissimo was

Oh sweet and far, from cliff and scar
The horns of elf land, faintly blowing.

The somewhat fantastic scherzo and the sonorous and stirring last movement were also superbly played and the audience would not be content until the members of the orchestra had arisen to receive their share of the outburst of applause which expressed the enthusiasm of the great house over an ideal performance.

The Beethoven concerto is of a length by no means heavenly and one was not led to forget its vain repetitions by the performance of the solo part by Anton Witek, first violin of the orchestra. Mr. Witek is a violinist of extraordinary elegance and delicacy of finish, certainly of touch and intonation. The sheer beauty of his playing commands hearty admiration. But being a soloist and having the habit of commanding audiences is a trade by itself and it does not mix well with work at the desk in a great orchestra. Many a man who cannot play nearly as well as Mr. Witek is yet a more effective soloist than he, because the less finished player has learned to play on his audience as well as on his violin, whereas Mr. Witek, in his usual work, leaves all that to the conductor. The consequence was that his exquisite work last night left the audience quite cold and tended to make the concerto seem longer than it is.

The overtures by Brahms and Weber opened and closed the concert effectively and the audience paid a reluctant farewell to the organization whose concerts make the high lights of the musical season in Brooklyn.

EVENING SUN,

New York City.

MAR 25 1911

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, closing its season here to-day, is the first of the orchestras to announce dates for next season. The five visits will be on Nov. 9-11, Dec. 7-9, Jan. 11-13, Feb. 22-24, and March 21-23.

[200]

Address N. Y. STAATSZEITUNG
Date MAR 25 1911

Die Musik der Metropole.

Was New York alljährlich für Musik ausgiebt. — An sieben Millionen mag nicht viel fehlen.

„Musik wird oft nicht schön gefunden,
Weil sie stets mit Geräusch verbunden."

Wenn man sich vergegenwärtigt, welche Unsummen alljährlich in der Hudsonmetropole für Musik ausgegeben werden, möchte man fast glauben, daß Wilhelm Busch da einen Ausspruch gethan hat, der auf die Einwohner New York's ausnahmslos nicht zutrifft. Jüngst hat sich Jemand der Aufgabe unterzogen, in Zahlen festzustellen, was New York der edlen Frau Musika alljährlich in den Schoß wirft. Und Frau Musika kann sich gewiß nicht über Knauserigkeit der New Yorker beklagen: Sieben Millionen streicht sie alljährlich ein. Freilich ist eine Berechnung der Einnahmen der edlen Frau auf Dollar und Cent unmöglich. Gewisse Posten können nur schätzungsweise der Abrechnung eingefügt werden. Jedenfalls ist aber die Summe von $7,000,00 nicht zu hoch gegriffen. Viel eher zu niedrig.

Sieben Millionen! ruft entsetzt der Hinterwäldler aus, dem das Reich der Kunst ein nie geschautes Eden ist, sieben Millionen! Und wofür? Dafür, daß ein Tonvolumen in die Luft hinausgeblasen wird, Weiberstimmen kreischen, Bässe brummen, Tenöre johlen, Hörner brüllen, daß einer auf erhöhtem Podium ängstlich hoch die Pranken reckt, ein prasselndes Finale entfesselnd, daß schließlich ein wuchtiger Hieb des Dirigentenstabes und ein kurzes, konvulsivisches Zucken beider Arme diesen Tönewirrwarr beendet: „e finita la sinfonia" ... Etwa dafür?!

Allerdings dafür und für noch manches andere. Vom Leierkasten bis zur Stradivariusgeige, von der Tingeltangeleuse bis zur dekolletirten Sängerin in Pelz und Seide, vom Bänkelsänger bis zum Heldentenor, alles wird gewogen, abgeschätzt und erhält seinen Antheil von den sieben Millionen. Um von unten anzufangen: Da kommen zuerst die Orgeldreher. Wie viel es wohl ihrer in New York ben mag? Ein paar Hunderttausend? Gottlob nicht. Nur 103 im Ganzen. Die Stadtverordnungen erlauben die Gewährung von Gewerbescheinen an dreihundert, aber nur 103 haben Lizenzen erwirkt. Schon viel zu viel, ruft der Herr Musikprofessor: „Die Drehorgeln, die dulde man nicht, sie sind eine Plage und ein Skandal!" Wirklich? Biegt da ein Abruzzensohn mit seinem Karren und seiner tambourinschwingenden Donna um eine Ecke im Bezirk der Aermsten der Armen, auf der düstersten Ostseite, „Da rennt es herbei in schnellem Lauf,

Da krabbeln aus ihren Höhlen heraus
Die Kinder in dem ganzen Haus,
Und über die blassen, ernsten Gesichter
Fliegt es dahin wie Sonnenlichter,
Sie tanzen und wiegen sich hin und her..."

Ganz gleich, ob es das Miserere aus dem „Troubadour" oder die Marseillaise oder „Has anybody here seen Kelly?" giebt. Ein wenig Licht in's graue Heute bringt die Musik der armen Leute. Und mit schmutzigen, klebrigen Pennies wird diese Abwechslung belohnt. Aber manchmal, wenn sich der Orgeldreher in „bessere" Gegenden verirrt, mag es wohl auch Nickels und Dimes geben — freilich nicht, damit er sein Miserere wiederholt, vielmehr damit er weiterzieht. Und wenn er spät Nachts die Einnahmen zählt, dann pflegt selten etwas an drei Dollars zu fehlen, erwiesenermaßen. Also 103 Orgeldreher à $3 bei 365 Tagen des Jahres, abzüglich solcher, an denen es regnet und schneit: viel kann an hunderttausend Dollars nach Adam Riese nicht fehlen.

Ablösung vor! Da rückt das Heer derer an, die in den Restaurants und Cafes „Musik verzapfen". Sie kommen in Rotten zu Dreien, denn in den gut bürgerlichen Lokalen pflegt man zum „75 Cents-Dinner mit Wein" gratis Musik von einem Terzett zu verlangen. Freilich, das Publikum zahlt nicht direkt für die musikalische Unterhaltung, aber der Lokalbesitzer giebt etwas kleinere Portionen, knapst hier und dort ein wenig ab und bezahlt sein Terzett damit. Annähernd hundert Lokale haben solche Dreimänner-Orchester, deren jedes Mitglied wöchentlich $15 bis $30 bekommt außer dem Abendbrot und einem Sandwich nebst einem Glase Bier um Mitternacht. Man kann also $300,000 dafür in Anschlag bringen. Für die Restaurateure ist es also kein billiges Vergnügen, die Tischunterhatung ihrer Gäste allabendlich zu stören.

Dazu kommen die fünfzig Hotels in Manhattan, die eigene Orchester haben. Das sind zusammen wiederum etwa dreihundert Musiker, die meist neun Monate lang Engagement haben. Sie kosten weitere $300,000.

Ganz anders sehen sich schon die Ziffern an, die alljährlich für Symphonie-Konzerte in New York ausgegeben werden. Mehrere hiesige Orchester und ein besuchsweise hier ständig konzertirendes sind mit $350,000 in Anschlag zu bringen. Ein Symphonie-Orchester besteht aus achtzig bis hundert Musikern, von denen keiner weniger als zwanzig Dollars pro Woche erhält. Manche von ihnen beziehen wöchentliche Gagen von $50 bis $100. Den Löwen-Antheil jener Summe für Symphonie-Konzerte nimmt das Bostoner Orchester an sich, das jährlich zehn Konzerte in Manhattan giebt. In der Carnegie Halle, wo die meisten bemerkenswerthen Orchesterkonzerte gegeben werden, werden alljährlich mehr als $200,000 vereinnahmt. Ein Fünftel davon, also etwa $40,000, geht an die Bostoner. An zweiter Stelle rangiren die hiesigen Philharmoniker, das älteste Orchester Amerika's. Ihr Dirigent, Gustav Mahler, bezieht das höchste Gehalt, das je ein Konzertdirigent erhalten hat, $30,000 pro Jahr. Die Philharmoniker geben im Jahre vierzig Konzerte, deren jedes durchschnittlich $2000 einbringt, wobei die Subskription nicht mitgerechnet ist. Gehälter, Saalmiethen, Druck- und Anzeigenkosten machen etwa $150,000 aus. Die Hälfte davon wird durch die hiesigen Konzerte eingebracht, eine nicht gerade beträchtliche Summe pflegen die Gastkonzerte außerhalb New York's einzubringen. Das Defizit wird durch Zuweisungen hochherziger Musikliebhaber eingebracht. Das New York Symphonie Orchester, das unter Walter Damrosch's Leitung steht, hat $180,000 in diesem Jahre gekostet und $144,000 eingebracht. Das Defizit deckt die Symphonie-Gesellschaft. Das russische Symphonie-Orchester, das seinem Namen gemäß hauptsächlichst russische Musik kultivirt, giebt nur vier Konzerte in der Saison hier in New York und dehnt sein Wirkungsfeld bis zur pazifischen Küste aus, kann also nur mit einem verhältnismäßig kleinen Betrag hier in Anrechnung gebracht werden. Auch das Volpe Orchester giebt nur drei oder vier Konzerte im Jahre. Es setzt sich größtentheils aus Musikern zusammen, die sonst den Kapellen der besten Hotels angehören. Zieht man die Thatsache in Betracht, daß der Vorverkauf für Orchesterkonzerte gewöhnlich den Abendeinnahmen gleichkommt, so kann man für die fünf großen Orchester den Posten von $350,000 pro Jahr ansetzen. Damit wären wir jetzt auf weit über eine Million gekommen.

Zu den Orchesterkonzerten kommen die etwa hundert Konzerte, die in jeder Saison von Solisten gegeben werden. Nicht alle diese Künstler haben ein $6000-Haus, wie es Paderewski jedesmal zu verzeichnen hat. Wenn Marcella Sembrich singt, so pflegen die Einnahmen durchschnittlich $5500 zu sein. Spielt Mischt Elman, so pflegen $3500 „im Hause "zu sein. Nach ihm kommen de Pachman und Busoni, deren Höchsteinnahmen an einem Abend $3000 bezw. $2500 waren. Das Publikum, das Kammermusik schätzt, pflegt ein — numerisch, notabene — beschränktes zu sein. Immerhin können für diese beiden Gattungen der Musik, Solo- und Kammermusik-Konzerte, mit gutem Gewissen $120,000 in Anrechnung gebracht werden.

Den Hauptfaktor bildet natürlich das Metropolitan Opernhaus. Der ganze gewaltige Apparat, der von der Leitung unserer Oper in Szene gesetzt wird, das Riesenpersonal von dem theuer bezahlten Caruso bis hinunter zum mindestbezahlten Choristen, mit allem, was drum und dran hängt, bedeutet anderthalb Millionen. Mit dem Uebrigen zusammen $3,-120,000. Damit ist aber der Musikhunger unserer Stadt erst zur Hälfte gestillt. Man vergesse nicht die 800 Konzerte, die im vergangenen Sommer auf den Erholungspiers gegeben wurden, und auch nicht die 310 Parkkonzerte. Diese elfhundertzehn Konzerte kosteten der Stadt, die sie veranstaltete, die Kleinigkeit von $115,-000. Dazu kommt die — sagen wir — Gelegenheitsmusik. In diese Rubrik mögen die Kirchen eingefügt sein, deren es in Manhattan 125 giebt. Fast eine jede hat ihren eigenen Organisten, deren Gehalt zwischen $500 und $5000 schwankt. Dazu kommen bezahlte Instrumentalisten und die verschiedenen Kirchenchöre. Zusammen $250,000. Eine Viertel Million wird unter die Musiker vertheilt, die bei Paraden, Bällen und Unterhaltungen aufspielen.

An Musiklehrern muß es in der Stadt New York etwa neuntausend geben. Eine musikwissenschaftliche Zeitschrift hat berechnet, daß es allein zweitausend Violinlehrer giebt. Nicht weniger als 54 Personen sind bereit, dem Lernbegierigen das Triangelschlagen beizubringen. Ein paar hundert Musiklehrer geben Unterricht in den verschiedenen „Studio Buildings", wo sie von $600 bis $6000 Miethe zahlen. Sie müssen zum Mindesten wohl die Miethe einbringen und noch „ein weniges" zum Leben dazu. Die Miethe allein beträgt im Ganzen etwa $250,000. Rechnet man ferner die Privatmusiklehrer hinzu, die zu Hause Unterricht geben, so kommt wohl Alles in Allem auf dreiviertel Millionen. Die Pianohändler unserer Stadt erzielen alljährlich einen Umsatz von der gleichen Summe, $750,000. Dazu werden andere Instrumente im Werthe von etwa $100,000 pro Jahr hier in New York verkauft. Die gleiche Summe für Noten hinzugerechnet, ergiebt im Ganzen etwa sechs Millionen.

Den Rest kann man auf die automatischen Musikinstrumente, als da sind: Phonographen, Grammophone, elektrische Klaviere und Aehnliches vertheilen. Das Fernsprech-Verzeichnis führt 125 Namen von Phonographen-Handlungen an. Ein jeder von diesen Händlern muß $2000 im Jahre verdienen, um bestehen zu können. Dann die Hunderte und Aberhunderte von Musikautomaten, die in Wirthschaften, Hotellobbies, Fährhäusern und sonstwo aufgestellt sind. Rechnet man im Durchschnitt nur einen Dollar pro Tag, rechnet man ferner die herumziehenden Musikanten, wie die Guitarre klimpernden Neger oder die dreinschmetternden German Bands, die Varieté-Künstler musikalischen Genres, die unzähligen Klavierspieler in Wandelbildertheatern und anderen Etablissements hinzu, dann ist die Sechsmillionen-Grenze weit, weit überschritten. An der siebenten Million fehlt nicht viel. Es wird also kaum Jemand unserer Metropole nachsagen können, daß sie für Musik — nichts übrig hat.

---

m EAGLE,

ress Brooklyn, N. Y.

1911

Miss Mary Hallock of Philadelphia gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic Concert, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music last evening. It was the last of the series of five, which, like the concerts, are under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, and was set in lecture hall, Academy of Music. The lecturer had expected to address an audience of women, and was surprised to find so many men at an afternoon lecture recital, so interpreted some facts about music in terms of the milliner and the dressmaker. She had much to say about Brahms and his place in music when speaking of his "Academy Festival Overture," op. 80, which opened the programme, and in the Dvorak Symphony, "From the New World," she indicated themes which might have been suggested to the composer by popular melodies heard while he was here. In the overture to the opera, "Der Freischutz," she called attention to the use which Weber makes of the clarinet and horn.

---

rom MORN. TELEGRAPH

Address New York City.

Date MAR 25 1911

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra leaves New York tonight for many months. They will be sorely missed for the perfect interpretation of perfect music is rare in the land.

From STANDARD UNION,

Address BROOKLYN, N. Y.

Date MAR 25 1911

Miss Mary Hallock, of Philadelphia, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the Philharmonic concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the Opera House of the Academy of Music, last evening. It was the last of the series of five, which, like the concerts, are under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, and was set in lecture hall, Academy of Music. The lecturer had expected to address an audience of women and interpreted some facts about music in terms of the milliner and the dressmaker. She had much to say about Brahms and his place in music when speaking of his "Academic Festival Overture," Op. 80, which opened the programme, and in the Dvorak Symphony "From the New World," she indicated themes which might have been suggested to the composer by popular melodies heard while he was here. In the overture to the opera, "De Freischutz," she called attention to the use which Weber makes of the clarinet and horn.

STAATS ZEITUNG

ess New York City.

MAR 25 1911

Konzerte.

Vor dem gewohnten voll gefüllten Saal verlief das letzte Konzert des Bostoner Symphonie-Orchesters in sehr erfreulicher Weise. Von den Orchester-Vorträgen muß namentlich die plastische und feinsinnige Wiedergabe von Brahm's Erster Symphonie herausgestrichen werden, während Strauß' „Don Juan" zwar gut koloristisch und temperamentvoll herausgebracht wurde, mitunter aber größere Disziplin vertragen hätte. Als Solist stellte sich der Konzertmeister des Orchesters, Herr Anton Witek, vor, welcher nach einer der höchsten Aufgaben der Violin-Literatur, dem Beethoven'schen Konzert, gegriffen hatte. Herr Witek, der die ganze Saison hindurch am ersten Pult durch sein echt musikalisches Wesen und die Schönheit seines Tones höchst ersprießlich gewirkt hatte, erwies sich als ein Virtuose von hohen Gaben. Zur Schönheit und Süßigkeit seines Tons und Strichs und der Sicherheit der Technik gesellte sich eine unaffektirte, gesunde Auffassung von geistiger Bedeutung und ein perfekter Stil, der von seltenem künstlerischem Geschmack zeugte. Sollen wir eine Ausstellung machen, so wäre es die, daß mitunter mehr Humor zu wünschen gewesen wäre. Herr Witek wurde vom Publikum seinem ganzen Werthe nach erkannt und gewürdigt.

Donnerstag Nachmittag ließ sich in Mendelssohn Hall Herr Clarence Whitehill, der sich im Vorjahre als Bariton des Metropolitan ausgezeichnet hatte, als Konzertsänger hören. Herr Whitehill verfügt über eine Baritonstimme von Kraft und schönem Schmelz, und auch seine Gesangstechnik hatte stets höchst erfreulich gewirkt. Er überraschte im Rezital durch besondere Feinheit und Delikatesse seines Stils, ja, die Diskretion wurde mitunter, offenbar in dem Bestreben, recht feine Liederwirkungen zu bieten, etwas zu weit getrieben. Darunter litten namentlich die klassischen Darbietungen einigermaßen, welche gelegentlich etwas farblos klangen. Dafür entschädigte Herr Whitehill jedoch mit prächtigen koloristischen Wirkungen in einer ganzen Reihe anderer Lieder. Den größten Genuß brachte Tschaikowsky's „Don Juan-Serenade" und die Arie aus Bizet's „La jolie fille de Perthe". Mit feiner Wirkung sang er Kurt Schindler's stimmungsvolles „From a City Window" und Kernochan's „Smuggler Song". Herr Whitehill wird gut thun, in den klassischen Liedern der Diktion mehr Aufmerksamkeit zu schenken, welche nicht selten durch das Bestreben, möglichst zarten Gesangston zu geben, einigermaßen litt. Der Künstler wurde von dem gut besuchten Saale durch warmen Beifall ausgezeichnet.

In Mendelssohn Hall stellte sich dem New Yorker Publikum Donnerstag Abend ein neues Damen-Quartett vor, das sich „American String Quartett" nennt und auf Boston als seine Geburtsstadt hinweist. Die Damen Gertrude Marshal, erste, Evelyn Street, zweite Violine, Edith Jewell, Bratsche, und Susan Lord Brandegee, Cello, zeigten in Debussy's Quartett op. 10, Haydn's Quartett No. 33, op. 3 und Dvorak's Quintett op. 81 (in Letterem vom Pianisten Herrn Heinrich Gebhard anerkennenswerth begleitet), schönen Ton und gute Schulung. Selbstverständlich fehlten, was bei einer so jungen Organisation nicht zu verwundern ist, auch die Mängel nicht, die wir nach der ersten Probe hauptsächlich in gelegentlich zu männlich kräftigem Zugreifen und in einem mitunter allzu sehr starken Hervortreten der ersten Violine suchen würden. Die Damen, deren musikalischer Sinn dafür spricht, daß sie weiter lernen und weiter streben werden, erfreuten sich einer sehr ehrenden Aufnahme seitens des nicht großen Publikums.

m

ress

te

Mme. Jeanne Jomelli, who is now on a concert tour, received an ovation March 21 in Washington, where she sang with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[201]

New York City.

MAR 25 1911

...rte.

...nten, voll gefüllten ...te Konzert des Bo... Orchesters in sehr er... Von den Orchester... ...mentlich die plastische ...ebergabe von Brahm's ... herausgestrichen wer... Strauß' „Don Juan" ...tisch und temperament... ...t wurde, mitunter aber ... vertragen hätte. Als ...der Konzertmeister des ...Anton Witek, vor, wel... höchsten Aufgaben der ... dem Beethoven'schen ...hatte. Herr Witek, der ...hindurch am ersten Pult ...usikalisches Wesen und ...ines Tones höchst er... ...hatte, erwies sich als ein ... Gaben. Zur Schön... ...it seines Tons und ... Sicherheit der Technik ...neffektirte, gesunde Auf... ...iger Bedeutung und ein ...von seltenem künstleri... ...rte. Sollen wir eine ..., so wäre es die, daß ...mehr zu wünschen gewe... ...Witek wurde vom Pu... ...en Werthe nach erkannt

...nittag ließ sich in ...err Clarence White... ...hre als Bariton bes... ...eichnet hatte, als ...rn. Herr Whitehill ver... ...ritonstimme von Kraft ...me, und auch seine ...rte stets höchst erfreulich ...rasche im Rezital durch ...t und Delikatesse seines ...ortrags wurde mitunter, ...zu Bestreben, recht feine ...zu bieten, etwas zu weit ...ter litten namentlich die ...bietungen einigermaßen, ...ch etwas farblos klangen. ...gte Herr Whitehill jedoch ...oloristischen Wirkungen ...Reihe anderer Lieder. ...Genuß brachte Tschai... ...Don-Serenade" und die ...er's „La jolie fille de ...seiner Wirkung sang er ...s stimmungsvolles „From ...nbow" und Kernochan's ...ong". Herr Whitehill wird ...en klassischen Liedern der ...ufmerksamkeit zu schenken, ...elten durch das Bestreben, ...en Gesangston zu geben, ...rte. Der Künstler wurde ...t besuchten Saale durch ...ll ausgezeichnet.

...sohn Hall stellte sich dem ...Publikum Donnerstag Abend ...amen-Quartett vor, das sich ...String Quartett" nennt und ...als seine Geburtsstadt hin... ...Damen Gertrude Marshal, ...Streck, zweite Violine, Edith ...sche, und Susan Lord Bran... ...spielten in Debussy's Quartett ...ohn's Quartett No. 33, op. 3 ...'s Quintett op. 81 (in Le... ...Pianisten Herrn Heinrich ...erkennenswerth begleitet), schö... ...gute Schulung. Selbstver... ...rten, was bei einer so jungen ...on nicht zu verwundern ist, ...Mängel nicht, die wir nach der ...he hauptsächlich in gelegentlich ...ch kräftigem Zugreifen und in ...unter allzu sehr starken Hervor... ...ersten Violine suchen würden. ...nen, deren musikalischer Sinn ...ich, daß sie weiter lernen und ...eben werden, erfreuten sich einer ...enden Aufnahme seitens des ...Publikums.

...who is now on ...d an ovation ...n, where the ...Symphony Or...

CITIZEN,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 25 1911

BOSTON ORCHESTRA GIVES FINAL CONCERT

Splendid Playing, but Unsatisfactory Programme.

ANTON WITEK AS SOLOIST

Concert-Master Plays Finely in Beethoven Concerto — Dvorak's "New World" Symphony Is Feature—Brahms and Weber Numbers.

The Boston Symphony Society concluded its Brooklyn series last evening at the Academy of Music with a concert in which its virtuosity showed to advantage, but which offered one of the least satisfactory programmes that this orchestra has ever played here.

Brahms' "Academic Festival Overture," with which the concert opened, is skillfully constructed, and the use of student songs lends a certain interest, but it is by no means a great work. Beethoven's concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major, Op. 61, is one of the least notable of his compositions. While the overture to Weber's "Der Freischuetz" is beyond doubt, one of the most popular compositions of its kind, and beautifully orchestrated, it would seem that for the last number on a programme, which must be the last fine musical affair of Brooklyn's season, some bigger, less familiar work might have been chosen. Dvorak's "New World" symphony was the one work which seemed to belong in a final concert.

Throughout, the splendid orchestra was at its splendid best under the able leadership of Conductor Fiedler. Its shading was exquisitely worked out; the climaxes were superb in their power; the tone—well, the Boston players are unrivaled in this country in this respect. If for no other reason, any Boston Symphony concert would be a delight because of the tonal beauties.

The Brahms overture was given a spirited reading, and the Weber overture was played as finely as in the memory of any Brooklyn music-lover. Possibly, after all, the popular appeal of this overture justified Mr. Fiedler in chosing it as the final number.

Opinion, of course, is divided as to the Beethoven concerto, in which Anton Witek, concert-master of the orchestra, played the solo part, and played it in splendid fashion. But there are many who see in the solo part only a weary desert of sublimated fiddling, with at rare intervals a few phrases of sensuous beauty. And last night, for all that Mr. Witek's handling of the technical difficulties was admirable, and his tone a delight, the fi[illegible] was still fiddling. The orchestra, [illegible] is better provided for than the so[illegible] layed rarely well.

There have been few things in music which have more pleased a Brooklyn audience than did the two first movements of Dvorak's symphony. The highly interesting first movement and the exquisitely beautiful largo, played with a delicious clarity and eloquence, brought forth many sighs of regret that they could not be repeated. As to the last two movements, for all that the allegro is full of life, the less said the better.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series of five concerts at the Academy of Music next season, on Friday evenings, the dates being as follows: Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23 and March 22.

EVE. TELEGRAM

New York City.

MAR 26 1911

Last Boston Orchestra Concert.

Indisposition of Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, 'cellist, caused some disappointment to yesterday afternoon's audience in Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final New York concert of the year. Mr. Schroeder was to have been the soloist, but while in Baltimore with the orchestra on Wednesday he was stricken with fever and had to remain behind. Mr. Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, leaped into the breach and played Paganini's D major concerto at short notice. He played it very well, earning applause and numerous recalls.

Mr. Max Fiedler conducted Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, the Siegfried idyl and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The playing of the Boston men was again of a very high order. It was a dignified and brilliant ending to a series of admirable concerts.

STANDARD UNION,

BROOKLYN, N. Y.

MAR 25 1911

BOSTONIANS PLAY LAST CONCERT.

For their last Brooklyn concert of the season, at the Academy of Music last night, the Boston Symphony Orchestra performed a programme which had its chief redeeming grace in Dvorak's Symphony No. 5 in E minor, "From the New World." As to the numbers presented, aside from the Bohemian composer's melodious work, one would be perfectly justified in questioning the taste which prevailed in their selection, especially for the occasion of the last visit of the Bostonian musicians to this borough. Surely the audience looked forward to a final impression of a much more formidable character than could be derived from even a most brilliant performance of so age-worn a piece as Weber's "Freischuetz" overture, which brought the concert to a close.

Anton Witek, the concertmeister of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was the soloist. His choice, for reasons probably best known to himself, was directed to Beethoven's Concerto in D major. This composition, while in some respects grateful to the violin, possesses far more attraction for the player than for the auditor. Witek, during the early part of the performance, was not quite confident of his instrument. His playing, from a technical aspect, was flawless. In the matter of tone, Witek, however, failed to realize any decided degree of emotional warmth, and this very absence of instrumental breadth detracted somewhat from an otherwise musicianly and well-mannered execution.

The first number on the programme was the rarely heard "Academic Festival Overture," op. 80, of Brahm's. The composition is all that its name suggests. In fact, it is far more academic than interesting, and in general a number such as would leave no note of longing with the listener. In its structure one is confronted with the influence of Brahms, the careful, painstaking formalist, and not of the intellectual and fully equipped artist whose genius sways with so much grace and freedom in the second and fourth symphonies. The overture failed to arouse enthusiasm.

In Dvorak's "New World" symphony, the orchestra, under Max Fiedler's able baton, shone in its most resplendent and effective colors. Nothing could be calculated to evoke so many beautiful and at all times melodious effects in tone as the wonderful Largo of this symphony. The thematic material, based, as all through the work, upon melodies of more or less Southern origin, is treated in this second movement with the most charming originality and natural skill on the part of the composer. One forgets entirely about construction and form and other watchwords of the workshop in the serene, undisturbed calm of this music.

Dvorak is another composer who has been unable to escape from his own artistic personality, and his "New World" symphony, supposed to engender some independent vitality into an "American" form of music, is proof of this fact. He has caught the spirit of the Southern croonings and lullabies, but those cadenzas and harmonic finalities resolve themselves into a music which is none the less beautiful but yet undoubtedly Bohemian. The first and third movements, both full of melodic substance, in which the local flavor of the South is not missing, are nevertheless manifestly foreign in conception. The final movement does not enjoy the supreme felicity and cleverness of workmanship of the preceding sections, and in the closing phrases of this symphony Dvorak even resorts to the conventional.

Fiedler conducted the symphony in an unlabored and highly distinguished manner. The playing of the orchestra was fluent and sympathetic throughout the four movements. Further comment on Weber's battlehorse, "Freischuetz" overture, is hardly necessary. It was a very insignificant factor of an important musical occasion.

Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist, was missed from the orchestra and it was explained that he was ill. It will be remembered that he was long connected with the Kneisel Quartet.

ress

e MAR 26 1911

Last Boston Orchestra Concert.

Indisposition of Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, 'cellist, caused some disappointment to yesterday afternoon's audience in Carnegie Hall, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its final New York concert of the year. Mr. Schroeder was to have been the soloist, but while in Baltimore with the orchestra on Wednesday he was stricken with fever and had to remain behind. Mr. Anton Witek, concertmaster of the orchestra, leaped into the breach and played Paganini's D major concerto at short notice. He played it very well, earning applause and numerous recalls.

Mr. Max Fiedler conducted Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude, the Siegfried idyl and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The playing of the Boston men was again of a very high order. It was a dignified and brilliant ending to a series of admirable concerts.

WORLD

New York City.

MAR 26 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ENDS 25TH SEASON HERE

Anton Witek Again Soloist of Rather Tame Matinee Programme.

By Reginald de Koven.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Max Fiedler, closed its twenty-fifth season in New York with the last matinee concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Owing to the illness of Mr. Alwin Schroeder his place as soloist was taken by Mr. Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, who played the Paganini concerto in D. A programme made up in addition to this of the "Meistersinger" prelude, the "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's Fifth symphony could hardly be called eventful or quite up to the Boston players' usual high standard of interest, especially as the Beethoven work had been heard twice previously during the week. Surely a flavor here of something more than accidental coincidence of idea in programme making on the part of Messrs. Mahler and Fiedler.

The rendering of the Wagner prelude was admirably lucid and distinct, if not overimpressive in the way of well nurtured climax. The "Idyl" too was well done and was high colored, gracefully poetic and finished as read by Mr. Fiedler and played by the orchestra, whose wonderfully compact mellow tone as of one great solo instrument was here markedly in evidence. The whole orchestra rose after this number in answer to the prolonged applause.

If not in the first flight of the world's greatest violinists, Mr. Witek is certainly a player of distinction, finished style and authoritative experience. His tone has both body and sweetness and a certain lustre, his fluent technique gives him a generally effective command over his instrument, and if his temperamental energy does not exactly carry one away, his genuine artistic feeling and sincerity of sentiment make a definite and sympathetic appeal. The Paganini concerto, though a somewhat rambling work, contains some passages of real melodic beauty, and others of brilliant bravura, which Mr. Witek, as a rule, made the most of; though I could have wished for a greater clearness and security of intonation in some of the scale passages and double stopping.

There were opportunities yesterday for short range comparison between the Beethoven symphony as played by the Boston orchestra and by the Philharmonic men the previous afternoon. I am bound to say that I found Mr. Mahler's reading as tempered by Mr. Spiering more interesting and more subtly emotional than Mr. Fiedler's, which was very earnest, very straightforward, very conventionally finished and not highly imaginative. It is also fair to say that in the matter of actual execution the local orchestra need stand in no grievous fear of comparison with the visiting one. Mr. Fiedler's tempi, while traditional, were inelastic, and for him evidently Beethoven is the great classic rather than the romantic composer. The audience was as always large and duly appreciative, but the programme was hardly one to arouse any particular enthusiasm.

CITIZEN,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 26 1911

MISS HALLOCK'S RECITAL.

Miss Mary Hallock, of Philadelphia, gave the lecture recital on the programme of the philharmonic concert played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the opera house of the Academy of Music Friday evening. It was the last of the series of five which, like the concerts, are under the auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and the Brooklyn Institute, and was set in lecture hall, Academy of Music.

The lecturer, who had expected to address an audience of women, was surprised to find so many men at an afternoon lecture recital, so interpreted some facts about music in terms of the milliner and the dressmaker.

She had much to say about Brahms and his place in music when speaking of his "Academic Festival Overture," Op. 30, which opened the programme, and in the Dvorak symphony, "From the New World," she indicated themes which might have been suggested to the composer by popular melodies heard while he was here. In the overture to the opera "Der Freischutz," she called attention to the use which Weber makes of the clarinet and horn.

PRESS

New York City.

MAR 26 1911

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

Witek Plays Instead of Schroeder.

Instead of Alwin Schroeder, the Boston Symphony Orchestra's veteran 'cellist, who was to have been the soloist of yesterday afternoon's concert by that famous band in Carnegie Hall, Anton Witek, concert master, assumed once more that responsible position which he had filled so brilliantly on last Thursday evening. It was disappointing, of course, for Schroeder's host of admirers to read the announcement of the change as they entered the hall full of happy anticipations; disappointing, too, for many persons who had looked forward to hearing Tschaikowsky's Variations on a Rococo Theme with orchestra, a work that was played recently with piano accompaniment by Boris Hambourg. Yet Witek's recent achievement in Beethoven's concerto had sharpened curiosity to such an extent that regrets were tempered largely by the prospect of unexpected pleasures.

Witek was not informed that his services as soloist were wanted until after 10 a. m. yesterday. To play the Beethoven concerto once more was out of the question, as the Boston Symphony Orchestra never repeats works at its Saturday matinees which have been performed on the previous Thursday evening. And so Paganini's difficult concerto in D major was selected.

This was short notice for a man who had made no plans for such an emergency. But Witek spent the intervening hours in "brushing up," and when it came to the concert acquitted himself admirably, though his execution of passages that demanded great nimbleness, accuracy and precision of finger and extreme deftness of bowing, was not quite as flawless as at his former appearance. His eloquent tone, his fine repose and artistic poise again made an excellent impression.

The programme opened with a performance of the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," in which Max Fiedler again proved his fondness for rapid tempos and his lack of rhythmical certainty. The next number was Wagner's exquisitely beautiful "Siegfried Idyll," in which the orchestra had an opportunity of revealing many of its excellent qualities.

Beethoven's Symphony in C minor, No. 5, which had its fourth performance in Carnegie Hall within a week, brought not only the concert to a close, but also an exceedingly successful season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Among the thousands who listened to this performance was Arturo Toscanini, the Metropolitan Opera Company's famous conductor.

TIMES

New York City.

MAR 26 1911

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last of Season's Concerts—Mr. Witek Takes Mr. Schroeder's Place as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra brought its season in New York to a close yesterday afternoon with its concert in Carnegie Hall—a season that has been followed with unbated interest and admiration by the most cultivated audience of the city's music lovers. The programme yesterday had to submit to a change because of the illness of Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, who was to be the soloist and whose absence was much regretted.

His place was taken by Mr. Anton Witek, the concert master of the orchestra, who had already appeared as soloist in last Thursday evening's concert. On this occasion he played Paganini's D major violin concerto; a composition that makes very small demands upon the performer's powers as an interpreting artist, and very considerable ones upon his technical proficiency. These he met quite sufficiently, with brilliancy and with abundant mastery of the difficulties that were so new when Paganini first disclosed them in this and in other works of the same style and tendency, but that are nowadays the common property of violinists who aspire to the higher places in the art.

Mr. Witek did not quite succeed in overcoming all the technical problems that are presented in the concerto, with absolute certainty of intonation; but there were again to be admired his beautiful and penetrating tone, his vigorous, delicate and fluent bowing, and his entire self-concentration that leaves no room for the display of mere virtuosoship in his playing. All this was much appreciated, even if deep edification was not derived by his listeners from the composition itself.

The orchestral numbers were Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger" and his "Seigfried Idyll," and Beethoven's fifth symphony. The orchestra played these under Mr. Fiedler's direction, with many of the highest qualities of orchestral interpretation. Especially successful was the reading of the "Siegfried Idyll," in delicacy, tenderness, and sweet poesy. That of the "Meistersinger" prelude was more matter-of-fact and pedestrian; missing something of that passionate lyric quality that is only to be obtained by such a persistent and loving seeking of the "melos" as, for instance, so wonderfully distinguishes Mr. Toscanini's performance of the composition.

The performance of the fifth symphony, especially as exemplified by the first movement, was a very satisfying one.

[202]

SUN

New York City.

MAR - 6 1911

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Anton Witek Plays the D Major Concerto of Paganini at Last Matinee.

The final matinée concert of the regular series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The record of the season closed with the "house sold out," words ever dear to the heart of the manager of public entertainments. The programme was changed at the last moment because of the pernicious activity of grip. Alwin Schroder, the 'cellist, was to have played Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme," but the common winter and spring enemy of mankind laid hands upon him and he was compelled to give up his opportunity to appear once more before his New York admirers.

Fortunately the orchestra was able to supply an acceptable substitute in Anton Witek, the concert master, who was the solo performer on Thursday night. He chose for yesterday afternoon the familiar concerto in D major of Paganini, dear to violinists because of the opportunities it provides for display of tone and technic. Mr. Witek's playing had noteworthy features, though there were moments of uncertain intonation in the passages in double stops.

The orchestral numbers were the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the "Siegfried Idyl" and Beethoven's fifth symphony. It is hardly necessary to make note of the fact that these numbers were played with beauty of tone and with excellence of ensemble. It may be added, however, that Mr. Fiedler's reading of the prelude suggested victory for the rules of the Mastersingers rather than for the progressive and romantic ideas introduced by Walter and received with joy by Hans Sachs.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN LAST CONCERT

Programme Partly Operatic Given; Notes of Musical Events.

The fifth and last of the afternoon concerts promised by the admirable Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season attracted a great audience yesterday to Carnegie Hall.

A programme partly operatic in character had been announced for the occasion. It included the prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the "Siegfried Idyl," Tschaikowsky's "Variations on a Rococo Theme" for 'cello, with Alwin Schroeder as soloist, and Beethoven's C minor symphony, which has been so often heard without tiring.

Owing, however, to the indisposition of Mr. Schroeder, the Tschaikowsky selection was replaced by Wilhelmy's arrangement of Paganini's violin Concerto in D major, which was beautifully interpreted by Anton Witek.

Mr. Fiedler conducted with his usual taste and skill.

om .....

dress .....

MAR 27 1911

Concerts and Operas.

IT is not tenors and baritones alone that grippe, to the dismay of opera managers, singles out for its prey. An eminent 'cellist, Alwin Schroeder, fell a victim last week and did not make his promised appearance as soloist at the final New York concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The orchestra was ready, however, with its substitute. Its concert-master, Anton Witek, who had been the soloist the previous Thursday evening, took Mr. Schroeder's place on the programme, and showed his versatility by performing Paganini's concerto in D, which is at the other pole of violin literature from the Beethoven concerto played by Mr. Witek on Thursday. The violinist made the long skip successfully and showed himself a brilliant, if not flawless, technician. The orchestral numbers of the programme, safely chosen and sanely played, were the "Meistersinger" prelude and the "Siegfried Idyll" from the Wagner volume, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. The next afternoon, also in Carnegie Hall, the People's Symphony series came to an end with a concert devoted wholly to Wagner's music. Last evening the Catholic Oratorio Society gave in Carnegie Hall Tinel's "St. Francis."

Brooklyn, N. Y.

MAR 27 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Concluding Performance of the Season Provides a Brilliant Programme.

Brahms, Beethoven and Bach have been called the divine trinity of music. Of these three master musicians two were represented on the programme offered by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concluding concert of the present season, given last night in the opera house of the Academy of Music. The first number was Brahms' Academie Festival Overture, Op. 80, written in recognition of the honorary degree conferred upon him by the University of Breslau. The rendition of the composition last night was finely balanced with the essential blithsomeness and reminiscent sentiment well indicated.

Dvorak's "From the New World" symphony afforded renewed occasion for those of disputatious tendencies. Whether it was or was not built upon thematic matter, influenced by negro melodies, has but little bearing upon the listener's enjoyment. It is a moving and dramatic work and a beautiful piece of workmanship, its thematic material admirably worked out with ingenuity and fine sweep and rich sentiment.

Mr. Fredler's reading is all that could be demanded by the most exacting; dignified, impressive, appealing to the mind by force of the intellectual insight it so patently reveals. The first movement, with its interesting development and modifications of the chief theme, was delightfully given, the allegro molto, with its brilliant code, was excellently rendered.

The striking largo, with its Indian-like theme and romantic flavor, was a joy, the exquisite pianissimo ending of a ravishing delicacy and precision. In gracious piquant contrast was the third movement, the scherzo. The allegro con fuco, brilliantly played, the climaxes produced with splendid cumulative vigor.

Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra, was the soloist. His number was the Beethoven concerto in D major. His playing gave distinct pleasure and gratification. His tone is of great beauty and limpidity. It has sweetness and purity. His playing reveals sound musicianship. His bowing is noteworthy for its resourcefulness; his technical equipment markedly good. He was recalled many times. The concert closed with Weber's "Der Freischutz," played with engaging nuance.

Mr. Friedler was the recipient of special recognition from the large audience and included the orchestra in his acknowledgment.

Ofthe playing of the orchestra as a whole it is useless to atempt to say anything new. Everything has been said and in terms that seem rhapsodical to those unacquainted with the supremely able quality of their work.

n STAATS ZEITUNG

ress New York City.

e MAR 27 1911

Bostoner Orchester.

Unter Leitung von Herrn Max Fiedler errangen die Bostoner Samstag Nachmittag vor gedrängt vollem Saal in Carnegie Hall den gewohnten Erfolg. Es war das letzte Konzert der Saison, für welches Herr Fiedler Beethoven's Fünfte als Symphonie gewählt hatte, die er mit starker Wirkung dirigirte. Das Orchester leistete darin Unvergleichliches, was auch von den übrigen Nummern, dem Vorspiel zu den „Meistersingern" und dem Wagner'schen „Siegfried"-Idyll, gelten kann. Fiedler und seine bewunderungswürdige Künstlerschaar wurden warm gefeiert. Als Solist spielte Herr Anton Witek, da der Cellist, Herr Schroeder, der als Solist angekündigt worden war, sich unwohl gemeldet hatte, wieder Beethoven's Violinkonzert, und zwar sehr erfolgreich mit seinem schönen Ton und seiner gereiften Technik. Er fand schmeichelhaften Beifall.

s

MAR 27 1911

WITEK AS SUBSTITUTE.

There was great disappointment for the admirers of Alwin Schroeder, the admirable 'cellist of the Boston Symphony orchestra, who had been announced as soloist at the Saturday afternoon concert, which closed the season of this organization in New York. Mr. Schroeder was ill, and in his place Anton Witek, who played so successfully on Thursday evening, presented the Paganini D major violin concerto, in which he did not reach quite the standard of the Beethoven; but such performances as he gave are rare, and are to be appreciated. The programme, under Max Fiedler, included Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," the "Siegfried Idyll" and Beethoven's Fifth symphony, in which the orchestra and conductor aroused the usual enthusiasm and appreciation. The audience was very large.

EVE. TELEGRAM

ess New York City.

MAR 27 1911

The farewell concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon was well attended by the elect, who, as usual, applauded vigorously, yet with discrimination. Mr. Witek, the concert master, played the Paginini Concerto in D major, replacing Mr. Schroeder, whose sudden illness made a change in the programme.

Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" Overture and Siegfried Idyll and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, all given with that opulence of color, precision and variety of effect for which the great orchestra is so justly famous, completed one of the most satisfactory concerts of the year.

Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World

om

dress

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

APR 3

The last Symphony concert of the season, in Infantry Hall to-night, will be a brilliant musical and social event, few desirable seats remaining unsold.

NEWS

PROVIDENCE, R. I.

APR 3 - 1911

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Final Concert

MISS CAROLINA WHITE

—Photograph by Matzene, Chicago

Carolina White, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler, conductor, at its last concert tomorrow evening, is another of the New England girls who has made her way to the front of the great operatic songers of the world. Miss White, who is still in her twenties, was born in Allston and received her first vocal training in Boston.

After a few years abroad, in Italy, she was engaged last summer by Manager Dippel of the Chicago Grand Opera company with the idea that she would work in on the minor parts. Her opportunity came one night through the illness of one of the principal singers of the company, and, to use a vernacular, she "made good," so much so that Puccini designated her as the one singer to create the part of Minnie in the Chicago production of "The Girl of the Golden West."

Miss White is to sing two numbers with the Boston Symphony, one an aria by dress PROVIDENCE, R. I.

TRIBUNE

APR 3

THE SYMPHONY SOLOIST.

Miss Carolina White Will Sing at Concert To-morrow Night.

Carolina White, who is to be the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its last concert to-morrow evening, is another of the New England girls who has made her way to the front among the great operatic singers of the world. Miss White, who is still in her 20s, was born in Allston and received her first vocal training in Boston. After a few years abroad in Italy she was engaged last summer by Manager Dippel of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, with the idea that she would work in on the minor parts. Her opportunity came one night through the illness of one of the principal singers of the company, and, to use the vernacular, she "made good," so much so that Puccini designated her as the one singer to create the part of Minnie in the Chicago production of "The Girl of the Golden West." Miss White is to sing two numbers with the Boston Symphony, one an aria by Catalani and the other an aria by

JOURNAL

ess

Seeber Edwards presided.

The last Symphony concert of the season will be given this evening at 8:1 o'clock in Infantry Hall, with Miss Carolina White, soprano of the Chicago Philadelphia Opera Company, as soloist

[203]

From Journal Providence, R.I.
Address
Date Apr. 5 11

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra Closes Successful Season with Fine Programme.

The fifth and last concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening, closing the most successful season the orchestra has ever had here, a season marked by a succession of remarkably interesting programmes and a record-breaking attendance. Last night's storm and the very uncomfortable conditions of locomotion which prevailed did not prevent the hall being filled, as usual, with attentive and enthusiastic listeners. The programme, which matched well with the fine offerings at the preceding concerts, was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, in C-minor, Op. 68....Brahms
I. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Wally's air, "Ebben? ne andro lontana," from "La Wally," act I.....Catalani
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana
Aria, "L'Altra Notte" from "Mefistofele," act III.....Boito
Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," Op. 24.....Richard Strauss

Brahms's symphony in C-minor needs no tag. It could not have been written by any other composer. We have here in full measure the Brahms prolixity, his introspective mood, his fondness for complicated rhythm and intricate contrapuntal development. Yet withal it must be owned that the symphony is a great work, though it lacks anywhere the compelling musical beauty that distinguishes some of the separate movements in his other symphonies. The last movement of the C-minor is impressive, powerful, and works out to a grand climax. The main theme is strongly suggestive of that which forms the foundation of the final movement in Beethoven's great ninth symphony, and this resemblance is sometimes quoted as an instance of plagiarism. But Brahms was the last man to consciously imitate any other composer. Philip Hale puts the incident more correctly in a neat phrase. "One cannot call it plagiarism," he says; "it is two men saying the same thing."

The second orchestral number, Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," is number two of a cycle of symphonic poems inspired by the great Czech composer's patriotic feeling. Musically, it is distinguished by its quiet beauty and lovely orchestration, and last night's audience gave it greater applause than any other number on the programme. The concert closed with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," a composition of uneven merit and by no means as interesting as his "Don Juan," played at the first concert of the present season.

The soloist was Miss Carolina White, who took at short notice the place which Madame Louise Homer was to have filled on this occasion. The absence of the great contralto was a disappointment, and it cannot be said that this feeling was much allayed by the performance of her substitute. Miss White comes from the Boston Opera Company, in which she has been credited with some success. Evidently she might have made a better impression with orchestral accompaniment—both her operatic arias were sung with piano—for she has a large voice of not unpleasant quality. But her style is crude and her singing marred by a constant and most detestable tremulo. Nevertheless she was loudly applauded—whatever that may indicate.

The playing of the orchestra was superb as ever, and Conductor Fiedler's readings were marked, as usual, by individuality and excellent taste. The work of this magnificent organization has been well appreciated here this season, and the interest aroused will doubtless not lag in the future as it has in the past. W. A. P.

...Most Extensive and Most Complete Newspaper Clipping Bureau in the World
From ...
Address ...PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date ...

Symphony Concert.

The fifth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night called together a very large and brilliant assemblage, despite the wretched weather conditions. In the great gathering were the following: Mr. William B. Weeden, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Parsons Cross, Mr. and Mrs. Stephen O. Edwards, the Misses Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Horatio A. Hunt, Mr. Theodore F. Green, Miss Eleanor B. Green, Mrs. Webster Knight, Miss Adelbert Knight, Mr. and Mrs. Irving P. Irons, Mr. Charles Morris Smith, Miss Smith, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Lustig, Mrs. W. B. M. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. William C. Huntoon, Prof. Lorenzo Sears, Miss Sears, Mrs. Frederick A. Allen, Mr. Richmond Allen, Mr. and Mrs. John T. Cranshaw, Judge and Mrs. William H. Sweetland, Mrs. E. R. Trowbridge, Mrs. Charles W. Alexander, Miss Fanny Alexander, Mrs. William H. Reynolds, Prof. and Mrs. Charles W. Brown, Miss Virginia Shepley, Miss Carolyn Peck, Mr. and Mrs. Edward L. Clarke, Dr. and Mrs. Albert H. Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Erling C. Ostby, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Hall Brown, Mrs. Albert H. Tillinghast, Miss Tillinghast, Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Hartwell, Miss Caroline Kelly, Mr. Marc T. Greene, Miss Helen B. Pettis, Mrs. Edward Douglas Pearce, Mrs. George M. Smith, Mr. and Mrs. J. Palmer Barstow, Mr. Julian Herreshoff, Rev. and Mrs. Richard R. Graham, Mrs. James R. MacColl, Mrs. Frank J. Goodwin, Mrs. Gilbert C. Carpenter, Col. and Mrs. Walter J. Comstock, Mrs. Charles T. Richmond, Mrs. Frank A. Sayles, Mrs. William Binney, Mrs. Samuel Ames, Miss Sarah Babbitt, Mr. Harold Waterman, Mr. and Mrs. Albert L. Calder, 2d, Mrs. Henry W. Roth, Dr. and Mrs. Ernest Charbonnel, Mr. and Mrs. Richard A. Hurley, Mr. and Mrs. John C. Davis, Mrs. Ernst Fischer, Miss Evangeline Larry, Mr. and Mrs. George H. Lomas, Mr. and Mrs. William T. Crandell, Miss Helen C. Capron, Mr. Guy Strickler, Miss Ethel E. Tower, Miss Harriett J. Miller, Mrs. C. L. Harris, Miss Beatrice Harris, Miss Harriot E. Barrows, Miss Helen Tyler Grant, Miss Helen Ames, Miss Florence Ames, Miss Ellis McAlister, Miss Carolina Slocum, Miss Olive Russell, Mrs. George C. Arnold, Miss Gertrude Lamson.

From ...
Address ...PROVIDENCE, R.I.
Date APR 4 - 1911

MISS WHITE TO SING HERE

Young Prima Donna Will Appear at Infantry Hall To-night.

Carolina White, the young operatic singer who has risen to the front rank in her profession in a single season, will be the soloist at the last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this evening at Infantry Hall.

Miss White, like Geraldine Farrar, Emma Eames and Lillian Nordica, is a New Englander. She was born and raised in Boston and got her early training in that city. After two years spent in Italian opera houses, she was engaged last summer by Mr. Dippel as a member of the Chicago Grand Opera Company.

MISS CAROLINE WHITE.

Her opportunity came through the illness of one of the stars of the company and so great was her success that she was not only chosen to create Minnie in Puccini's "The Girl of the Golden West," in the Chicago production, but later she created the very important role of Susanna in Wolf-Ferrari's "The Secret of Susanna," which had its first production in America at the Metropolitan Opera House a few weeks ago.

Miss White will sing two numbers this evening, an aria by Catalani and one by Boite.

From ...
Address ...
Date ...

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Max Fiedler Will Conduct It at Infantry Hall, Tuesday Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its fifth and last concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, April 4, at 8:15 o'clock. This will bring to an end the most successful season the orchestra has ever had in Providence no matter from what point of view the question is looked at. The programmes have been up to Mr. Fiedler's high mark and their performances up to the standard of the orchestra. Moreover, never has the management offered such distinguished soloists as this year. The first concert brought Mme. Olive Fremstad, principal dramatic soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and then came Josef Hofmann, Mischa Elman and Yolande Mero.

For the last concert Mme. Louise Homer, contralto, of the Metropolitan Opera House, had been announced, but Mr. Ellis, manager of the orchestra, felt compelled to grant the urgent request of the Metropolitan that she be released from the engagement because of the continued illness of Caruso, it would put the Metropolitan company in a most embarrassing position to go without her services on that evening. However, this unfortunate affair is not an unmixed evil because it will enable Providence to hear Carolina White, principal dramatic soprano of the Chicago-Philadelphia Grand Opera Company, a young woman who in one season has leaped from comparative obscurity of Italian opera houses to a leading position in the world's great singers. Like so many Americans that have become famous in opera, Carolina White is a New Englander and is, in fact, a Bostonian, having been born in Allston. Her early studies were in Boston, then followed some years in Italy which culminated in two years in various Italian opera houses, where she was getting routine.

Last summer after many disappointments, she secured a hearing from Mr. Dippel, managing director of the Chicago Opera Company, and he engaged her largely on faith, thinking that there was promise in her and that he would make good use of her. Her name was absolutely unknown when the season of opera opened in Chicago last November and at the end of 10 weeks she was the most famous woman in the company. In that time she had not only sung all the heaviest roles of Italian opera but she had created the role of Minnie in Puccini's opera, "The Girl of the Golden West," in the Chicago production. During the last half of the season she sang in Philadelphia, New York and Boston, always with unusual success, and just a few weeks ago in New York she created the leading part in Wolf-Ferrari's charming one-act opera, "The Secret of Susanna." Here she will sing two great Italian arias, one from Catalani's "Le Wally" and the other from Boito's "Mefistofele."

Mr. Fiedler has made another of his excellent programmes. It will begin with Brahms's symphony in C-minor No. 1. The middle number will be Smetana's beautiful symphonic poem, "The Moldau" and at the end will come what many regard as the greatest [illegible]

From Tribune Providence
Address Apr. 5 11

FITTING FINALE OF SYMPHONY SEASON

Series of Brilliant Concerts by Boston Orchestra Ended Before Large Audience.

The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall last night was a fitting finale to a season which has been beyond question the most successful that the orchestra has ever had in this city. Never before has the season embraced so many concerts, never have the audiences been so large and appreciative, though most every night has been a stormy one, never before have the soloists been so uniformly talented and never before has the orchestra presented such admirably arranged and artistically executed programmes. This happy combination of superlative features has made the course a notable one in the musical annals of Providence and the future of the orchestra in this city would seem now to be thoroughly assured.

It was a characteristic programme that was offered last night for the closing concert of the series, another of those happily arranged collections of numbers which Mr. Fiedler has shown so well that he knows how to select. It opened with Brahms's symphony in C-minor, No. 1, which was followed by Smetana's beautiful symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and closed with Richard Strauss's great tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The symphony is one of the great works of the composer, and its course was followed with almost breathless attention and keen pleasure by the audience until the climax at the close, which was followed by spontaneous and well-merited applause. The symphonic poem was marked by exquisite beauty and was one of the best selections rendered by the orchestra during the entire season. That it was a favorite with those present last night was clearly indicated by the warmth of the testimonial of approval at its close. The tone poem was also rendered with fine effect, and was thoroughly pleasing to the critical hearers.

There was little disappointment in regard to the soloist, although a change had to be made after the arrangement was supposed to be beyond recall. In place of Mme. Louise Homer, whom the Metropolitan Opera Company asked to be released from her engagement here, appeared Mme. Carolina White, the principal dramatic soprano of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, a young woman who won her way to fame in a single season. She is a New Englander and has proved herself the possessor not only of an excellent voice but also of marked dramatic ability. Her selections last night were two Italian arias, one from Catalini's "Le Wally" and the other from the prison song from Bolto's "Mefistofole," and she sang them in a manner that won hearty applause, her voice being strong and of good quality.

The orchestration was of that quality which marks every programme which this organization of musicians plays and the leadership of Conductor Fiedler was on the same high plane, indicating how well he has his players in hand and how careful and painstaking he is in his direction.

The music lovers of Providence who have enjoyed so thoroughly the concert course this winter will look forward eagerly to the beginning of another in the fall, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra series has come to be a fixture of the musical season in this city.

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date APR 2 - 1911

Much interest at the fifth and last of the season's Boston Symphony concerts next Tuesday will centre in the first appearance here of Carolina White, who was secured to take the place left vacant in the programme when Mme. Olive Fremstad's engagement was cancelled by the Metropolitan management. Miss White is an American soprano, whose success this season with the Chicago-Philadelphia Opera Company has been notable.

She is a native of Boston, where she studied as a girl. After several years of study abroad she sang in various Italian opera houses, where Mr. Dippel heard her and engaged her last summer, "largely on faith," declares the press agent. This faith seems to have been justified, for at the end of the Chicago season she was recognized as in the front rank of dramatic sopranos. Her most important new roles were those of Minnie in the Chicago production of "Girl of the Golden West" and of the name part in "The Secret of Suzanna."

At the local concert she will sing two arias, one from Catalani's "Le Wally" and the other from Boito's "Mefistofele."

Mr. Fiedler has made another of his excellent orchestral programmes. The symphony will be Brahms's in C-minor No. 1. In the middle of the programme will come Smetana's bit of "water music," his symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and finally at the end will be played what many consider the greatest of Richard Strauss's tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration."

From JOURNAL
Address PROVIDENCE, R. I.
Date APR 2 - 1911

Prof. H. C. MacDougall of Wellesley College will give an analytical lecture on the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert for Tuesday evening, at Manning Hall to-morrow afternoon at 3 o'clock. The principal themes and parts of the programme will be played. This will be the last of the free analytical lectures given by the Rhode Island State Federation of Music Clubs this season. The public is invited.

[204]

From PUBLIC LEDGER
Address PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Date APR 3 - 1911

THE ORCHESTRA.

The close of the very successful eleventh season of the Philadelphia Orchestra again calls attention to the need of an endowment fund for this admirable organization. There are at present 231 persons who, as members and guarantors of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association, contribute at least $25 a year apiece to its support. A few there are who give a great deal more than the specified amount, in addition to the contribution of their time and their devoted energy to the furtherance of the cause of absolute music in Philadelphia.

The orchestra, unlike the opera, is not virtually subsidized by the subscription of a large sum for the rental of the boxes, in addition to the purchase of $10,000 worth of stock by each boxholder. The orchestra has to depend upon a number of small subscriptions and upon the receipts for the sale of tickets. That the deficit is not greater is due to an unrecognized extent to the work of the General Women's Committee, the West Philadelphia Committee and the Germantown and Chestnut Hill Committee, as well as to the generosity of the guarantors.

The great Boston Orchestra is supported by one man's liberality. Our own orchestra is maintained by several hundred persons for the benefit of many thousands. An endowment fund will make it unnecessary for this splendid institution to appear in the light of a mendicant for the alms of philanthropists who recognize the uplifting and educative effect of orchestral music.

MARCH 17, 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Only Concert In Springfield Will Be Given On March 27.

The sale of seats for the only concert that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Springfield this year will open at the box office of the Court Square theater next Thursday morning. The concert itself will be given on Monday evening March 27th. There is every prospect that the house will be entirely sold out. The response in the form of mail orders has been very large and it is evident that the appetite of the public for such music as this famous Orchestra presents has been keenly whetted by its long absence from Springfield.

MAX FIEDLER.

The programme is one which will appeal to all classes of music lovers. Schubert's symphony in C-Major is one of the most beautiful works in the whole literature of music, being particularly rich in melodies and tunes. Vieuxtemps Concerto for Violin in A-Minor, which Second Concert Master Noack will play, is a masterpiece of its kind, while in the whole range of lighter music there is nothing more delicate or more exquisitely charming than Tschaikowsky's Suite "Nut-Cracker." The Suite is in six different movements, comprising an overture, march, various characteristic dances and finally an entrancing waltz.

TIGHT BINDING

THE SPRINGFIELD SUNDAY UNION; MAR... NEW-YORK DAILY TRIBUNE, SUNDAY, M...

SYLVAIN NOACK

Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra

Newspaper Clipping Bureau of the World
GERMAN PRESS
m
ress New York City
APR 5 - 1911

New Yorker Spaziergänge

Auf der Jagd nach neuen Witzen. — Wo sind die bekannten Witzbolde unseres Städtchens? — Zwei Schnurren, „made in Germany". — Kommt wirklich alles Gute von „über'm großen Teiche"?

Wieder einmal ein Besuch am Stammtische der Witzbolde.

Man hört so wunderselten mehr etwas Gutes und Neues heutzutage, daß es einem sogar nicht auf eine Reise ankommt, vom City Hall Park nach der 58. Straße, wenn man nur einigermaßen sicher ist, dort auf seine Rechnung kommen zu können.

Es steht schlimm um den Humor in New York.

Peppi Mütter ist hoffnungslos in Berlin, und Carl Hauser ist hier.

Aber New York ist groß, und im Café Fleischmann habe ich ihn vergebens in jedem Winkel gesucht.

Da ist dann noch ein großer Witzbold vor dem Herrn, ein Geiger der Bostoner Symphonie, ein wahrer Genius, ein Satyr und Seelenbruder Xaver Scharwenka's, — das hat er mir selbst in einer schwachen Stunde anvertraut. Aber der sächsische Witzbold theilt das Loos aller großen Genies. Er ist unverstanden. Ich, wenigstens habe nie seine Witze — nein, nicht einmal seinen Namen verstehen können! —

Bleibt also nur noch der Stammtisch im Liederkranz. Der freilich ist unerschöpflich. Und dort habe ich denn auch die beiden folgenden Schnurren aufgetrieben.

In Rußland wars. Zur Zeit, als die Revolution gegen das Bestehende hohe Wellen schlug.

Väterchen Czar herrschte mit eiserner Hand, und seine Diener züchtigten die Aufrührer mit Feuer und Schwert, mit Pulver und Strick.

In einem Gouvernement an der preußischen Grenze war Gerichtstag gewesen. Die meisten Uebelthäter hatte man standrechtlich abgeurtheilt, wie es in jenen Tagen Sitte war. Nur drei arme Sünder hatte man eingebracht. Zwei christliche Bauernburschen, die sich ein kleines Raubmördchen hatten zu Schulden kommen lassen, und einen armseligen Hausirer aus — — da hab' ich richtig den Namen vergessen, aber es klang wie Strzeprscsky. Der unglückliche Händler mit Hosenträgern, Schuhbändern war des — Hochverrathes, trotzdem er so harmmathloser Enkel des Ahasverus ausschauen kann.

Aber weder Schwüre noch Unschuldsbetheuerungen konnten ihn retten.

Mit den zwei Bauernburschen wurde er kurzer Hand zum Tod durch den Strang verurtheilt und erhielt gleich diesen acht Tage Zeit, seine Rechnung mit dem Himmel abzuschließen.

Nun war das arme Hausirerlein nicht ganz freundlos. Die Cultusgemeinde nahm sich seiner an, und ein Comite, das sich aus den angesehensten Israeliten zusammensetzte, richtete eine Petition an den Czaren in Petersburg und verwandte sich für den armen Sünder.

Aber der Tag der Hinrichtung kam, und kein Wort vom „weißen Väterchen".

Die drei Verurtheilten wurden in den Hof geführt. Noch einmal verlas der Procurator des Czaren den schlimmen Spruch. Dann zog man den Bauernburschen die zerschlissenen Ziegenpelze aus, — der arme Hausirer hatte keinen, man brauchte sich also nicht weiter um ihn bemühen, — und der Henker begann sein Werk.

Schnell waren die zwei Mörder aufgeknüpft, und die Reihe sollte an den „Hausirer" kommen, als plötzlich ein Courier in den Hof sprengte, der die Nachricht brachte, daß der Kaiser den armen Schlucker voll begnadigt habe.

Ganz fassungslos stand der arme Teufel da.

„Haben Sie nicht gehört, Sie können gehen", wandte sich der Gefängniß-Director an den zitternden Hausirer. Und als dieser noch immer keine Miene machte, die Richtstätte zu verlassen, wiederholte er freundlich: „Sie können gehen, Sie sind frei!"

Und da hob das Hausirerlein den schmächtigen Arm und wies auf die zwei Ziegenpelze der gerichteten Bauern, die am Zaune hingen, und meinte geschäftig:

„Ja, aber wie is' mit die alten Kleider von die Leut?"

Und dann ein zweiter, den ein Anderer am Stammtisch der Witzbolde zum Besten gab.

Vor einem preußischen Amtsrichter war der Kantor Moses Rosenstock als Zeuge vorgeladen.

Die Reihe der Vernehmung kam an ihn.

„Schächter Rosenstock", rief der gestrenge Richter.

Schweigen im Gerichtssaal. —

„Amtsdiener, rufen sie draußen im Corridor den Schächter Rosenstock", ordnete der Vorsitzende an.

Der Befehl wird ausgeführt. Keine Antwort.

„Herr Rosenstock", wandte sich der Vertheidiger an den im Saale sitzenden Kantor. „Warum antworten Sie nicht? Sie sollen ja vernommen werden."

Empört blitzt der Richter den gelassenen Rosenstock an, der noch immer keine Miene macht, vorzutreten.

„Herr," donnert er, „haben Sie nicht gehört, daß ich wiederholt „Schächter Rosenstock" aufrufen ließ?"

„Herr Richter", lächelt behaglich der also Getadelte. „Kantor Rosenstock bin ich für die Orthodoxen. Schächter Rosenstock nur für die Ochsen!"

Der Spaziergänger.

MUSICAL COMMENT

The Philharmonic Society's Sixty-ninth Season—The Status in the Affairs of the Society.

BOSTON'S SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

With last Friday's concert the sixty-ninth season of the Philharmonic Society came to an end. Perhaps it would be better to say the sixty-ninth series of subscription concerts, for the orchestra as now administered has still an engagement to give a concert in co-operation with the Wage Earners' League, next Sunday, and will give concerts this week in Princeton and Washington. No doubt if other opportunities offer to give public performances elsewhere they will be accepted. We are concerned more particularly now, however, with the local season. As originally planned this began on November 1, and was to comprise sixteen Tuesday evening subscription concerts, as many Friday afternoon meetings, at which the Tuesday programme was to be repeated; eight Sunday afternoon concerts in the Borough of Manhattan, and five Sunday afternoon concerts in the Borough of Brooklyn. These were all given, together with two extra concerts in each of the two boroughs—forty-nine concerts in all. The orchestra's activities outside of the city, counting in the two concerts still to be given, include three concerts in Washington, two in Princeton and one each in Pittsburg, Cleveland, Buffalo, Syracuse, Rochester, Utica, Newark, Philadelphia, Springfield (Mass.) and Hartford. The programmes at the out-of-town concerts were made up of works previously played here, and need not concern us. The local list affords abundant food for study because of its evidence of a strenuous endeavor to reach what the management obviously conceived to be the popular taste. It is therefore set forth herewith in full. Comment might profitably follow, but since this review is concerned only with facts, it may be withheld at least for the present.

Composer.	Composition.	Times performed.
Bach-Mahler	Suite in B minor and D	3
Beethoven	Overture, "Egmont"	1
Beethoven	Overture, "König Stephan"	2
Beethoven	Overture, "Coriolan"	2
Beethoven	Overture, "Leonore, No. 3"	2
Beethoven	Pianoforte concerto in E flat	2
Beethoven	Symphony, "Eroica"	1
Beethoven	Symphony No. 5, C minor	2
Beethoven	Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"	2
Beethoven	Symphony No. 7, A major	4
Berlioz	Instrumental movements from "La Damnation"	1
Berlioz	Instrumental movements from "Romeo et Juliet"	3
Bizet	Suite No. 1, "L'Arlésienne"	3
Bizet	Suite, "Roma"	2
Bossi	"Intermezzi Goldoniani"	2
Brahms	Symphony No. 1, C minor	2
Bruch	Violin concerto in G minor	1
Busoni	"Berceuse élégiaque"	2
Chabrier	Rhapsody, "Espana"	2
Chabrier	"Ode à la Musique"	2
Chadwick	Overture, "Melpomene"	2
Cherubini	Overture, "Anacreon"	2
Debussy	"Rondes de Printemps"	2
Debussy	"Iberia	2
Dvorak	Overture, "Carnival"	3
Dvorak	Symphony, "From the New World"	4
Elgar	Variations on an original theme	2
Elgar	Songs, "Sea Pictures"	2
Enesco	Suite, Op. 9	2
Glazounow	Tableau musical, "Le Printemps"	2
Goldmark	Concerto for violin, A minor	1
Goldmark	Overture, "In Springtime"	1
Goldmark	Overture, "Sakuntala"	1
Grieg	Suite, "Peer Gynt," No. 1	1
Grieg	Suite, "Sigurd Jorsalfar"	1
Grieg	Cantata, "At the Cloister Gate"	1
Hadley	Symphonic poem, "The Culprit Fay"	2
Lalo	Aubade (song) from "Le Roi d'Ys"	3
Lalo	Overture, "Le Roi d'Ys"	1
Liszt	Symphonic poem, "Les Préludes"	1
Liszt	Symphonic poem, "Tasso"	1
Liszt	"Mephisto Waltz"	1
Loeffler	"La Vilanelle du Diable"	1
MacDowell	Concerto No. 2 for pianoforte	1
MacDowell	Symphonic fragment, "Die Saracenen"	2
MacDowell	Symphonic fragment, "Die schöne Alda"	2
Mahler	Symphony in G, No. 4	2
Mahler	Two songs with orchestra	2
Massenet	Air from "Le Mage"	3
Massenet	Air from "Manon"	3
Mendelssohn	Italian Symphony	2
Mendelssohn	Overture, "Die schöne Melusine"	2
Mendelssohn	Overture, "Fingal's Cave"	2
Mendelssohn	Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream"	2
Mendelssohn	Concerto for violin	1
Mozart	Symphony in G minor	2
Mozart	Dances	2
Pfitzner	Overture, "Kätchen von Heilbronn"	2
Rimsky-Korsakow	"Scheherazade"	2
Saint-Saëns	Pianoforte concerto in C minor	2
Saint-Saëns	Two airs from "Samson et Dalila"	1
Schillings	Prelude, Act III, "Der Pfeiffertag"	2
Scharwenka, X.	Pianoforte concerto in F minor	1
Schubert	Symphony in C, No. 9	2
Schubert	Symphony in B minor (unfinished)	2
Schumann	Symphony in C	2
Schumann	Symphony in E flat ("Rhenish")	2
Schumann	Overture to "Manfred"	2
Sibelius	Concerto in D minor for violin	2
Sinigaglia	Overture, "La Baruffe Chiozzotte"	2
Smetana	Symphonic poem, "Vltava"	2
Smetana	Cradle Song	2
Strauss, R.	Symphonic poem, "Till Eulenspiegel"	3
Strauss, R.	Symphonic poem, "Ein Heldenleben"	2
Strauss, R.	Symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zaratrustra"	2
Strauss, R.	Symphonic poem, "Tod und Verklärung"	2
Strauss, R.	Song, with orchestra, "Pilgrim's Morning Song"	2
Strauss, R.	Song, with orchestra, "Verführung"	2
Strauss, R.	Song, with orchestra, "Freundliche Vision"	2
Strauss, R.	Song, with orchestra, "Heimliche Aufforderung"	2
Grendsen	"Carnival in Paris"	2
Tschaikowsky	Symphony No. 5	2
Tschaikowsky	Symphony No. 6	2
Tschaikowsky	Symphony No. 6 ("Pathetique")	2
Tschaikowsky	Suite No. 4	2
Tschaikowsky	Concerto for violin	2
Tschaikowsky	"Francesca da Rimini"	2
Wagner	Overture, "Rienzi"	2
Wagner	Overture, "The Flying Dutchman"	2
Wagner	Overture, "Eine Faust"	2
Wagner	Overture, "Tannhäuser"	2
Wagner	Prelude, "Lohengrin"	2
Wagner	Prelude, "Die Meistersinger"	2
Wagner	Prelude, "Die Meistersinger" (Act III)	2
Wagner	Magic Fire Scene from "Die Walküre"	2
Wagner	Ride of the Valkyrior, from "Die Walküre"	2
Wagner	"Siegfried Idyl"	2
Wagner	"Waldweben," from "Siegfried"	2
Wagner	Prelude and Glorification, "Parsifal"	2
Wagner	"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"	2
Wagner	"Siegfried's Rhine Journey," "Götterdämmerung"	2
Wagner	"Siegfried's Death March," "Götterdämmerung"	2
Wagner	Prelude and Finale, "Tristan und Isolde"	2
Wagner	"Kaisermarsch"	1
Wagner	Overture and Bacchanals, "Tannhäuser"	1
Wagner	Prayer from "Tannhäuser"	3
Wagner	Elizabeth's entrance air, "Tannhäuser"	1
Wagner	Adriano's air from "Rienzi"	3
Wagner	Elsa's dream from "Lohengrin"	2
Wagner	Sachs's monologue, Act II, "Meistersinger"	2
Wagner	Waltraute's scene, "Götterdämmerung"	3
Wagner	Brünnhilde's Immolation, "Götterdämmerung"	2
Wagner	Song, "Träume"	2
Wagner	Song, "Im Treibhaus"	2
Wagner	Song, "Schmerzen"	2
Wagner	Song, "Stehe Still"	2
Weber	Overture, "Oberon"	2
Weber	Overture, "Der Freischütz"	1
Weber-Weingartner	"Invitation to the Dance"	3

At no time since the history of the Philharmonic Society began has there been a livelier interest in its internal affairs and, possibly, less popular concern with its artistic fortunes. It is easy to say that much of the interest which has found public expression has been idle and, as some would have the world believe, impertinent. But the Philharmonic Society has a past which entitles every serious lover of music to be interested in its doings. It is not a matter of small moment that New York should possess an organization which, on the lines of its original foundation, made a prouder record than that of any similar organization in the world, with the exception of the society of like name in London. Two years ago the Philharmonic Society, in the hope of achieving a "permanency" which had been denied to it, though it had endured through good and evil fortune for sixty-seven years, submitted to a reorganization and admitted a number of public spirited people into its administrative councils. The old communal system represented by its constitution was abandoned and a new method of operations adopted. A fund amounting to $100,000 a year was placed at the disposition of its management. With such help, greater than any ever before extended to a concert institution here or elsewhere, it was believed that a higher artistic ideal and better financial results would be attained. At the end of two years the goal aimed at seems further away than ever. The season now ending began with doubt haunting many minds. Mr. Gustav Mahler returned to fill the second year of a term of two years for which he had been engaged, but had scarcely begun his labors before it was stated that under no circumstances would he return for a third year—the period for which the guarantee fund had been provided. Rumors of a proceeding, more or less revolutionary, began to fill the air. The first shape that these rumors took was that the society was to be "Americanized"—whatever that may have meant—and that Mr. Henry Hadley was to be the conductor in the season 1911-'12. Then came accounts, all well authenticated, of the opening of negotiations with various conductors at home and abroad—Mr. Weingartner, Mr. Gericke, Dr. Muck, Mr. Victor Herbert, Mr. Franz Kneisel. In nearly every case the negotiations fell through because it was known that the guarantee fund was not likely to last more than one season and that musicians of eminence were not disposed to undertake so large a task with so small a prospect of its successful continuance. The artistic side of the case was plainly set forth in a letter which Mr. Kneisel sent to the committee representing the society and the subscribers to the guarantee fund. He argued the absolute necessity of a new fund large enough to insure the existence of the society in perpetuity, so that engagements might be made on a less hazardous system than that now prevailing, that an esprit du corps might be created among the players, that musicians and conductor might become familiar with each other and devoted to a common ideal, and pointed to two methods which might be adopted—that of an endowment by a single generous minded citizen, like Major Higginson, in Boston, or a large aggregation of music lovers, like the contributors to the fund which has placed the Theodore Thomas Orchestra on a solid footing in Chicago. But as soon as the fact became known that Mr. Kneisel had been asked to consider a proposition to become conductor of the society the written proposition of the committee was publicly repudiated. Efforts were now directed to persuade Mr. Mahler to reconsider his determination not to return for another season, and it was widely known that he had done so when the difficulties growing out of his illness and a question of administrative authority, mentioned in this journal some ten days ago, led him to give an ultimatum which has not yet been accepted. Meanwhile, though no dates have been set and no conductor appointed, invitations have been issued to the public to subscribe for next year's series of concerts.

Since February 24 all the rehearsals and concerts of the society have been directed by Mr. Theodore Spiering, who was brought here by Mr. Mahler to be the concert master of the orchestra. A report printed in an afternoon newspaper a few days ago indicates that there is a disagreement between Mr. Spiering and the management concerning remuneration for his work as conductor. That seems hardly credible, but it appears that Mr. Spiering, who has certainly made an excellent record as conductor, has also been considered as Mr. Mahler's possible successor. At any rate, it is interesting to read what Mr. Glen Dillard Gunn had to say on the subject a week ago to-day in "The Tribune" newspaper of Chicago. Here it is:

Theodore Spiering, formerly a valued factor in Chicago's musical life, whose selection as concert master of the reorganized Philharmonic Orchestra of New York under Gustav Mahler last season was the source of much gratification to his many friends and admirers in this city, has gained laurels as conductor during Mr. Mahler's recent illness and consequent absence from his post. So deep was the impression made by Mr. Spiering that his name has been suggested as Mr. Mahler's successor, together with that of Franz Kneisel and Frederick Stock. Kneisel and Stock have both declined the honor, and Spiering's chances would seem to be excellent.

Spiering [illegible] unknown to Chicago [illegible] notice during the Savage [illegible] lish opera at the Studebaker [illegible] he took the place of the [illegible] at a moment's notice, and [illegible] self with credit. Later [illegible] orchestra of his own and [illegible] of the spring festival [illegible] York critics spoke of his [illegible] ances with the Philharmonic [illegible] with the liveliest respect, [illegible] the virtues of authority and [illegible] originality and initiative.

The success which has followed [illegible] ods of Major Higginson led [illegible] tion again in the last concert [illegible] son of that organization in Carnegie [illegible] yesterday. So far as could be [illegible] was not a vacant box or chair in the [illegible] yet there was nothing to equal the [illegible] interest in the programme. Every [illegible] prelude to "Die Meistersinger" [illegible] Philharmonic Society had given [illegible] three times this season and twice [illegible] peared on other programmes, [illegible] in its proper place at the opening [illegible] "Siegfried Idyl," twice played by the Philharmonic Society, and Beethoven's [illegible] symphony, played for the first time [illegible] this year's concerts began. Herr [illegible] Schroeder had been announced to play [illegible] Variations on Rococo Theme by Tschaikowsky, but he was indisposed. [illegible] Witek, the solo performer, stepped [illegible] breach and played, very acceptably, [illegible] the violin concerto in D by Wagner. [illegible] the audience accepted all the music [illegible] ly. It used to be a custom [illegible] recorders of musical affairs to [illegible] how much it cost Major Higginson [illegible] tain his orchestra single handed. [illegible] speculation has stopped. The [illegible] men on his payroll and giving [illegible] do this season, at least 13 [illegible] will find the two sides of the [illegible] ancing each other when the [illegible] accounts for the year. Such [illegible] tribute to the genius of the [illegible] sicians and their conductor, [illegible] shining example of what [illegible] invariable policy of leaving [illegible] in the hands of his artists [illegible]

A special concert will be given [illegible] Philadelphia Orchestra, [illegible] Wednesday, in honor of the National Federation of Musical Clubs, at which the symphony by George W. Chadwick and the [illegible] orchestra, "Crepuscule," by Henry Hadley, which took two of the prizes [illegible] the National Federation this year, will be performed under the direction of the composers.

[illegible]

STANDARD UNION,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

APR 6 1911

BOSTON SYMPHONY HAD GOOD SEASON

Philharmonic Concerts Well Attended Despite Other Attractions.

$12,212.50 TOTAL RECEIPTS.

Reports Submitted at Woman's Auxiliary Meeting.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary on the philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to-day in Art Hall, Academy of Music. In the absence of the president, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, Mrs. Charles F. Pray presided. Mrs. C. Buek acted as secretary.

Mrs. Pray read the report of the executive committee, and after a brief session d oted to routine business the meeti g adjourned.

The statement of the secretary said that the season of Philharmonic concerts just closed was the most successful since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began coming here, nearly twenty years ago. Although there have been five symphony concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, seven by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, fifteen operas, and many other musical events of importance in Brooklyn, the attendance has not been affected thereby, but has been up to the capacity of the opera house. It was Max Fiedler's third year as conductor, and the good impressions that he first made have been strengthened. He will continue as conductor.

Receipts from the sale af tickets for the individual concerts have been as follows: First concert, $2,300.90; second concert, $2,490.40; third concert, $2,580.90; fourth concert, $2,452.40; fifth concert, $2,387.90. Total, $12,212.50. Receipts for the season 1909-1910 were $11,638.60, and during the first year in the Academy, 1908-1909, they were $12,251.50. When concerts were given in the Baptist Temple, the receipts varied from $8,163 to $9,407. Dates for the concerts next season will be Friday evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23 and March 22. The plans for soloists next season are for two singers, two violinists and one pianist. The soloist at the closing (March) concert will be Mme. Louise Homer, and it is promised that the soloist at the opening concert will be an artist of equal if not greater reputation, as an artist. One of the violinists will be Kathleen Parlow.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

APR 7 1911

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

Annual Meeting of Women's Auxiliary Held at Academy of Music.

The annual meeting of the Women's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts was held in the Art Hall of the Academy of Music yesterday. In the absence of the president, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, who is out of town, Mrs. Charles F. Pray presided and Mrs. C. Buck acted as secretary in her stead.

The statement of the secretary said that the season of Philharmonic concerts just closed was the most successful since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began coming here, nearly twenty years ago. Although there have been five symphony concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, seven by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, fifteen operas and many musical events of importance in Brooklyn, the attendance has not been affected thereby, but has been up to the capacity of the opera house. It was Max Fiedler's third year as conductor and the good impressions that he first made have been strengthened. He will continue as conductor.

Receipts from the sale of tickets for the individual concerts have been as follows: First concert, $2,300.90; second concert, $2,490.40; third concert, $2,530.90; fourth concert, $2,452.40; fifth concert, $2,387.90; total, $12,212.50. Receipts for the season 1909-1910 were $11,638.60, and during the first year in Academy, 1908-1909, they were $12,251.50. When concerts were given in the Baptist Temple, the receipts varied from $8,163 to $9,407. Dates for the concerts next season will be Friday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 22. The plans for soloists next season are for two singers, two violinists and one pianist. The soloist at the closing (March) concert will be Mme. Louise Homer, and it is promised that the soloist at the opening concert will be an artist of equal if not greater reputation. One of the violinists will be Kathleen Parlow.

CITIZEN,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

APR 6 1911

WOMEN'S AUXILIARY HOLDS ANNUAL MEETING

Report on Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The annual meeting of the Women's Auxiliary of the Philharmonic concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held this morning at 11 o'clock in Art Hall, Academy of Music. In the absence of the president, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, who is out of town, Mrs. Charles F. Pray presided. Mrs. C. Buek acted as secretary, and Mrs. Pray read the report of the Executive Committee.

The statement of the secretary said that the season of Philharmonic concerts just closed was the most successful since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began coming here, nearly twenty years ago. Although there have been five symphony concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, seven by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, fifteen operas and many other musical events of importance in Brooklyn, the attendance has not been affected, thereby, but has been up to the capacity of the opera house. It was Max Fiedler's third year as conductor and the good impressions that he first made have been strengthened. He will continue as conductor.

Receipts from the sale of tickets for the individual concerts have been as follows: first concert, $2,300.90; second, $2,490.40; third, $2,580.90; fourth, $2,452.40; fifth, $2,387.90; total, $12,212.50. Receipts for the season 1909-1910 were $11,638.60, and during the first year in the Academy, 1908-1909, they were $12,251.50. When concerts were given in the Baptist Temple, the receipts varied from $8,163 to $9,407.

Dates for the concerts next season will be Friday evenings, Nov. 10, Dec. 8, Jan. 12, Feb. 23 and March 22. The plans for soloists next season are for two singers, two violinists and one pianist. The soloist at the closing concert will be Mme. Louise Homer, and it is promised that the soloist at the opening concert will be an artist of equal reputation as an artist. One of the violinists will be Kathleen Parlow.

TIMES,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

APR 6 1911

CONCERTS DREW HEAVILY.

Boston Symphony Philharmonic Series' Most Successful Season.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary Board on Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held to-day in Art Hall, Academy of Music. In the absence of the President, Mrs. Camden C. Dike, who is out of town, Mrs. Charles S. Pray presided. Mrs. C. Buek acted as Secretary. Mrs. Pray read the report of the Executive Committee, and, after a brief session, devoted to routine business, the meeting adjourned.

The statement of the Secretary that the season of Philharmonic concerts just closed was the most successful since the Boston Symphony Orchestra began coming here, nearly twenty years ago. Although there have been fives symphony concerts by the New York Symphony Orchestra, seven by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, fifteen operas and many other musical events of importance in Brooklyn, the attendance has not been affected thereby, but has been up to the capacity of the opera house. It was Max Fiedler's third year as conductor, and the good impressions that he first made have been strengthened. He will continue as conductor.

Receipts from the sale of tickets for the individual concerts have been as follows: First concert, $2,300.90; second concert, $2,490.40; third concert, $2,580.90; fourth concert, $2,452.40; fifth concert, $2,387.90; total, $12,212.50. Receipts for the season, 1909-1910, were $11,638.60. During the first year in the Academy, 1908-1909, they fere $12,251.50. When concerts were given in the Baptist Temple, the receipts varied from $8,163 to $9,407.

Dates for the concerts next season will be Friday evenings, November 10, December 8, January 12, February 23 and March 22. The plans for soloists next seasoun are for two singers, two violinists and one pianist. The soloist at the closing (March) concert will be Mme. Louise Homer. It is promised that the soloist at the opening concert will be an artist of equal if not greater reputation as an artist. One of the violinists will be Kathleen Parlow.

CITIZEN,

Brooklyn, N. Y.

APR 5 1911

TO DISCUSS CONCERTS.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary Board of the Philharmonic Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be held to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock in the art room of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. Reports on the programmes, receipts and outcome of the season of concerts just concluded will be made and action in regard to the concerts for next season will be taken.

Soloist Of Symphony This Week

Miss Carolina White.

Honors Showered On Hub Girl Opera Prima Donna

Honors continue to shower upon Carolina White, the operatic "find" of the season.

It was not long ago that Miss White left Boston for Italy comparatively unknown. This week she returns to enjoy the rare distinction of appearing as soloist at the Symphony concerts. This is an honor which nearly all the noted artists seek and which only a small number can secure. In Miss White's case it comes as a natural reward for distinguished service on the operatic stage.

The Boston soprano's first remarkable feat came when she created the title part in "The Girl of the Golden West" in Chicago. Later she duplicated this great success in Boston and in Philadelphia. A few weeks ago she won new renown when she appeared in the title role in the first American performance of "The Secret of Suzanne," by Wolf Ferrari, which was given at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York. Later she sang in Providence with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Tomorrow afternoon, and again Saturday night, she will sing at Symphony Hall the soprano air, "Ebben? Ne andro lontana," from Catalani's "La Wally," which was sung at the Metropolitan Opera House two seasons ago with Emmy Destinn in the principal role, and Marguerite's prison song from Bolto's "Mefistofele," which has been sung here by Frances Alda and Alice Nielsen.

SCIENCE MONITOR,

APRIL 6, 1911.

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Is Honored by Baltimore Oratorio Gift

(Photo by Marceau, Boston.)

CUP PRESENTED TO MAX FIEDLER.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, has just been given a handsome silver cup by the Oratorio Society of Baltimore.

For two successive years he has conducted the Oratorio Society in the performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony in Baltimore at a regular Boston Symphony concert. Both of these concerts were very successful and Mr. Fiedler became so well liked that a general subscription was made to present him with this cup.

The token is 10 inches high and six inches in its widest diameter and elabo[illegible] engraved.

ADVERTISER, THURSDAY

APRIL 6, 1911

MUSIC NOTES.

The last opportunity of the year to hear selections from Wagnerian opera will be at the pension fund concert on next Sunday evening. At this concert Mr. Fiedler will play the "Flying Dutchman" overture and the "Rienzi" overture; the "Ride of the Valkyries," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser." An extra appearance of Josef Hofmann will be as welcome as it was unexpected. Hofmann will play the fourth concerto of Beethoven. The other number on the programme will be Beethoven's "Egmont" overture.

In many of the great cathedrals of England the performance of Bach's "Passion" music has become a regular part of the Good Friday services. Good Friday evening has been the time chosen for the performance of the "Passion" music by the Cecilia and the Boston Symphony, this being the last of the three concerts given by the combined forces of these two societies. The soloists will be Marie Zimmerman, soprano; Janet Spencer, contralto; George Harris, tenor, and David Bispham, baritone. There will also be a boy choir of 75 from the Emmanuel church.

RECORD, THURSDAY,

APRIL 6, 1911

MUSIC NOTES.

The last opportunity of the year to hear selections from Wagnerian opera will be at the pension fund concert on next Sunday evening. At this concert Mr. Fiedler will play the "Flying Dutchman" overture and the "Rienzi".

In many of the great cathedrals of England the performance of Bach's "Passion" music has become a regular part of the Good Friday services. Good Friday evening has been the time chosen for the performance of the "Passion" music by the Cecilia and the Boston Symphony, this being the last of the three concerts given by the combined forces

[206]

Oriole Singers Give Fiedler Loving Cnp

(Photo by Marceau.)
SILVER CUP PRESENTED TO MAX FIEDLER, CONDUCTOR OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, BY THE ORATORIO SOCIETY OF BALTIMORE.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has just become the possessor of a very handsome silver cup which has been given to him by the Oratorio Society of Baltimore. For two successive years he has conducted the Oratorio Society in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in Baltimore at a regular Boston Symphony concert.

Both of these concerts had great success and Mr. Fiedler became so well liked that a general subscription was made to present him with this cup. It is 10 inches high and six inches in its widest diameter, most elaborately chased and suitably engraved.

TESTIMONIAL TO MAX FIEDLER

[Photograph by Marceau, Boston.]

Silver Cup Sent to the Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Baltimore Friends.

MADAME WHITE WITH SYMPHONY

By FREDERICK JOHNS.

The largest hat that ever entered Symphony Hall arrived there yesterday on the head of Madame Carolina White. The young singer must have walked in from Newtonville, for she could never have got it through a carriage or street car door, and the stage entrance of Symphony Hall was none too wide.

The hat was black with a huge white feather in it and its shape was elliptical. As she stood in front of the Symphony Orchestra the long side spread over the head of Herr Fiedler like a sheltering umbrella.

Madame Carolina must have desired to make a sensation on her debut with the great orchestra of her home city, for she also wore a hobble skirt. This hobble began above the knees instead of at the ankle, and gave her a sort of skating gait.

There was a sensation all right, and several women in the second balcony almost fell over the rail trying to get a look at her. Her gown was black satin with a lace overdress and the general effect was strange but prepossessing.

However, all this was preliminary to the singing. The first number was "Ebben? Ne Andro Lontana" from Catalani's "La Wally," an aria of little value, either lyrically or dramatically. Miss White did nothing to justify her selection of it although she sang sweetly and correctly.

The young singer was naturally nervous, for as a Boston girl she could appreciate the honor of singing with the Symphony Orchestra, and her voice was not under proper control.

She was much better in the prison song from "Mefistofele," which is lovely music and well suited to her voice, but even here she lacked the confidence she displayed as Minnie in "The Girl of the Golden West" at the Opera House.

There is no doubt that Miss White has a lovely voice, one of the richest and best on the operatic stage, but she lacks concert experience.

The orchestra played the famous "Manfred" symphonic poem of Tschaikowsky, a grand and inspiring "Te Deum Laudamus" by Sgambati and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture.

CAROLINA WHITE SINGS AT SYMPHONY

Noted American Prima Donna Warmly Applauded By Large Audience.

Carolina White, the only American prima donna chosen to take the leading part in one of the three famous productions of Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West," returned to her native city yesterday to appear as soloist as the Symphony rehearsal. She will also be heard at tonight's concert.

It is only fair to Miss White to say that she was heard to better advantage when she sang at the Boston Opera House, even on that memorable and trying night when she made her debut there at short notice. Yesterday, particularly in the first number, "Ebben? Ne andro lontana," the doleful, but yet beautiful, air from Catalani's "La Wally," sung as the ill-fated heroine bids good-by to her childhood home, there was unnecessary forcing of tones. Miss White has a singularly powerful, as well as lovely voice, and there is no need of pulling out all the stops even in Symphony Hall. Besides, a piano accompaniment of itself should counsel moderation. Many effects yesterday were obscured or utterly lost. No doubt the song will go much better tonight, as is often the case when the singer is appearing in Symphony Hall for the first time. But even under the most favorable conditions a piano accompaniment would fail to do justice either to singer or song.

The accompanist in the air from "La Wally" was Miss White's husband, Paul Longone, a young conductor attached to the San Carlo Opera House in Naples.

The soloist was heard more favorably in the familiar air from Boito's "Mefistofele," "L'altra notte in fondo al mare," the sad, sweet song which Marguerite sings in prison. In this instance there was a fitting orchestral accompaniment.

Miss White has much to favor her. She has a prepossessing appearance; she has marked artistic intuition; she has the finest soprano voice heard in Boston in many a year—a voice of wide range, large power, rare beauty. A singer of great promise! The audience yesterday was friendly and recalled her several times.

The program opened with an impressive performance of Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony. At the close of it the audience applauded until the orchestra stood up to be thus complimented for the ravishing lyric tones of the pastorale, the cataractic brilliancy of the Alpine scene and the dramatic might of the finale. The combination of organ and orchestra in the last movement of the symphony enables the prodigious Russian composer to produce awe-inspiring effects. The performance was wholly worthy of the wonderful work.

There was splendid sonority in the Sgambati "Te Deum" and in the "Leonore" overture of Beethoven.

FRIENDS OF FIEDLER SEND HIM A CUP

Oratorio Society of Baltimore Gives Symphony Orchestra Conductor a Testimonial.

Max Fiedler, conductor of the Symphony orchestra, has just become the possessor of a handsome silver cup which has been given to him by the Oratorio Society of Baltimore.

For two successive seasons he has conducted this society in the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony in Baltimore at a regular Boston Symphony concert. Both of these concerts were very successful and Mr. Fiedler became so well liked that a general subscription was made to present him with this cup.

It is 10 inches high and 6 inches in its widest diameter, most elaborately chased and suitably engraved.

Sunday

APRIL 8, 1911.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Two novelties by two Boston composers are the principal items of next week's Symphony programme. George W. Chadwick will be represented by his suite symphonique, which has just taken the prize offered by the Federation of Musical Clubs. It is in four movements—allegro molto animato, Romanza, intermezzo and humoreske; finale—allegro energetico. The other novelty will be the comedy overture on negro themes by Henry F. Gilbert, late of Harvard University. Other numbers on the programme will be the prelude to "Parsifal" and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead." Following the usual custom of not giving the public rehearsal on Good Friday, it will be given on Thursday afternoon of the coming week.

PENSION FUND CONCERT.

The last opportunity of the season for the general public, outside of the regular patrons of the Symphony Orchestra, to hear that great organization under Max Fiedler will be tomorrow (Sunday) evening, April 9, when the orchestra will give its second concert in aid of its pension fund. Josef Hofmann is the artist to offer his services for tomorrow night's concert. The programme will comprise the "Egmont" overture by Beethoven, which will be followed by the concerto for piano in G major No. 4. The second part will be Wagnerian, including the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," the Bacchanale from "Tannhauser," the "Ride of the Valkyries," the "Waldweben" and the "Rienzi" overture.

CECILIA AND SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IN BACH'S PASSION MUSIC.

The third and last of the series of Cecilia concerts will be Bach's Matthew Passion in Symphony Hall on next Friday (Good Friday) evening, beginning at 7:30 o'clock promptly. The length of the work demands this early hour, despite the many cuts made in it by Mr. Fiedler. A choir of 50 boys from Emmanuel Church will assist. Marie Zimmerman of Philadelphia, who first came into prominence some years ago through her work at the famous Bach festivals that were given in the spring in the old Moravian Church in Bethlehem, Pa., is to be the soprano; Janet Spencer is the contralto, Mr. George Hamlin, tenor, and Mr. David Bishpam, baritone.

MISS CAROLINA WHITE THE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Of Carolina White, the soloist at the symphony rehearsal, L. C. Elson says in his Advertiser review:

Miss Carolina White had already made a very favorable impression in Boston in the new Puccini opera. It is always a crucial test for an operatic star to forego all the advantages of costume, scenery and dramatic action, and appear in the white light of the concert platform. Miss Farrar has always been somewhat of a disappointment under these circumstances, and so has Mme. Calve, and others that could be mentioned.

Miss White had only piano accompaniment to her first number, which was an added handicap, although the instrument was well-played. Nevertheless the young vocalist won a triumph. She sang with breadth and with a sympathetic quality of tone, although a suspicion of tremolo was more than once apparent. In her second number, the prison song from Boito's "Mefistofele," the orchestra gave the support. The strong contrasts of this aria were finely brought out and the climaxes given with a fervor that aroused enthusiasm on the part of the audience, for Miss White was recalled several times with much heartiness. With operatic adjuncts there would have been still greater results.

[207]

BACH "PASSION" MUSIC SUMS SEASON

"Matthew Passion" Last Concert of Cecilia and Symphony—Bach's Music Leads in Modern Style—Prof. Paine's Criticism.

THAT Bach is the most modern of musicians is a statement to puzzle the layman who has been supposing all these years that the father of modern harmony antedated Beethoven by some years. That he is also the most dramatic of composers, characterizing his roles in vocal works as definitely as ever Wagner tried to do, is another amazing statement for those who have thought of him chiefly as he is five-fingered by assiduous pupils who yearn to "get ahead" to Chopin. Yet "the musician's musician," as he is often called, is today coming into his own with the people largely through the exploitation of the distant possibilities of music by the so-called ultra modern composers. There is nothing in the most extreme of these which is not to be found somewhere in the vast library of father Bach, though his way of handling these musical materials was so skilful in point of his polyphonic mastery that what clashes on the ear in modern composition is found in Bach to be perfectly harmonious.

Fiedler Leads Work

Therefore the coming concert of the Cecilia Society, who will sing the Bach "Passion" music with the Symphony orchestra under Mr. Fiedler's direction April 14 at Symphony hall, is a happy finale for this particular season. We have had many experiments in music—French, German, American, too; we have heard operas of every sort from Mr. Converse's charming idyllic "Pipe of Desire" to the tragic story of "Otello," which Verdi tried to tell in the language of Richard Wagner; we have had orchestral music ranging from Handel to Debussy; therefore the ever new, ever revered work of the greatest master of them all comes comfortingly to restore a normal balance of thought.

To hear the "Matthew Passion" as Mr. Fiedler and his forces should present it is to hear things both as refreshingly unhackneyed and as solidly safe and sane as may be found in a range from Enesco's marvel of octaves in the strings or the utmost venture of a Dukas, to the normal fluency of a Beethoven adagio. All of music seems comprised in Bach and that he is not always loved must arise from the lack in performer or hearer of a noble sincerity like his own. That with Bach every tone weighs a ton may be said without flippancy. The more fleeting and transient its appearing, the more his every note needs to be pondered by the executant, the more clearly conceived by the hearer.

Bach must be tasted slowly, thoroughly, on the assumption, invariably justified, that he is worth while in every instant. Impressionism is far away from him, if by impressionism one means a careless throwing together of tones, undetected in their falsity because there is such a crowd of them. Bach's web of tone will bear testing in every thread. Here is why he is so inexhaustible a resource to musicians, and why the early study of nearly every successful composer centers in him; and of the wisest abides there. And yet Bach's music sounds more modern today than Beethoven's. There is more of that exquisite tingly closeness of harmony—a strangeness that becomes rankness is some of the exotics of the hour. Bach knows how to draw out independent voices that seem to pay little heed to each other and are explained only by their going along to other things. He who would hear Bach must lend more than one ear. Like the orchestral conductor he must follow each part as an individual, thinking horizontally as it were, as well as up and down.

This "Passion" Greatest

The "St. Matthew Passion" music is the great vocal work of the master and yet it was laid aside and scarcely known after Bach's day until in 1829 Mendelssohn performed it at Berlin. The centenary of Bach's death (1850) was commemorated by the formation at Leipsic of the Bach Gesellschaft, which began publishing, 1851, a complete critical edition of his works, since entirely completed.

The "St. John's Passion" has been less often heard but is very beautiful, if on a smaller scale than the Matthew. The "Christmas Oratorio" in five parts has been sung at different times in Boston, the first parts heard here having been given by the Cecilia society under Mr. Lang's direction. The Grand Mass in B minor is another of the Cecilia's great achievements, under Mr. Lang's leadership.

The explanation of the modernness of Bach's music perhaps lies, externally considered at least, in the fact that he represented a point of fusion between the older harmonic systems, back to which the so-called ultra moderns are seeking, and the modern system. This is what has given him the name of the father of modern harmony—because he welded these fluctuating elements of his time into the definite system which has dominated composition since his day. The two eras of musical thought which he fused may be called, according to Baker's dictionary, the polyphonic contrapuntal (thematic development by strict and free imitation) and the harmonic tonal (chord combinations founded on the modern system of major and minor keys).

Paine Estimates Bach

Professor J. K. Paine says in his "History of Music," page 227: "As Palestrina is the representative master of medieval church music, so Bach is the highest representative of Protestant church music. In this field he is not only the most profoundly subjective artist but is equally remarkable for the richness and wonderful range of his imagination and for his consummate mastery of musical form. He was one of the most intellectual musicians that ever lived, yet he made his skill and learning subservient to his emotional nature, which his religious fervor ennobled and intensified. Those who find his music cold and passionless are simply ignorant of his style. . . . His sacred music is founded in a large degree on the Lutheran chorales. This old custom of introducing melodies into the higher forms of church music reached its perfection in his cantatas. Many of his cantatas are founded on some particular chorale which is wrought out in varied forms of solo and chorus. One of the most splendid specimens of this choral art is the cantata on 'A mighty Fortress is our God' (Ein' Feste Burg).

"The 'Passion According to St. Matthew' has no rival in its special form. It is the highest representation that has ever been conceived in music of the trials and death of the master. Among hundreds of similar works both before and during Bach's day his are the only ones that have lived.

"The oratorio has replaced the passion, but the older form, as completed by Bach, possesses a certain reality and intensity of religious ardor and belief that not even the grandest oratorios of Handel, except 'The Messiah,' can rival." The great difference seems to be that the modernest musicians find little to stimulate them in Handel's work, while Bach is beyond their hugest concepts still. Professor Paine, however, agrees that the "Passion" music is more intensly lyrical and dramatic than "The Messiah" and expresses a deeper pathos.

Bach Characterizes

"As a contrapuntist," goes on Professor Paine, "Bach is acknowledged as the foremost of all masters. No one has shown more subtle and consummate knowledge of the relation of chords. His bold use of dissonances found no parallel in his own day; his ever new and striking harmonic progressions render the study of his works invaluable to the student. As an original harmonist he stands beside Chopin, Wagner and the other modern masters, while as a contrapuntist he towers above them all. All the voices of his counterpoint are perfectly melodious, and so natural that it seems as if the complex structure of his polyphony created itself, and as if the parts could flow in any direction as freely as water. Within this sphere he shows infinite variety and originality. No two fugues of his are treated alike; each one has its individual characteristic theme and is worked out in accordance with it. . . . Bach did not write for a public but for himself and his ideal critic; his music therefore is free from conventionalities and his best works cannot grow antiquated. He appears modern now and must remain so because he stood above fashion."

Marx says: "No one has ever equaled Bach in depth and truthfulness of characterization. In the recitatives of the 'St. Matthew Passion,' not a single tone is uttered otherwise than with the aim of giving characteristic expression to the words by means of significant harmonic and melodic progressions. This is true also of his airs and choruses, and of many of his instrumental compositions. It was under the influence of this deep insight into the spiritual life of the world of sound that this master developed harmony so fully and rightly and significantly, and all that later musicians have discovered and done, except wild fancies and transient whims, may be traced back to that epoch in which it was given to father Bach to reveal the truthfulness and deep spiritual significancy of his art in connection with the word of God."

Max Fiedler will present two novelties at the Symphony concerts of Thursday, Apr. 13 and Saturday, Apr. 15: George W. Chadwick's Suite Symphonique, which recently won the prize of the federation of music clubs and was produced in Philadelphia; and Henry F. Gilbert's comedy overture on negro themes. Both these works will be played from manuscript. Mr. Gilbert, whose name appears for the first time on a symphony program, wins the recognition of the conductor purely on the merits of his score. His overture is a light piece of music, both a patriotic and scholarly endeavor at self expression. The new composer lives in Cambridge. He is not a youth, however, nor is he a representative of any academic propaganda.

Mr. Fiedler presents with the compositions of the two Americans the Prelude to "Parsifal" and Rachmaninoff's symphonic poem, "The Island of the Dead." The twenty-second rehearsal, let it be noted again, is on Thursday afternoon, instead of (Friday).

(Copyright by Gessford, Nek York.)
JOSEF HOFMANN,
Pianist who appears at Symphony pension fund concert Sunday evening.

POST, SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1911

MISS WHITE AS SOLOIST

BY OLIN DOWNES

Carolina White was the soloist at the 21st public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon, in Symphony Hall. Miss White, gorgeously garbed, sang an air from Catalani's "La Wally," and Marguerite's Prison Song, "L'Altra Notte," from the third act of Boito's "Mefistofele." Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony was the pub of the programme. Sgambati's "Te Deum Laudamus," as orchestrated for full orchestra, was heard for the first time in Boston, and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven brought the concert to an end.

The performance of Tschaikowsky's symphony was on the whole very effective, and at the end the orchestra was obliged to rise en masse and acknowledge the applause. Mr. Fiedler's performance was in some respects uncommonly impressive. The last movement of the symphony has seldom been heard to greater advantage. Here, indeed, was the spirit of Berlioz. In fact, no production of the modern Russian school (if Tschaikowsky can now be called modern) displays more conspicuously the influence of Berlioz than this symphony. It is, in fact, a Russian "Childe Harold." If the work were exclusively the production of Tschaikowsky, how it might be praised! But it is not. Berlioz, not Balikereff, is the inspirer of this work, from the beginning to the end. Yet Tschaikowsky clothes the theatricalism, the strenuous modernity of the madcap Frenchman, with a wealth of invention, of creative genius, for which Berlioz would have given him his hat, if it would have done any good.

The last three movements of this symphony are incontrovertibly Berlioz-Russianized. The orchestration, indeed, is a tour de force. But above and beyond all this, and in spite of conflicting influences, shines the genius of Peter Illytch. The "Manfred" symphony remains one of the great works in modern orchestral music.

Miss White sang for the first time at a symphony concert. Her triumphs in opera are now well known. She is, first of all, and foremost, an opera singer. She sang in such a manner yesterday afternoon, and her performance was remarkable. It was not that Miss White still suffered from an attack of laryngitis, of which she had been the victim earlier in the week, or that she lacked the requisite technic to do justice to her selections.

It was simply that this was a concert stage and that Miss White sang with the brilliancy and authority, and exaggerated emotion, supposed to be necessary on the platform. In the pretty air from "La Wally" she was heard to good advantage. Her voice is fresh and her tone production, generally speaking, excellent, but Miss White has still much to learn as an artist. The air from Boito's "Mefistofele," the music of the mad Marguerite, which Verdi would not have scorned to write, lacked the true pathos and simplicity, to say nothing of its execution. The passages of ornamentation were not the expression of a distracted mind, there were feats in bravura. They were not intended so by the composer. There could have been much more tone simplicity, much better delivery, as when the passages, arteggiated passage which follows the high A, near the first of the aria, were totally unrecognizable to the listener, Tradition may sanction such treatment. It is not intelligent or artistic. There was cordial applause for Miss White.

Sgambati's "Te Deum" proved a musicianly and effective piece of writing. Mr. John Marshall was organist. The Beethoven "Leonore" overture was brilliantly performed.

At the concerts of next week two compositions by American composers will be heard for the first time in this city: George W. Chadwick's "Symphonic Sketches," and Henry F. Gilbert's "Comedy Overture on Negro Themes."

THE BOSTON GLOBE—SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1911.

AT THE SYMPHONY.

Carolina White Appears as the Singing Soloist.

Revival of the Tschaikowsky "Manfred" Symphony.

The program of the 21st public symphony rehearsal yesterday afternoon was as follows: Tschaikowsky, "Manfred" symphony; Sgambati, "Te Deum Laudamus" for orchestra and organ; Beethoven, "Leonora" overture No. 3; Catalani, Wally's air from "La Wally," act 1; Boito, Marguerite's prison song from "Mefistofele," act 3; Carolina White, soloist.

Taine, the litterateur, has called Byron's "Manfred" a twin-brother of the greatest poem of the age, Goethe's "Faust." Goethe said that Byron had taken his "Faustus" to himself and had extracted from it the strongest nourishment for his hypochondriac humor. "Manfred," like "Faust," has inspired the setting down of many notes upon music-paper, and has appealed to those who had a pretty taste for melancholy.

It is curious that Berlioz did not take "Manfred" to his arms as a theme crying for an orchestral orgy of tone. He and Byron both had brains whirling nearer to the abysm of madness than possessed of sanity. Berlioz did write a symphonic-poem of the wanderings of Childe Harold, who was a variant of Manfred, and both were shadows in slight metamorphoses of Byron himself, as were all the doleful, morbid heroes in his gallery, the Giaour, the Corsair, Sardanapalus, Cain, Tasso and the rest.

It has been said that Schumann, in his "Manfred" overture, caught the adoration, the passion of the character. He would not have known the true tang of Byron's confession: "I will work the mine of my youth to the last vein of the ore and then—good night. I have lived and am content." Tschaikowsky might have found such words within his own heart, and he has probed the agony of the character.

Balakirev, the founder of the modern Russian school, wrote vividly after a definite program, in a descriptive poem, an instrumental tale. He had outlined a musical scheme for an orchestral work upon Byron's neurotic "Manfred," and had long meditated upon it, yet felt Tschaikowsky the more apt in temperament to undertake it. He became the inspiration of this, as of the "Romeo and Juliet" fantasie-overture. It was to him also that the symphonic poem "Fate" was dedicated.

Tschaikowsky took his suggestion of a theme indicative of Manfred's character and personality to be used throughout the work, a fixed musical idea such as Berlioz used in his autobiographical Fantastic symphony of an artist's life. Tschaikowsky followed Balakirev's plan throughout, except that he reversed the order of his second and third movements.

The work is broadly conceived, with a deep understanding of the capacity for anguish of man's soul and executed with a vivid imagination and a keen sense of dramatizing values. The music pertaining to Manfred is strongly expressive of the ceaseless tumult of emotions, the frenzied adoration of the phantom Astarte, the violent presentiments for the future, the haunting remorse for the past.

The passage indicative of the maid herself is of exquisite beauty, and of the suave Italian melody in which Tschaikowsky's muse could be both skilled and spontaneous. The picture of the witch might have been more uncanny and eerie to a writer of the north country, but the music of the waterfall is as finely feminine in grace as are the falls of our Yosemite. The pastoral is again Italian in its serenity and was ennobled in Mr Longy's art.

The last movement is of great span. The previous thematic ideas are revived and contrasted not only with contrapuntal but with dramatizing skill.

The apotheosis at the close to Manfred's soul as though the hero were translated to the inheritance of wings and immortality sounds strangely like the heavenly proclamation of forgiveness to Marguerite.

Miss White gave pleasure by the purity, power, wide range and admirable natural qualities of her voice, by her evenness of phrase in sustained song, and her facility in more florid passages. In the art of interpreting emotional thought, of employing variety of accent and of tonal color for dramatic purposes, there are yet effects in which she will doubtless grow more adept.

Catalini's air went better than that of Boito, where there was not sufficient differentiation between Marguerite's remembrance of physical pain and wretchedness and her escape from it in the piteous rhapsodizing of a delirious brain.

Sgambati's Italian brethren of the operatic school might bathe their souls with profit in the chastity and majestic serenity of style which characterizes his "Te Deum Laudamus." It was played by strings, wood-wind, brass and organ, heretofore it had been played here by string choir and organ, as originally written.

The playing of the orchestra disclosed the superior qualities which characterize its musicianship. The concert next week will be on Thursday afternoon.

[208]

CONCERTS NEXT WEEK

Three of Interesting Promise—A "Wagner Programme" and Josef Hofmann, the Pianist, for the Pension Fund of the Symphony Orchestra—A New Piece by Mr. Chadwick at the Regular Symphony Concerts—Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" by the Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra—Mme. Powell, the Violinist, to Come to Milton

ONCE more, the Symphony Orchestra, the Symphony Orchestra with Josef Hofmann, the pianist, and the Symphony Orchestra with the Cecilia, have the concerts of the new week to themselves. On Sunday evening, in Symphony Hall, at eight, the orchestra, with Mr. Fiedler conducting, with Mr. Hofmann to play a concerto, and with a programme drawn largely from Wagner's music, undertakes its second concert for the year for the increase of its Pension Fund. On Thursday afternoon (instead of the usual Friday) and on Saturday evening in Symphony Hall befalls the twenty-first pair of regular concerts for the year, when Mr. Chadwick's new "Symphonic Suite" and a "Comedy Overture" on negro themes by H. F. Gilbert will be performed for the first times hereabouts. On Friday evening, in Symphony Hall, at the exceptional hour of 7.30, the orchestra, the Cecilia, a choir of boys and four solo singers, will perform Bach's "Passion Music according to St. Matthew"—a masterpiece unheard here in years.

/ / + / /

Hofmann and Wagner

OUTSIDE performances of "Lohengrin" by an itinerant company and at "popular prices," not an opera by Wagner has been represented in this town for a year. Our opera house is oftenest Italianate, occasionally Gallic, but never thus far, Wagnerian. What Wagner we in Boston hear, unless we journey to New York to seek the admirable performances of the Metropolitan, we must hear in fragments at the Symphony Concerts. Mr. Fiedler, like most discriminating conductors, respects Wagner's intentions. Music of Wagner that has its full and vivid being only in the theatre, with all that the theatre can give it, he will not shift to the concert-room. His range of selection is limited; he must not repeat the chosen fragments too often. Hence he has played little of Wagner's music at the regular Symphony Concerts of the year. Next Sunday at the concert for the Pension Fund he will make amends. More than half the programme falls to Wagner, and the pieces chosen are the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman" and to "Rienzi," the Venusberg music from the first act of "Tannhäuser," the "Ride of the Valkyrs," from the third act of "Die Walküre," and the arrangement of Siegfried's musings in the forest from the second act of "Siegfried." These make the "second part" of the concert. The first falls to Beethoven—a programme after Wagner's own heart—and the chosen pieces are the dramatic overture to Goethe's "Egmont" and the concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in G major. For it, Mr. Hofmann, at his own proffer, will be the pianist. He was fain to play the piece when he appeared at the Symphony Concerts in December. Now he will have his will, and it is easy to imagine what breadth of execution and what glories of tone he will accomplish in his performance of the music. Mr. Hofmann has now conquered his place, by just title, among pianists of the first rank. He has begun the conquest of Boston, too.

/ / + / /

Mr. Chadwick and Others

IT is a tempting, but unsolvable, puzzle to try to "unify" the programme that Mr. Fiedler has arranged for the regular Symphony Concerts of Thursday afternoon (in lieu of Friday) and Saturday evening. Now Thursday is Holy Thursday and Friday is Good Friday, and by so much his choice of Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" might be appropriate to the days. On the other hand, All Souls' Day is six months past or six months to come. Rachmaninoff's tone-poem, "The Isle of the Dead," might be fitting for it, but hardly for the fast days of Holy Week. Perhaps it stands on the programme by its own right of deeply imagined and gravely beautiful music. Holy Saturday, the world over, is a day of approaching festival, and with it may be assorted the other pieces of the list—Mr. Chadwick's "Symphonic Suite" and Mr. Gilbert's "Comedy Overture," both new to audiences here. The suite, beginning in the key of E-flat and running in an Allegro, a Romance, a Humorous Intermesso and an Energetic Finale, is the piece with which Mr. Chadwick lately won a prize offered by the National Federation of Musical Clubs, which was played last month in Philadelphia and described the other day in this place. If it matches his previous "Symphonic Suite"—and it suggests a like mood and purpose—it will be interesting and very American music. Mr. Gilbert's overture lies still in manuscript, and he is of those who like to experiment with thematic material from what they believe is American—i. e., Negro or Indian—folk-music.

/ / + / /

Bach

AN ARTICLE in another column prepares the way for the performance of Bach's "Passion Music according to St. Matthew," that the chorus of the Cecilia, a choir of boys from Emmanuel Church, four solo singers, the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Fiedler will undertake on Friday evening. The conductor has made the "cuts" inevitable to a performance of the music nowadays unless it is to fill both an afternoon and an evening. Yet what remains requires the beginning of the concert at 7.30 punctually. The solo singers are of high repute in American concert-rooms, but they have been chosen more particularly for the difficult and unusual task they have in hand. They will be Marie Zimmerman, the soprano, a "specialist" in the music of Bach; Janet Spencer, the alto who sang here very intelligently, last autumn; George Hamlin, the tenor for the exacting narrative of the Evangelist, and David Bispham, the baritone.

NEXT Friday evening, on a Good Friday, one hundred and eighty-two years after Bach's "Passion music according to St. Matthew" was first sung on that fast day, in St. Thomas Church at Leipzig, the Cecilia and the Symphony Orchestra will perform it for the first time within the recollection of the younger generation here in Boston. It was the distinction of the Händel and Haydn Society to sing the music for the first time in the United States, in the seventies, fifty years after Mendelssohn had rediscovered it to the world. In the eighties, and for a little way into the nineties, it was even the custom of the society to perform the "St. Matthew Passion" annually on Good Friday, as perhaps, it was repeated at Leipzig in Bach's time. The custom gradually died; the music has fallen from the repertory of the Händel and Haydn Society; and not for years has it been sung in Boston. Wisely, Mr. Fiedler and the Cecilia have now elected to revive it. He has prepared his version—since there must be cuts—advisedly; preparation has been long and diligent though performances in Mr. Lang's time have schooled the choir to some of the music; the solo singers have been chosen for their fitness to a unique task. Thus, to many that hear—and they promise to be numerous—the performance will be like a rediscovery of one of the masterpieces of music. The more is the reason and the occasion, then, for a few random but recalling notes from various sources about music that in spite of the years and the admiration that have accumulated upon it, is still too little known even to students and connoisseurs.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We intend, most of us, when we hear a symphony, to make it one of our permanent possessions; we have no more intention to forget its effect on us than we have to part with an oriental rug which we have acquired with difficulty or sacrifice. We purpose, when once we have heard Beethoven's choral ninth to make its structure, color and sentiment as inalienable from our thought as the background, border and center of our favorite old Bokhara.

The immediate hearing of a noble symphonic piece is, or should be, the smallest part of our enjoyment of it. For on the day or the night when the music is played, we are likely to observe details so closely that we miss the larger purposes. We think of the work as a collection of ingenious episodes in pattern weaving, we think of it as so many rare examples of the dyer's craft. We do not see the whole rug.

The recess talk after the performance of Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony is likely to become an argument on the merits of the four movements, as though the audience were presently to reassemble and vote on which was the best. The exposition of the opening melodies is likely to be praised, their working out later in the work dispraised—possibly because it is an easier intellectual task to grasp a simple thematic statement than to follow an elaborate development of it. Then the conductor's lighter touch in the finale than in the first three sections will be a warrant for our giving Tschaikowsky, the summarizer, first honors and Tschaikowsky, the thinker, second honors. Here again we acknowledge a preference for what comes easy over what comes hard. We have to admit, on reflection, that the last movement, free and buoyant, though it is, could not stand without the preceeding allegro scherzo and andante to prepare it and furnish contrast.

The "Manfred" symphony in its entirety is what we want to keep in permanent recollection, for it is a unified piece of artistry, else it would not be a symphony; and it is a masterly one, else somebody besides Tschaikowsky conceived it.

Eyes off, then, from detail of border and from exquisitely wrought center; if we want to enjoy at its best the piece of workmanship which the east has sent us, let us look at the whole rug.

Miss Carolina White made her first appearance before the Symphony audience as a serious concert singer. Undeluded by her extraordinary and swift success in American opera, she came prepared for her few moments in Symphony hall Friday afternoon as for an occasion of momentous importance. She knew her listeners and was ready for their acutest criticism. Her art was the most noteworthy thing in the whole program. One of the notable Symphony events of the year the twenty-first concert would have been, if it had all risen to the standard of Miss White's singing. The Boston artist is something more than a reader of the modern light dramatic roles in opera; she is a singer with a solid technical foundation. She has not come to the point where she can arouse an audience to unusual enthusiasm, but she has interpretive direction and executive fluency which ought in time, and in no great time, to place her among the first of American sopranos.

Last Pension Fund Concert Due Tonight

The last opportunity of the season for the general public, outside of the regular patrons of the Symphony Orchestra, to hear that great organization under Max Fiedler will come this evening when the orchestra will give its second concert in aid of the pension fund.

